
A P P E N D I X.

A P P E N D I X.

LETTER FROM GENERAL MATHEWS,

TO

THE COURT OF DIRECTORS OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY.

(REFERRED TO IN THE FOREGOING LETTERS.)

HONOURABLE SIRs,

I HAVE the honour of informing you of the success of your arms on the Malabar Coast. You will have received advices of the outset of the Expedition from Bombay, and the general purport of it. On the 12th of December, I sailed with a small party; and thought proper, of my own accord, to land at Rajamundroog, in preference to any other place—because, on this part of the Coast, I had the double advantage of being able to secure myself until reinforced, and to procure provisions, which I could not have done at Cundapore, or any place to the Southward, by reason of the numerous gar-risons, and the vicinity of them to the capital. The measures and dispositions of the Gentlemen at Bombay were such, that I could not place any dependence upon being timely reinforced from thence, or of having any supply of provisions. Rajamundroog is on the top of a high hill, and commands the entrance of the best river on the Coast. We took it by storm. The moment we landed, a short time was taken up in preparing to move towards Onore ; for we had not a cooly, carriage, or bullock, to convey any stores. The battering cannon, ammunition, provisions, &c. were sent by sea ; and the great additions that HYDER had made to the fortifications of Onore and fortified Island, prevented my entering the river with the small craft, and obliged me to land every thing through a heavy surf on the beach, and then to cross the river to the Northward of the fort. These impediments were got over ; and a practicable breach being effected, the assault was made—and the garrison, consisting of two thousand five hundred men, were either killed, drowned, or made prisoners.—Shortly after this event, the troops from the Southward, under Lieutenant-Colonel MACLEOD, were landed at Rajamundroog. To wait for a junction, would take up much time : so, that not a moment should be lost, I embarked, and landed near Cundapore, under the fire of the Bombay Grab and the Intrepid, and immediately seized a small fort that served to secure our stores. The enemy were in fight, and seemed numerous : some prisoners that we took, reckoned them at twelve hundred Horse, one thousand Sepoys, and five hundred Peons. My party was composed of three hundred and fifty Europeans, six hundred Sepoys, and four small field-pieces—with which I marched, first towards the enemy, who drew back, and then I proceeded to Cundapore. They incommoded my rear very much ; but being determined to attack the fort, I only acted on the defensive, and at seven in the evening got possession of the fort, and the several redoubts that commanded the river. The grand object of the Expedition, an attack upon Bidanore, remained to be undertaken ; and much serious reflection it required before the hazardous enterprize should be determined on.—Your Honours will now take a view of the state of my army : No carriage-bullock, and the few draft not able to draw eight light field-pieces—not a cooly carry musquet, ammunition or provisions—not a tent—and many Officers HIS MAJESTY'S in particular, had not a single servant—neither bullock or horse to be had, the enemy having drove them off. The army, at this time, consisted of about eleven hundred effective Europeans, and three thousand Sepoys. The distance from Cundapore to the foot of the Ghaut is thirty miles, through a woody country: the enemy's army had been reinforced, and lay in the way. The reports of the strength of the various works that defended the pass up the mountains, was such as gave me but very faint hope of success; and the difficulty of supplying my troops with rice, was almost of itself sufficient to deter a person from the attempt. However, having positive orders to take possession of Bidanore, I resolved to make a trial, and issued directions for the march. We had not gone six miles, before the enemy opposed us in force. We pushed forwards; and, by the effect of well-served artillery, and the steadiness of the men, the enemy retired as we advanced. The skirmish continued about three hours—after which we were left to pursue our route unmolested; nor did the enemy make any stand till we were on the fourth day's march, within three miles of the pass—where, the ground being favourable, they attempted opposition, and were roughly treated, losing, by the bayonet and shot, above three hundred men. They were pursued to a small fort, which was immediately abandoned; and then fled to the first barrier or entrance of the pass. This was a line of masonry that covered all the open ground, and was closed by woods to the right and left. Upon six bastions were mounted fifteen pieces of cannon; and on the left was a work on a steep mountain, with two twelve pounders. This altogether had too formidable an appearance to attack in front; but having reconnoitred the right, I imagined that the flank might be turned by ascending the hill through the wood. Early in the morning, two parties were formed—one to attempt the flank, the other to scale the wall; but the enemy saved us that trouble by evacuating the place. This was a happy moment to try the pass; for the enemy, by felling trees, &c. would have thrown so many obstacles in the way, that the want of provisions provision would have compelled me to relinquish the design. A party was instantly ordered to follow the enemy up the hill, which, with little loss, gained the second barrier, on which were mounted eleven guns. Fifty of the enemy were killed or taken at this work. Having this success, I relieved the exhausted by fresh detachments, which excited emulation, and encouraged the ardour of the Sepoys; for, to the unremitting exertions of this branch of your troops is due the honour of this day. Battery after battery was taken; and the possession of the fort on the top of the Ghaut, about five in the afternoon, called Hyderghur, crowned the whole. At this fort we found mounted thirty pieces of cannon, from twenty-four to four pounders; and at the different works in the pass, forty others, from four to twelve.

When we contemplated the numerous redoubts and the height of the Ghaut, and were told by prisoners that we had drove off seventeen thousand men, including dismounted Cavalry, regular Sepoys, and match-lock Peons, we could not consider the victory we had gained as due to us—our weak efforts would have been in vain. The progress of your arms is to be ascribed to the Divine Will. In the course of this war, Providence has been peculiarly bountiful—When we were in want of rice, we were sure to find a supply left for our use by the enemy—when our musquet-ammunition was expended, the enemy's magazines furnished us abundantly—cannon we found in every fort, and such quantities of warlike stores, that we are apt to suppose that HYDER supplied all his garrisons from this Coast and from Bidanore. Hyderghur is about fourteen miles from Hydernagar, alias Bidanore, the capital of the Province.

In the night of the day that we gained the Ghaut, I was visited by Captain DONALD CAMPBELL, the son of Colonel CHARLES CAMPBELL. He had been wrecked off the Coast, was seized, and kept in irons, until the approach of his army caused the Jemadar to release him, to employ him as an Ambassador. His message was, that the Jemadar having lost his Master (HYDER), and being upon bad terms with TIPPoo SAHIB, would willingly put himself under the protection of the Company, provided that the management of the Country was continued to him. The idea of getting possession of the capital and the forts of the Kingdom towards Seringapatam, as well as the very great advantage I might expect from his experience, abilities and influence, with the weak state of my army, induced me to close with the proposal; and I sent him a cowl, signifying that his power and influence should not be lessened. This, tho' not drawn with a pen of a Lawyer, was equal in value to the capital of Bidanore. Captain CAMPBELL returned with it, and was to tell the Jemadar that I should march in the morning.

Not expecting the great success that we had met with by forcing the pass on the main road, I had detached Lieutenant-Colonel MACLEOD to the left, to ascend the Ghaut through a narrow path, in order to attack Hyderghur in the rear. The absence of this detachment, and the fatigue of the former day, reduced my party to about four hundred Europeans and seven hundred Sepoys; and all my guns were at the bottom of the Ghaut. With this detachment I moved towards Bidanore, and was within a mile of the walls before any message came from Captain CAMPBELL or the Jemadar: but having nothing to apprehend in the field from the panic-struck enemy, we continued our march until the welcome approach of Captain CAMPBELL assured me the place was our own. On entering it, I was pleased to see about four hundred of your Sepoys that had been taken in the Carnatic, who offered me their service. Upon visiting the Jemadar, I repeated my assurances, that while he behaved faithfully to the Company, the management of the Country should be continued to him; and, although the sword must be in your hands, that he should have as much power and influence as his station required, and that you would not refuse settling upon him very ample allowances. The enemy being in force, and my army much weakened, with other disagreeable matters that occurred, prevented my further advance than to take possession of two forts to the Eastward; for, being apprehensive that the Killidar of Mangalore would not deliver up that place to the order of HIRAT SAHIB, and considering that famous sea-port of more consequence to your affairs than acquiring territory beyond the mountains, I held myself in readiness to march that way, and was forced to lay siege to it.

A practicable breach being made, the Killidar thought proper to surrender it. Upon this happy event give me leave to congratulate you ; for it partly secures our conquests from Carwar to Cananore. There are two or three places that I have not been able to summons ; but as these garrisons cannot expect any succour, they will fall of course.

Thus have I given your Honours a short recital, from the first landing of your arms on the 12th of December, to the reduction of Mangalore on the 9th of March ; in which short time a series of success has attended us that can hardly be paralleled. All the enemy's marine has fallen in our hands, among which are eight ships of the line, either built or on the stocks ; and five of them might be sent to sea in a short time. After informing you of the happy and glorious success of your arms, it is painful for me to tell you, that dissention in the army, on account of plunder and booty, has arisen to such a height as to threaten open mutiny. I have informed your Honours of the terms that the Jemadar required, and that I in your name granted ; and you know in how peaceable a manner this capital was resigned to you. I am sorry to say, that HIS MAJESTY'S Officers have been foremost in the clamours ; and that the agents appointed by them have occasioned me much trouble and anxiety, and a great deal of discontent throughout the army. I shall send you copies of the several letters that have passed, for your determination. They may suppose that I have appropriated treasure to my own use, or bargained to restore the private property of the Jemadar to him ; or that I should agree that he should call all treasure and jewels his private property, to the exclusion of what of right should belong to the Honourable Company or the captors. I have only to assure your Honours, that I have made no bargain whatever, either public or private, but what was expressed in the cowl sent from Hyderghur, to which Captain CAMPBELL was witness ; and as I have frequently mentioned to my friends, that I would not receive a present of consequence without the consent of the Honourable Company, I shall inform you, that on my first visit the Jemadar insisted on making me a present of a lack of rupees ;

rupees ; and when he pleased to give a donation to the army of two lacks and thirty thousand of rupees, which sum waits your pleasure, he requested I would accept of another lack of rupees. To both of these requests respecting myself, I replied, that provided your Honours would give me leave, I should certainly embrace that fortunate moment to gain an independence, and shall wait your orders as to the disposal of two lacks of rupees. How far my former and the present services may entitle me to your good opinion, and to your acquiescence in thus rewarding me, is left to the generosity of your Honours ; but I beg that you will believe, that, during the course of my services, every thing of a similar nature shall be laid before you.

If it were possible to satisfy the avidity of a body of men, this little army would have a sufficiency of honour and profit to fill the most greedy ; but the infirmities of nature are not to be controuled by reason. Avarice of the most pernicious tendency has pervaded the limits of sense, and stepped beyond the bounds of duty. The army, not content with acquiring, at the different places that has been taken on the coast in ships of war, naval stores, merchandize, &c. &c. and in goods of various kinds at Bidanore, which altogether the Jemadar says may be valued at thirty lacks of pagodas ; they seek to deprive the Jemadar of his private property, under pretence of the lawful rights of war ; and assume a style and manner in their clamours and united addresses, that appears intended to force from me what I think ought to be preserved for the public service, and for the benefit of the Honourable Company. The manner that the fort and city was delivered to the Company, does not authorize me to touch private property ; and the cowl implies a perfect security for all such. Would your Honours be pleased, that by any rapacious action of your Commander in Chief, that he or the troops should forfeit the good opinion that may be entertained of them from their rapid success, or that the public service should be considered as a secondary object ? Our name has fallen almost to contempt ; but, as far as lays in my power, it shall be recovered, if not raised to its former eminence.

Mangalore, March 16, 1783.

FINIS.

THE L I F E
OF
JAMES THE SECOND
KING OF ENGLAND, &c.

COLLECTED OUT OF MEMOIRS WRIT OF HIS OWN HAND.

TOGETHER WITH

THE KING'S ADVICE TO HIS SON, AND HIS MAJESTY'S WILL.

PUBLISHED FROM THE ORIGINAL STUART MANUSCRIPTS IN CARLTON-HOUSE,

BY THE REV. J. S. CLARKE, LL.B. F.R.S.

HISTORIOGRAPHER TO THE KING, CHAPLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD, AND LIBRARIAN TO THE PRINCE REGENT.

IN TWO VOLUMES.

VOL. I.

LONDON:

PRINTED FOR LONGMAN, HURST, REES, ORME, AND BROWN, PATERNOSTER-ROW; FOR PAYNE AND FOSS, AND BUDA AND CALKEN, PALL-MALL.

1816

TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS
GEORGE PRINCE REGENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND AND OF THE KINGDOM OF HANOVER.

SIR,

IN obedience to Your Royal Highness's most gracious Command to me, as

Historiographer to His Majesty, I have selected and prepared for the press the most valuable of the Private Manuscripts of JAMES THE SECOND; whereby the Public may be enabled to form an opinion of the Principles and Motives, which influenced, in his own apprehension at least, the Counsels and Conduct of that Monarch.

In the execution of this important trust I have spared neither care, nor labour, to fulfil the liberal intention of Your Royal Highness; yet I do not presume so much on my diligence, as to imagine that no errors may have occurred, and that no historical illustrations may have been omitted in the course of so long a work:

Your Royal Highness may still, I fear, perceive omissions that have escaped my observation. But encouraged by a Benignity which conspicuously appears amidst the brilliant Events of THE REGENCY, I venture, SIR, to indulge the hope, that Your Royal Highness will accept of this discharge of my Duty with your accustomed goodness and condescension.

I have the Honour to remain

With unfeigned Respect and sincere Attachment,

SIR,

YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS'S

Most dutiful and most devoted Servant

JAMES STANIER CLARKE.

P R E F A C E.

THE Nation is indebted to the zeal and unremitting exertions of His Royal Highness the PRINCE REGENT, for the preservation of these Historical Documents, from the destruction with which they were menaced by the events of the French Revolution.

During the year 1804, Sir John Hippisley, by command of H. R. H. the PRINCE OF WALES, communicated in a Letter from Mr. Fox, dated Oct. 5. concluded a negotiation with the Abbé Waters, Procurator General of the English Benedictines, respecting all the Original Papers of the Royal House of Stuart, which had come into his possession after the death of Madame D'Albany, generally styled Dutchess of Albany, according to the last will of that Lady. Mr. Fox in the above-mentioned Letter to Sir J. Hippisley had said, That it was the wish of His Royal Highness to have the Stuart Papers consigned to the care of Mr. H. Elliot, Lord Minto's brother, who was then at Naples, and added, " If the Papers are not mere duplicates, they must at any rate be extremely valuable, though not particularly so to me, unless they relate to the period between 1672 and 1690, or thereabouts."

Mr. Pitt, having previously obtained information of the existence of these Stuart Papers, had authorised Mr. Jackson, His Majesty's Minister at the Court of Sardinia, to treat for them in the name of His Majesty's Government: but on Sir John Hippisley's representation to Mr. Pitt, that he was far advanced in his Negotiation on account of His Royal Highness, Mr. Pitt authorised Mr. Long to write to Sir John Hippisley, that, in deference to His Royal Highness, he had countermanded his instructions to Mr. Jackson.

Before the memorable departure of the ever to be lamented Lord Nelson from Portsmouth, in the autumn of 1805, Sir John Hippisley had requested, in consequence of a Letter from Lord Dundas, that the noble Admiral would endeavour to obtain these invaluable Manuscripts, which had been removed from Rome to Civita Vecchia, and had been deposited in the hands of a British merchant at that Port: " The Prince of Wales," said Lord Dundas, " expresses great anxiety for the safety of the Commission, and requests that Lord Nelson will keep it on board his own ship until he returns, unless he has the opportunity of some safe and sure conveyance to send it home.”

Subsequent to the Victory of Trafalgar, Lord Collingwood on the 11th of January 1806, in thanking Sir John Hippisley for his condolence on the death of a Friend, whose loss could never be replaced, informed him, That the strictest regard should be paid to the subject of his Commission ; and on the 31st of October, in the same year, his Lordship also wrote as follows, “ From the length of time it is since I had the honour to write to you, on the subject of communicating with Mr. Bertram at Civita Vecchia, you will conclude there has been difficulty ; which I am sorry to say has been such as has prevented any intercourse with that gentleman, or even obtaining any information of him—except a report that he is in prison, seized on and confined by the French.

“ I sent a Sloop of war up early in July, for the purpose of carrying your letter, and receiving any box or parcel which Mr. Bertram might have to send to me, and in a letter to Mr. Bertram desired him to send off a confidential person to receive your letter. Captain Raitt made several attempts to communicate with the shore—his boats were not permitted to land, and his Ship was fired at. In a second attempt in September he took with him a Sicilian officer, who it was thought could make his way to Mr. Bertram, and as the letter was supposed to be on a subject relating to the Fleet, those officers took a great interest in getting it delivered, and I am exceedingly sorry they were not successful.—Should any change of circumstance give more hope of obtaining the Papers which His Royal Highness is desirous of possessing, I will not fail to take advantage of it.”

IN 1810 THE PRINCE OF WALES not discouraged by these obstacles, and impelled by a consideration for the Stuart * Family, which His Royal Highness had previously shewn in assuring the Cardinal York of a continuance of his Pension even if it were to be paid out of the Privy Purse of His Royal Highness, was pleased to authorise Sir John Hippisley to confide the commission for obtaining the Stuart Papers to Mr. Bonelli; who at length, though with considerable risk, and through the assistance of the Rev. Mr. Macpherson President of The Scotch College, succeeded in shipping off the Cases for Leghorn, and having there concealed them from the vigilance of the Custom House Officers, they were with great difficulty embarked on board a Tunisian vessel bound to Tunis, and thence forwarded to Malta and finally to London, when the whole were placed in the Library at Carlton House. Sir John Hippisley, to whose care they had previously been consigned on their arrival, had frequently when at Rome from 1792 to

* The HOUSE OF BRUNSWICK from the first displayed a noble regard for the feelings of The Stuart Family. See a Letter from the Princess Sophia of Hanover to King WILLIAM, (Vol. ii. p. 362.)

1795 examined the whole Collection, and was perfectly satisfied respecting their authenticity.

The Procurator General, Abbé James Waters, died at Rome soon after he had received the first payment of his annuity, which he had requested to be allowed him from His Royal Highness in preference to any other mode of remuneration. The following is an extract from the Abbé Waters' Account of the Stuart MSS., which he sent to Sir John Hippisley from Rome, January 12th, 1805, giving an opinion of the Biographical Manuscript in four volumes, which forms the principal part of the present work :

“ Hon^d D^r Sir,

“ It would be difficult to give you in the small compass of a letter, all the elucidations you seem to require. The Papers in my possession were left me by the late D. of Albany, who found them in her Father's Library in Florence, from whence I myself brought them to Rome and lodged them in the Chancery till her death ; when I brought them in consequence of her Will to which I was sole executor to my own house. I here enclose a List of them as you desired. I shall observe in the 1st place, that the four Volumes first mentioned of THE LIFE OF K. JA^s 2^d, do not seem a collection of scattered papers with intervals of time or place, but form an Historical uninterrupted Acc^t of the principal events private and publick of his life and connections, from his first Campagnes in France and Spain, his return to England, his residence, employs, persecutions at Court, his exile in Scotland, his conversion, marriage, and accession to the Throne; viz. from his Birth in October 1633, to his Death in Sept^r 1701. All these contents are * asserted to have been collected from Memoirs written in his own hand, to which they bear continual references, citations, and long extracts. The King before he left England collected all his papers together, which in confusion and hurry he put in a box and entrusted to the Count of Therese, the Duke of Tuscany's Envoy. By his means they were sent to Leghorn and Florence, and by the G. Duke to Paris, where they were deposited in the Scotch Colledge. These papers made in all a Collection of nine †

* See Vol. 2. Page 242. for a most satisfactory attestation of the Original Sources, whence the following Life was composed.

† Lord Holland, in his prefatory address to the Reader of Mr. Fox's History of JAMES THE SECOND, has subjoined the following note: "Among Mr. Fox's papers was found a List of The Works which were placed in the Scotch College at Paris, soon after the death of James the Second, and were there at the time of the French Revolution. It is as follows:

- | | | |
|--|---|---|
| Four Volumes folio, six
Volumes quarto, | { | Memoirs in JAMES THE SECOND's own hand-writing, beginning from the time that he was sixteen years of age. |
| | | |
| Two thin quarto
Volumes, | { | Containing Letters from CHARLES THE SECOND's Ministers to James the Second (then DUKE OF YORK) when he was at Brussels and in Scotland, MS. |
| | | |
| Two thin quarto
Volumes, | { | Containing Letters from CHARLES THE SECOND, to his Brother, JAMES DUKE OF YORK, MS. |
| | | |

Vols, all written with his own hand. What access were given to these Original Papers I cannot say; but sure the Author of the four Vols. by me, whoever he was, saw them, since he copied and cites so much from them. I have never seen the work published by a Mr. Macpherson in Edinburgh, entitled Memoires of K. Ja^s 2^d, so cannot say if it be taken from these Vols. I am however assured the totality of their contents never was published. A Copy of these four Volumes by me was taken by a Secretary of the King, and put into the hands of Mr. Gordon, Superior of the House at Paris; this Copy your friend Paul Macpherson, now here as agent for the Scotch Clergy, took to England in 1788, and showed it to a Mr. Chambers who was writing The History of Scotland, he wished to borrow it as useful to his work, but it was refused. This Copy is now in Scotland, and has nothing to do with the Papers printed by Macpherson author of Ossian."

" This is all I can say of the MS. in four Vols. in my possession, which Mr. Lock some years ago Consul at Naples praised, and the Rev^d Mr. * Gunn admired, as well as Mr. Jackson now here. At all events if the Original Memoires of the King have been destroyed or burnt at S^t Omers, as the Hon. Mr. Fox seems to believe, and was printed in the

* It is difficult to make out this name correctly.

Monthly Reviser (Review) of last June, these Copies will become interesting if not already printed."

An Extract from a Letter of Dr. Cameron to Lord Holland, dated March 2, 1808, inserted in his Lordship's Prefatory * Address, gives some further interesting information respecting the fate of The Original Biographical Notes written by KING JAMES himself, and extending to nine volumes.

" Before Lord Gower, the British Ambassador, left Paris, in the beginning of the French Revolution, he wrote to Principal Gordon and offered to take charge of those valuable Papers, (KING JAMES's Manuscripts, &c.) and deposit them in some place of safety in Britain: I know not what answer was returned, but nothing was done. Not long thereafter the Principal came to England, and the care of every thing in the College devolved on Mr. Alexander Innes, the only British Subject who remained in it. About the same time, Mr. Stapleton, then President of the English College of S' Omer, afterwards † Bishop in England, went to Paris, previously to his retiring from France, and Mr. Innes, who had resolved not to abandon his post, consulted with him about the means of preserving the Manuscripts. Mr. Stapleton thought if he had them at S^t Omer, he could with small risk convey them to England. It was therefore resolved that they should be carefully packed up, addressed to a Frenchman, a confidential friend of Mr. Stapleton, and remitted by some publick carriage. Some other things were put up with the Manuscripts. The whole arrived without any accident, and was laid in a cellar. But the patriotism of the Frenchman becoming suspicious, perhaps upon account of his connection with the English College, he was put in prison; and his wife, apprehensive of the consequences of being found to have English Manuscripts richly bound and ornamented with Royal arms, in her house, cut off the boards and destroyed them. The Manuscripts thus disfigured, and more easily huddled up in any sort of bundle, were secretly carried, with papers belonging to the Frenchman himself, to his country house and buried in the garden. They were not, however, permitted to remain long there; the lady's fears increased, and the Manuscripts were taken up and reduced to ashes.

“ This is the substance of the account given to Mr. Innes, and reported by him to me in June, 1802, in Paris. I desired it might be authenticated by a procès verbale. A letter was therefore written to S^t Omer, either by Mr. Innes, or by Mr. Cleghorn, a lay gentleman, who had resided in the English College of S^t Omer, and was personally acquainted with the Frenchman, and happened to be at Paris at this time. The answer given to this letter was, that the good man, under the pressure of old age and other infirmities, was alarmed by the proposal of a discussion and investigation, which revived in his memory past sufferings, and might, perhaps, lead to a renewal of them. Any further correspondence upon the subject seemed useless, especially as I instructed Mr. Innes to go to S^t Omer, and clear up every doubt in a formal and legal manner, that some authentic document might be handed down to posterity concerning those valuable Manuscripts. I did not foresee that war was to be kindled up anew, or that my friend Mr. Innes was to die so soon.

“ Mr. Cleghorn, whom I mentioned above, is at present in the Catholick seminary of Old-Hall Green, Puckeridge, Hertfordshire. He can probably name another gentleman who saw the Manuscripts at S^t Omer, and saved some small things, (but unconnected with the Manuscripts,) which he carried away in his pocket, and has still in his possession.

“ I need not trouble your Lordship with my reflections upon this relation; but I ought not to omit that I was told sometimes, That all the Manuscripts, as well as their boards, were consumed by fire in the cellar in which they had been deposited upon their arrival at S^t Omer.”

It is difficult to ascertain with certainty who was the person employed in drawing up the following LIFE OF JAMES THE SECOND, but it seems to be the general opinion, which Lord * Holland has noticed as being also that of the Catholick Bishop Cameron, (in whose possession is the other Copy of the Manuscript which the Abbé Waters mentioned as having been taken,) That this Life was compiled from those Original Documents which appear to have been consumed at St Omer, “ by Thomas Innes, one of the Superiors of the Scotch College, and author of a work entitled, A Critical Essay on the ancient Inhabitants of Scotland.” “ The Narrative,” says Mr. Fox in his letter † to Mr. Laing, “ was said to have been revised and corrected, as to style, by Dryden the poet, (meaning probably Charles Dryden, the great poet’s son,) and it was not known in the College whether it was drawn up in JAMES’s Life, or by the direction of his son, the Pretender.”

Others on the contrary who have inspected the Stuart MSS. in the Library at Carlton House are inclined to think, that the person employed in drawing up the Life was Mr. Lewis Innes, styled by Voltaire Le Jesuite Innès, who with Lord Caryll (the nobleman to whom Pope was ‡ indebted for the first idea of the Rape of the Lock) had been associated in the service of JAMES after his withdrawing into France. Into the custody of this gentleman THE ORIGINAL MEMOIRS OF JAMES were given by a Warrant, dated March 24, 1701, to be preserved in the Archives of the Scotch College of Paris. This Warrant is inserted in one of the * Books of Entrys, Certificates and other Papers signed by JAMES THE SECOND, and his Son, which are preserved with The Stuart Manuscripts in Carlton House.

* Lord Holland’s Prefatory Address to the Reader. † Ibid.

‡ Dr. Warton informs us, in his Edition of Pope’s Works, That a Mr. Caryll, who was Secretary to Queen Mary, wife of JAMES THE SECOND, was the person who originally proposed to Pope the subject of The Rape of the Lock. Lord Caryll continued after JAMES’s death to act as Secretary to the Queen.

“ JAMES R.

“ James the Second by the Grace of God King of Great Britain, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c: To our Trusty and Wellbeloved Mr. Lewis Jnese, Almoner to our dearest Consort the Queen, and Principal of our Scotch Colledge at Paris Greeting. WHEREAS WEE are well assured that our Originall Memoires writt in our own hand can be no wher more safely kept then in Our Scotch Colledge of Paris, wher ther has been formerly severall papers of Our Royall Predecessors depositated and preserued by the great care and fidelity of those who have had the Government of Our said Colledge, And whereas wee have particular knowledge of your zeal discretion and affection for Vs and our Service, Wee have thought fitt to charge you with all the foresaid Originall Memoires as a Testimony of Our Trust and confidence in you, And wee do hereby authorize you to take into your care and custody these our s^d Memoires to be preserv'd in the Archiues of our said Scotch Colledge at Paris, and ther to remain as a lasting mark of our trust in you, and our affection for our said Colledge. And for so doing this shall be to you and your successors in the Government of Our said Colledge a sufficient Warrant. Given at our Court at S^t Germaines the 24th day of March 1701 And in the 17th year of our Reign.

By his Ma^{ties} Command

CARYLL."

The knowledge which JAMES herein professes to have had of the Zcal, Discretion and Affection of this his faithful Servant, rendered Mr. Innes peculiarly fit for being the confidential Secretary of that Prince; and the Chevalier St. George, if the Life commenced under his auspices after his Father's Death, would probably prefer the ability of such a biographer before that of any other. The hand-writing throughout appears to be the same, and is remarkable for its clearness and uniformity, but the mode of composition seems to vary in the different volumes, of which the reader will judge for himself. The endless variation of the orthography has greatly increased the labour of editing the work, since it demanded a continued attention, not only to words and sentences, but almost to every letter throughout the Manuscript. The Writer of it, whoever he may have been, continually spells the same words in different ways even in the course of only a few lines, and this when printed as it has been to preserve a similarity with the Manuscript, may frequently appear to the reader as errors of the press. There are also some omissions which both the writer of the Life and the Son and Grandson of JAMES THE SECOND have neglected to supply, and, when these have tended to perplex the sense of the Narrative, the Editor has been advised to supply the words, that appear to have been wanting, by printing them in Italics between crotchets; it seems also to have been the practice of the writer of the Life to use capitals in the beginning of any words on which he wished particular emphasis to be placed. The whole of the biography, if not begun before the death of JAMES, was probably written (and this is the prevailing opinion of those persons who have had access to the MSS.) during the first ten or fifteen years of the Eighteenth Century: the following passage, already marked by a Note, (Vol. 2. p. 195.) would fix the date, at least of the composition of that part of the Life, after the death of James and his Queen: “ Never Child had a greater resemblance of his Parents both in body and mind than his present Majesty, of the late King his Father and the Queen his Mother.”

If the leading object of JAMES, in continuing Memoirs of what had passed under his own eyes, were to form materials for his own Life at a subsequent period, the following Biographical Narrative might possibly have been begun under his direction and by Mr. Lewis Innes, to whom the private papers had been entrusted before the death of his Royal Master. After that event a large portion of The Manuscript, perhaps the third and fourth Tomes, which seem to have been composed much later than the former ones, were probably completed under the direction and eye of his own Son, the Chevalier St. George: Accordingly we find in * one of the Books of Warrants, Certificates, &c. an Order, dated Jan. 12, 1707, addressed “ to Our Trusty and Wellbeloved Lewis Jnese, to transport some of his late Majesty’s papers from the Archives of the Scots College to St. Germain’s to be inspected :

“ JAMES R.

“ Whereas by a speciall Warrant of the late King Our Royal Father of blessed memory, his Mat^{ies} Memoires and other papers written in his own hand are depositated in the Archives of our Scots Colledge of Paris there to be kept, And whercas none of the s^d papers are to be lent out from thence on any pretext whatsoever without our positive order or Warrant, We do hereby require and authorize you to transport for some months to our Court at S^t Germain’s so many of the fores^d Royal Papers as relate to the year 1678, and downwards, to be inspected and perused by such persons as We shall appoint for that effect, And afterwards to carry back and reponc them with all care and safety in the s^d Archives there to be kept conforme to the s^d Warrant of Our Royal Father. And for so doing this shall be your Warrant. Given at Our Court at S^t Germain’s the 12th day of January 1707. And in the 6th year of Our Reign.

By his Ma^{ties} Command,

CARYLL.”

Lord Hardwicke (in his State Papers Vol. 2. p. 304.) appears to have considered that a work like the present, in which The Memoirs of King JAMES could be given unmutilated by those who had the power over them, would be a very valuable addition to Historical Literature: “ It is perhaps,” says he, “ more to be wished than expected that King JAMES’s Memoirs might be given entire to the world by those who have the power over them; as it would be far more satisfactory to review them in their original state, than in such imperfect and hasty extracts as have hitherto been allowed to be taken. And to speak fairly, the prudential motives, which might formerly have rendered their publication improper, seem no longer to exist. A greater treasure of anecdotes for the perusal of an Englishman, one’s imagination can hardly form an idea of; and it would be very material to combine and compare the whole historical mass, as it came, at different times, from the pen of that exact and diligent Prince, whose application to business may justly be proposed as a pattern to those of his rank, though his Principles and his Judgment were erroneous, and exceptionable, in the highest degree.”

That the treasure of historical anecdote and information is great in these volumes, cannot be doubted: The commencement of CHARLES THE SECOND’S Secret Negotiations with France, is therein more fully given than by any historian that has yet appeared. The loss of the decisive fight at Marston Moor has usually been imputed to * Prince Rupert's impetuosity and rashness, but the compiler of the ensuing Life of JAMES THE SECOND, alludes (Vol. 1. p. 23.) to a positive Order sent by King CHARLES THE FIRST to that Prince, as the cause of his hazarding the action. At page 29 the striking fact is recorded, That of all the Parliamentary Officers introduced to THE DUKE OF YORK, when under the peculiar circumstances of calamity that attended the surrender of Oxford and the total depression of the Royal Cause, Cromwell was the only person who rendered to that Prince the homage of kneeling when presented: There occurred probably in those stormy and intriguing times more than one moment, in which Cromwell, before more daring views were opened to his ambition, might have been won over to the Royal Cause; as Sir John Reresby observes in the beginning of his Memoirs, Cromwell was doubtless the deepest dissembler on earth.—In page 290 of the same volume, the reader will find a curious passage, which proves, That the Right of Search, which Foreigners have thought fit to challenge as an Innovation exercised in an unprecedented manner by British Men of War, was practised in 1657, as an old acknowledged privilege, without being the subject of either resistance or remonstrance. The reader will also find, under the year 1650, in addition to the account in the Harleian Miscellany of the Actions that took place before Dunkirk, much interesting information (p. 334.) respecting that transaction.

* Mr. A. B. Lambert was so obliging as to favour the Editor with a List of some Stuart MSS. in the possession of John Benet, Esq., of Pyt House, a relation of his, amongst which is a MS. Life of Prince Rupert. Mr. Benet's ancestor was Secretary to Prince Rupert. Mr. Benet's Collection of Stuart MSS. and papers relative to these times, is extremely rich and extensive. The Editor also found some other Historical MSS. relative to the times which these volumes illustrate, in the Library of the Earls of Leicester, at Penshurst, which seemed not to have been noticed by Collins in his publication of the Sidney Papers; and were therefore recommended to be published.

It were endless to dwell on the valuable addition which His Royal Highness THE PRINCE REGENT has made to the history of this nation, by directing those Manuscripts to be published which form the substance of the following volumes. This Life of JAMES bears also a striking analogy with those events which have so recently convulsed and demoralised a considerable part of Europe: Few Princes, as Campbell observed, have struggled with greater Difficulties than King JAMES THE SECOND, and few ever sustained a greater load of trouble afterwards. Yet the Difficulties he had to struggle with have not always been sufficiently considered by Historians, nor does it appear, that the essential and lasting service which JAMES rendered to this Country, in compacting and as it were building up its Naval Power, has been sufficiently weighed: It is not generally known, that the Naval Regulations now in force are taken almost verbatim from those which he established, or that when lately the Board of Naval Revision wished to add to and improve the Naval Regulations, they sent for the Papers of Pepys, the Marine Secretary of JAMES, as being the best materials whence they could obtain the object they had in view. As Campbell frankly acknowledged, James *thoroughly understood the whole business of the Admiralty, and knew also the disorders which had crept into the whole aconomy of the Fleet, in the six years immediately preceding his Accession. This fact is amply corroborated by the honourable testimony of Mr. Secretary Pepys in his Memoirs; the excellent methods there recorded, by which JAMES regenerated the Naval Power, clearly shew how well he understood it in all its bearings. The following were the * Qualifications which during that Monarch's reign were required from every one, who occupied a place in any branch of his Naval Department:*

I. A Practiced Knowledge in every part of the Works and Methods of your Navy, both at the Board and in your Yards. The not discerning of which and the others that follow, (adds Mr. Pepys in addressing James the Second,) appears to have cost your Royal Brother and You within the fore-mentioned five years, above half a million.

II. A General Mastery in the business of Accounts, though more particularly those incident to the Affairs of Your Navy.

III. Vigour of Mind, join'd with approv'd Industry, Zeal, and Personal aptness for Labour.

IV. An entire Resignation of themselves and their whole time to this Your Service, without lyableness to Avocation from other Business or Pleasure.

* Pepys' Memoirs relating to the State of The Royal Navy of England, p. 45.

V. Lastly, Such Credit with your Majesty for Integrity and Loyalty, as may (with the former conditions) lead both Your Self and my Lord Treasurer, to an entire confidence of having all done that can be morally expected from them, in the Advancement of your Service, and the circumspect and orderly Dispensing and Improving of your Treasure.

And to the above judicious Qualifications, which cannot be too much attended to in the present day, may be subjoined what PEPYS termed, HIS THREE TRUTHS ESSENTIAL TO THE SEA ŒCONOMY OF GREAT BRITAIN, as corollaries from the premises :

1. That Integrity, and general (but unpracticed) Knowledge, are not alone sufficient to conduct and support a Navy, so as to prevent its Declension into a state little less unhappy than the worst that can befall it under the want of both.

2. That not much more (neither) is to be depended on, even from Experience alone and Integrity, unaccompanyd with Vigour of Application, Assiduity, Affection, Strictness of Discipline, and Method.

3. That it was a strenuous Conjunction of all these (and that Conjunction only) that within half the time, and less than half the charge it cost the Crown in the exposing it, had (at the very instant of its unfortunate LORD's Withdrawing from it) rais'd the NAVY OF ENGLAND from the lowest state of Impotence, to the most advanced step towards a lasting and solid Prospèrity, that (all circumstances considered) this Nation had ever seen it at.

AND yet not such, but that (even at this its Zenith) it both did and suffered sufficient to teach us, THAT THERE IS SOMETHING ABOVE BOTH THAT AND US THAT GOVERNS THE WORLD, TO WHICH (INCOMPREHENSIBLE) ALONE BE GLORY.

Such were the Principles and Maxims which JAMES THE SECOND established, whose interesting Commentaries on what had passed before him both as a Prince and a Sovereign, are now given in these Volumes to the Public through the liberal condescension of His Royal Highness THE PRINCE REGENT.

There yet remains to the Editor one duty to be performed, which it is very difficult to discharge: He might indeed be blamed, and with some degree of justice, if he attempted to thank, though he will ever gratefully remember, the countenance and assistance he has received from every individual. Yet is it his duty and pride to declare, that the progress of the work, though tedious and protracted, has been uniformly honoured by the interest which both Her Majesty the Queen, and His Royal Highness the Prince Regent have continued to take in the perusal of the sheets as they came from the press. The able assistance of Mr. Walter Scott came when the Editor least expected and most required it, like the cheering radiance of an autumnal evening after days of anxiety and labour. The Editor's thanks are also due to Colonel Johnes of Hafod, for the information he early transmitted to Carlton House; and the zealous friendship and literary talents of Dr. Bain demand some acknowledgement from one who has so much benefited by their exertion, and who in dating this Preface from the hospitable mansion in which the labours of the Editor were concluded, laments that he possesses no other means of acknowledging his obligations and of expressing his gratitude.

Heffleton, Dorsetshire.

* * It may be of service to some readers of the following Life to be reminded, that much valuable information, with many interesting anecdotes respecting the leading men in the Courts of CHARLES and JAMES THE SECOND, may be found in Mr. Walter Scott's Edition of Dryden, particularly in his notes to the Poem of Absalom and Achitophel, under which names the poet represented the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Shaftsbury. In the following lines Dryden delivered his sentiments respecting the DUKE OF YORK, whose exclusion as a Catholic, adds Mr. W. Scott, was warmly urged in the House of Commons :

“ His Brother, though oppressed with vulgar spite,
Yet dauntless, and secure of native right,
Of every Royal Virtue stands possest,
Still dear to all the bravest and the best :
His Courage foes, his friends his Truth proclaim,
His Loyalty the King, the world his Fame ;
His Mercy even the offending crowd will find,
For sure he comes of a forgiving * kind.”

CONTENTS

OF

VOLUME THE FIRST.

The Marginal Notes throughout the Life are given verbatim from the Original MS. — ORIG. MEM. and OR. MEM. on references to KING JAMES's ORIGINAL Memoirs noticed in the Preface, pag. 14.

TOME I. OF THE MS.

Oct. 1633—1642.

	Page
THE Queen, and Princesse Mary forced to leave London for Holland - - - - -	1
The Duke of York sent to St. James's with the Duke of Gloucester and the Princesse Elisabeth - - - - -	ib.
The Duke of York arrives at York, and is employed by Charles I. to endeavour to get possession of Hull - - -	2
Disloyalty of Sir John Hotham - - - - -	3
Is afterwards, with his Son, put to death by the Parliament -	5
Charles I. begins at York to raise an Army for his own Security -	6
Gallant Loyalty of Captain Straughan of H. M. S. Providence -	ib.
Charles I. having secured York sets up his Standard at Nottingham - - - - -	9
The Battle of Edge hill, near Keynton in Warwickshire, on Sunday Oct. 23. - - - - -	10
Gallant Action of The Lord Willoughby - - - - -	14
The Royal Standard retaken by Captain John Smith, a Brother of The Lord Carington - - - - -	17

	Page
The proposition of Prince Rupert to march to London, is not approved - - - - -	18
Charles I. when too late, marches in November from Oxford to London - - - - -	ib.

1643.

Prince Rupert takes Bristol in July - - -	20
The Siege of Gloucester fatal to the King's interests -	ib.

1644.

The Princess Henrietta born at Exeter in June, fifteen days after which her Mother is forced to fly for safety into France - - - - -	21
---	----

* * This event is thus noticed by the industrious Izacke in his Memorials of the City of Exeter, 1681. — “ The King in person coming to this city, being in pursuit of the Earl of Essex, . . . lodged here in Bedford House two days, and having defeated his enemies, returned hither again, and was pleased to bestow the dignity of Knighthood on the Mayor; Prince Charles attended his Father in all this march, and lodged here in the Dean's house. The Queen likewise resorted hither for safety, Bedford House was prepared in readiness for her reception, where during her abode, sc. 16 Junii, Her Majesty was delivered of a young Princess, who was baptized in the Cathedral Church here by Dr. Burnell Chancellour and a Canon residentiary of the said Church on Sunday 3 Julii then next following. In the body of the Church a Font was erected on purpose, under a rich Canopy of Estate, and Sir John Berkley, then Governour of the said City, the Lady Poulett, and the Lady Dalkeith (the said Princess's Governess) were her witnesses. . . . This City presented the King's Majesty with 500*l.* the Queen with 200*l.* and Prince Charles with 100*l.* more.” (Page 158.)

Charles I. marches out of Oxford in June - - -	ib.
---	-----

	Page
Prince Rupert receives a positive order from the King, to fight the Battle of Marston-Moor July 3. - - -	22
Consequence of the injudicious Order sent to Prince Rupert, and his obeying it too strictly - - -	23
Great oversights which occasioned the loss of the Battle of Newberry Oct. 27. - - - -	24

1645.

Fairfax besieges Oxford, May 22, with the new modelled Army of the Rebels - - - - -	26
The Battle of Naseby, June 14. — The last ever fought by Charles I. after which he retired to Oxford about the beginning of November, and therein passed the whole winter - - - - -	27

1646.

Oxford being blocked up, Charles I. goes thence disguised through the Enemy's quarters, to the Scotch Army, about the end of April - - - - -	ib.
Treaty of Oxford, June 20, which surrenders on the 24th to Fairfax - - - - -	28

* * * The King's Messages from Oxford during the years 1643 and 1644, are given at length in the folio edition of the Works of CHARLES I. the second edition of which was printed in 1687.

Cromwell is the only Officer belonging to the Parliament, who, on entering Oxford and visiting His Royal Highness, kneels and kisses the hand of the Duke of York - - -	29
The Duke of York being carried to London, is confined at St. James's with the Duke of Gloucester and the Princess Elizabeth - - - - -	ib.

	Page
Charles I. delivered up by the Marques of Argyle and the Party in Scotland to the Parliament, is brought prisoner to Holmeby	30

1647.

During the winter Mrs. Kilvert, Sister to the Bishop of Salisbury, endeavours to promote the Duke of York's escape	31
Another design for that purpose, formed by the Honourable Mr. George Howard, brother to the Earl of Suffolk, which succeeds	33

1648.

The Duke of York, disguised in Women's Cloaths, embarks in a barge with four oars at Lyon-key	35
His Royal Highness, after many adventures, arrives at Middleburg	38
The Rising in Kent, upon which all the Men of War in the Downs declare for the King	39
Gallant Loyalty of one Lindale, a Boatswain, who with the assistance of three Seamen brought off a whole Squadron of the King's Ships to Helvoetsluys	40
The Duke of York, until the arrival of his Brother, takes the command at Helvoetsluys of the Ships which had thus been taken from the Parliament	43
The Command of the King's Fleet conferred on Prince Rupert	44

1649.

The Duke of York, having remained eight months in Holland, begins his Journey to France, and is nobly entertained at the Abbey of St. Amand by the Monks	45
---	----

	Page
The Duke, soon after his arrival at Paris, hears of his Father's being put to death by the Republicans - - -	46
Charles II. arrives in France from Holland, and both pass the Summer at St. Germain's - - -	ib.
Expedition of that King, and the Duke, to Jersey -	47
Ill state of Affairs in Ireland, which induced the King not to go thither - - - - -	ib.

1650.

Charles II. returns again to France, and thence to Holland and Scotland - - - - -	48
The Duke of York in obedience to the King returns to Paris, and thence to Brussels, where he received an account of the death of his Sister the Princess Elizabeth - -	49
Death of the Prince of Orange, and birth of the succeeding Prince - - - - -	ib.

1651.

The Duke of York is reduced to great hardships, and to avoid the sight of the English Ambassadors at the Hague, where he had continued all the winter with his Sister, he goes to Breda - - - - -	50
He arrives at Paris in June, in consequence of a Letter from the King - - - - -	51
Goes to meet Charles II. at Magny, after the perils which he had experienced in escaping from the Battle of Worcester	52
Generous offer made to Charles II. by Cardinal de Retz -	ib.
Proposal of Marriage with Charles II. and the eldest daughter of the Duke of Orleans, and with the Duke of York and Mademoiselle de Longueville - - - - -	53

1652.

The Duke of York obtains leave to serve in the French King's Army as a Volunteer, under Marshal Turenne, against the Confederated Princes	- - - -	54
The difficulty which H. R. Highness experienced in procuring money sufficient for his equipment	- - -	ib.
He leaves Charles II. at St. Germain's, April 21, and passes through Paris to Charenton	- - - -	55
Joins the French King at Châtres, April 24	- -	56
The Duke's retrospect of the State of Affairs in France	-	ib.
Account of the Action at Blesneau, wherein M. de Turenne preserved both the Army and the Crown of France	-	59
The Prince of Condé leaves the Army of the Princes and goes to Paris	- - - - -	62
Famous Action of the Suburbs of Etampes	- -	64
Gallant conduct of M. Dumont, an Officer belonging to the Enemy	- - - - -	69
The Siege of Etampes	- - - - -	74
Daring action performed by the Regiment de Turenne	-	76
The Count de Schomberg, a Volunteer with the Duke, is wounded	- - - - -	78
Marshal Turenne obliged to raise the Siege of Etampes	-	81
He surprises the Duke of Lorraine	- -	82
Charles II. is present, and sends for the Duke of York to assist in his mediation with the Duke of Lorraine	-	83-87
The Duke and Lord Jermyn return	- - -	87
Charles II. in vain attempts to alter the determination which M. de Turenne had made respecting the conditions he had sent to the Duke of Lorraine	- - - -	88
The Duke of Lorraine at length signs the Treaty	- -	89
The Duke of Beaufort inflames the Parisians against Charles II.		90
Mareshall de la Ferté joins M. Turenne	- - -	91

M. de Turenne makes bridges over the Seyne, to attack the Army of the French Princes	- - - -	91
The Prince of Condé moves the main body of his Army from St. Cloud towards Charenton	- - - -	92
M. de Turenne attacks the Enemy's rear at the entry of the Fauabourg St. Denis	- - - -	93
The King, Cardinal, and all the Court, come to Charonne to see the Action of the Fauxbourg St. Antoine	- -	95
Remarkable incident concerning Mons. de Flamarin	-	102
Paris opens its gates to the Prince of Condé's Army	-	105
The King's Army march back to their baggage at La Chevrette		ib.
The Duke of York gallantly accompanies M. Turenne throughout all the dangers of the Action	- - -	106
Excellency both of the counsel and conduct of M. Turenne	-	107
The reasons which induced the Parisians to admit the Army of the French Princes	- - - -	ib.
Cowardice of the Duke of Orleans, and spirited conduct of his Daughter	- - - -	108
Suspicious of the Parisians respecting the Prince of Condé	-	109
The Spaniards prepare to march 25,000 men into France	-	110
M. de Turenne opposes the advice that had been given to the French King, and goes to the Court at St. Denis attended by the Duke of York	- - - -	111
The Spanish Army returns into Flanders	- -	114
The King of France's Army advances again towards Paris	-	ib.
Admirable Character of the Queen of France	-	ib.
Operations of M. Turenne from the beginning of August 1652		115
M. de Turenne disobeys the orders of his Court, and thus defeats the artifices of Mons. de Lorraine	-	116, 117
The King's Army in great straits at Villeneuve St. George	-	119
The Duke of York is the first person who discovers that the Enemy were intrenching	- - -	122

	Page
Expedient adopted by the King's Generals to preserve the
Foragers - - - - -	123
The Parisians begin to be weary of the War - - -	125
Considerable Skirmish that was brought on by some young
men of rank who had attended the Duke of Orleans from
Paris - - - - -	126
The Prince of Condé, being ill, retires to Paris - -	127
Memorable Action of Seguín, a Captain of Horse in Beauveau's
Regiment - - - - -	ib.
The Royal Army arrives at Corbeil, Oct. 5. - - -	128
And pass the Marne near Meaux, Oct. 11. - - -	132
Perplecity of the Enemy - - - - -	ib.
The Enemy having left Paris, M. de Turenne advises the
Court to go thither - - - - -	133
M. de Turenne returns to the Army, and marches after the
Enemy - - - - -	135
The Duke of York accompanies him - - - - -	136
They march to relieve Barleduc - - - - -	137
Description of the Enemy's post before it - - -	138
Strange and dangerous caprice of M. Fauge a Lieutenant
General - - - - -	139
The Royal Army after the surrender of Barleduc advance
from St. Dizier, and thence towards the Enemy - -	140
Marshal de la Ferté offended with M. de Turenne - -	141
Violent conduct of the former to his own men - -	142
M. de Turenne besieges Ligny and Barleduc - -	143
M. de la Ferté afraid to trust to either his own judgment, or
that of M. de Turenne, loses an opportunity of defeating
the Prince of Condé - - - - -	147
Barleduc surrenders about the middle of December -	149
A remark which the Duke of York made at that Siege -	150
An Irish regiment of foot, made prisoners at Barleduc, offer
their services to the Duke of York - - - - -	ib.

	Page
Severe march of the Army towards St. Menehou during the winter - - - - -	152

1653.

The Cardinal abandons the thought of besieging St. Menehou, and the Army marches towards Rhetel - - -	153
Account of what passed in the Out-quarters where the Duke of York was, at the Siege of Château-Porcien in January -	154
Hardships endured by the Soldiers - - -	155
Their painful march to retake Vervins - - -	156
Narrow escape of the Duke of York from being made prisoner - - - - -	ib.
Vervins surrenders, Jan. 28. - - - - -	157
The Duke of York with the Cardinal and all the Generals returns to Paris, Feb. 3. where he meets his Brother the Duke of Gloucester, and his Cousin Prince Rupert -	ib.

THE DUKE OF YORK'S SECOND CAMPAIGN UNDER M. DE TURENNE.

They besiege Rhetel - - - - -	159
Which having surrendered, July 9, they march towards Guise	160
Debates in Council before the King and Cardinal Mazarin -	161
M. de Turenne refutes the opinions which had been advanced and gives his own - - - - -	162
The Spaniards march into the French Dominions, August 1.	163
The French Army is surprised by the Spaniards - - -	166
Conduct of M. de Turenne on that occasion, when returning from Peronne - - - - -	ib.
The whole Spanish Army march up in order of Battle towards the French - - - - -	169
The two Armies remain three days in presence of each other	170

	Page
Gallant attempt of a Lieutenant of Horse to take an Officer of rank from the very Camp of the Enemy - -	171
The diligent march of M. de Turenne prevents the Enemy from besieging Guise - - - - -	173
The able designs of M. de Turenne frustrated by M. de Castlenau—reflections of the Duke of York on that occasion -	175
The French march to Mousson—description of its fortifications - - - - -	177
Account of the Siege - - - - -	178
The Duke in danger of being blown up - - -	179
M. de Turenne passes the night with the Regiment of Guards in the trenches - - - - -	ib.
The Duke of York's account of the danger in which he had again been placed - - - - -	182
H. R. Highness's relation of the methods which the French employed to carry on a Siege - - -	187
Fatal anecdote of a Captain in a French regiment -	ib.
The Duke of York disappointed in his wish to be present during the Siege of St. Menchou, attends Charles II. on his way towards Germany, as far as Chantilly - -	191

1654.

THE DUKE OF YORK'S THIRD CAMPAIGN IN FRANCE.

The Siege of Arras by the Spaniards July 3. - -	192
The Duke joins the French Army in July near Peronne, and serves under M. de Turenne with the rank of Lieutenant-General - - - - -	193
Military observations of the Duke, and his description of the post of Mouchy-le-Preux - - - - -	194
Extraordinary accident which befel an entire Regiment of Horse belonging to the Enemy, which was blown up from carrying bags of powder - - - - -	196

	Page
Military Operations - - - -	198. 200
The Duke's account of the attack which his squadron sustained from a party of the Enemy - - - -	200
M. de Turenne is joined by M. d'Hocquincourt and M. de la Ferté - - - -	202
The Duke's observations on the manner in which M. de Turenne was thought to have exposed his Troops - -	205
Disinterested conduct of Turenne opposed by the Duke to the selfish motives of the other French Officers - -	207
The wise and repeated Instructions given by M. de Turenne to his Officers previous to the attack of the Enemy's Lines before Arras - - - -	210
The Guides, mistaking their way in the night, lead M. de Turenne to the very Lines of the Enemy - -	215
The time appointed was an hour before day, August 25. — Order of the march - - - -	216
The Duke of York's account of the order of Battle, with the several Posts of the General Officers - - -	217
Beautiful appearance of the French troops, when during the night they suddenly displayed their lighted matches and marched towards the Enemy's Lines - - -	219
The Duke's Squadron much exposed - - -	221
He passes along the Line and enters at the head of the Regiment of Turenne - - - -	222
The Duke's account of M. de Turenne's great foresight and conduct - - - -	226
Bravery of the Prince of Condé - - -	227
Exploits of M. d'Hocquincourt - - -	228
Dying admonition of the Baron de Briolle to his Son, never to take up arms against his Sovereign - -	232
The Duke of York sent to convoy the French Court to Arras	233
M. de Turenne adopts a new mode of employing his Lieutenant Generals - - - -	234

	Page
Military remarks of the Duke of York - - -	235
His Royal Highness's description of M. de Turenne's order of march back towards Quesnoy - - -	238
The Campaign being over, the Duke returns to the French Court at Paris - - - -	243

1655.

THE DUKE'S FOURTH AND LAST CAMPAIGN IN FRANCE.

It opens with the Siege of Landrecy - - -	245
Causes of the Duke's absence from that Siege - -	ib.
H. R. Highness joins the Army a day or two before the surrender of Landrecy - - - -	246
The King of France and Cardinal Mazarin join the Army	ib.
The Duke of York assists in the Council that was held in the King's presence - - - -	247
Great oversight of M. de Castelneau, who had been sent by M. Turenne to attack the Enemy on the flank - -	250
The Duke's account of what produced a more than ordinary sharpness of conduct between M. de Turenne and the Prince of Condé - - - -	252—257
Condé surrendered to the French, August 19. - -	254
M. de Bussy-Rabutin falls into an ambuscade - -	ib.
St. Guislain surrenders, August 25. - - -	259
Particular account of the great forage at St. Guislain, which was commanded by the Duke of York - -	260
The French army quit the enemy's country, and march to Pommereüil near Pont de Haisne - - -	262
The Duke of York commands the French army at the time when peace was concluded between France and Cromwell -	264
Apologies made to the Duke by the Queen Mother of France and the Cardinal respecting the treaty by which H. R. H. was banished from that Country - - -	265

	Page
The Duke arrives at Paris, from his fourth and last Campaign in France, Nov. 23.	265
Cromwell consents to H. R. Highness's stay in France	266

1656.

The Princess of Orange comes in February to Paris to see her Mother and Brother	267
The Irish Colonels offer their services to the Duke	ib.
Noble conduct of Colonel Richard Grace, as detailed by the Duke in his Memoirs	268
H. R. Highness, at the instance of M. de Turenne, writes to Charles II. to be allowed to stay and serve in France	270
The King refuses, and commands him to repair into Flanders	271
False reports of the Duke credited by Charles II. and his Ministers	272
The Duke retraces what had passed respecting his Brother on his coming into France after his miraculous escape from the battle of Worcester	273
Jealousy which Charles II. entertained of Sir J. Berkley	276
The Duke leaves Paris for his Brother's Court, and meets with Lockart, Cromwell's ambassador, at Clermont	277
Arrives at Bruges and is much hurt at the treatment which Sir J. Berkley receives	279
In obedience to the commands of Charles II. the Duke enters into the Spanish Service, contrary to the wishes of his friends in France	281
The Princess of Orange comes from Paris to Bruges in November, and sides with the Duke of York	282
The Earl of Bristol's disrespectful answer to the Duke in the King's Presence Chamber	283
The King joins with the Earl of Bristol in his opinion	ib.
The Duke of York's modest reply to the Earl of Bristol	285

He resolves to withdraw from his enemies, and to retire privately into Holland	- - - -	286
---	---------	-----

1657.

Early in January the Duke leaves Bruges	- -	288
Ancient custom then in use of searching any stranger's ships, to see if they had English Seamen on board	- -	290
The Duke continues his journey to Utrecht, and thence writes to Charles II.	- - - -	ib.
Goes with his host Mr. Vandernatt to see a wedding at Amsterdam	- - - - -	291
Receives Letters from his Brother by Lord Ormonde, and returns to Bruges	- - - - -	292
Sir John Berkley raised to the Peerage at the request of the Duke of York	- - - - -	293
The Earl of Bristol loses his interest with the Spanish Ministers	- - - - -	ib.
A particular account given by the Duke of York of the Earl of Bristol's conduct in France	- - -	294

THE DUKE'S FIFTH CAMPAIGN, AND THE FIRST HE SERVED IN THE SPANISH ARMY	- -	297
---	-----	-----

1657—continued.

Two thousand English, Scotch, and Irish serve under the Duke of York in Flanders	- - - -	297
Extravagant proposals of the Earl of Bristol to the Spaniards	- - - - -	298
Brave action of the Prince of Condé in relieving Cambray besieged by M. de Turenne	- - - -	299
Military operations of the Spaniards, with the Duke of York's remarks on them	- - - -	300
The Convoy of the French escape, in consequence of the afternoon's Siesta of the Spanish Commanders	- -	306

	Page
The Duke converses with some of the French officers who came out of their lines for that purpose - -	308
Reynolds, who commanded the English sent by Cromwell, offers to M. de Turenne, if allowed 2000 horse, to fall with his English 6000 infantry upon the whole Spanish army - - - - -	309
Siege of Ardres - - - - -	ib.
Particular instance in which the Spaniards suffered themselves to be deluded - - - - -	310
The Duke's view of the Spanish way of living; his Characters both of Don John and the Marquis de Caracena	311
Further account of the siege of Ardres, August 25. -	312
Don John and the Marquis de Caracena sit in their coaches out of the range of shot, to view the attacks - -	314
Uncomfortable march of the Spaniards on withdrawing from the Siege of Ardres - - - - -	315
Military operations of the Spaniards, who repass the Colne	316
The French besiege Mardyke - - - - -	317
The Duke of York, with only a few attendants, being about cannon-shot from Dunkirk, advances towards the French army on its march towards Mardyke, and converses with its officers - - - - -	319
Jealousy of the Spaniards in consequence - -	ib.
The French allowed to forage unmolested by the Spaniards, who waited for orders from Dunkirk - - -	321
The Fort of Mardyke delivered to the French, and put into the hands of the English pursuant to Treaty - -	322
Charles II. comes to the Spanish army at Dunkirk -	ib.
Don John advances towards Mardyke during the night and carries Charles II. with him; the Spaniards obliged to march by torch-light, and thus give notice of their approach - - - - -	323

	Page
The Spaniards march back again in good order at day-light	324
An attempt made by the Spaniards on some small English
Frigates in the Splinter - - - -	325
Reynolds' interview with the Duke of York - -	327
Cromwell offended at it — Shipwreck of Reynolds - -	328

1658.

The Duke returns to Bruxelles, Jan. 1. - - -	329
Goes to Breda, and with his Sister and the Duke of
Gloucester returns to visit Charles II. at Antwerp -	330
Reports of some Expedition to be undertaken against
England - - - - -	ib.
The Earl of Bristol endeavours to ingratiate himself with
the Prince of Condé; that Earl's conversation with the
Duke of York - - - - -	331
The Snare that was laid by Lord Bristol for the Duke of
York - - - - -	332
Charles II. calls the Duke and Lord Bristol into the Chan-
cellor's closet, and considers Lord Bristol's proposal -	333
Preparations at Bruxelles for the Duke's last Campaign -	334
Charles II. presses the Spaniards to recruit Dunkirk with a
strong garrison - - - - -	ib.
The Duke's remark on the Spanish mode of fortifying rivers	336
Dunkirk besieged by the French - - -	337
Intrigues of Mareshall d'Hocquincourt, who joins the
Spanish army - - - - -	338
The Spaniards resolve to march their army, June 13th, to
the sand-hills before Dunkirk, as near the enemies lines
as they could - - - - -	ib.
The Duke's detailed account of what had passed at the
Spanish council of war - - - - -	339
Death of M. d' Hocquincourt, who is shot - -	341

	Page
The Spaniards return to their camp, and the next day move to the sand-hills, but take no measures to secure themselves - - - - -	342, 343
The French draw out of their lines, June 14th, at five in the morning - - - - -	343
The Duke is the first General who, coming to the outmost Sentries, sees the whole French army advancing -	ib.
Don John is unwilling to believe it - - -	344
The manner in which the Spanish army was at length drawn up - - - - -	345
Order of battle of the French army - - -	346
The Duke charges at the head of his own Guards, and all who were in the front of his own troop narrowly escape ; he himself receives a shot in his armour - -	349
The Duke of York at the head of his forty Guards charges the enemy a second time, and does great execution -	351
Gallant resistance of Lockart's regiment - - -	ib.
Bravery of the Duke of Gloucester - - -	ib.
The Duke's account of the desperate situation from which he at length extricates himself, and then goes to inspect the left wing - - - - -	354, 355
The gallant behaviour of Charles II.'s regiment - - -	357
Generous conduct of a French Lieutenant-General towards the Duke of York - - - - -	360
M. de Turenne marches back into his lines, and continues the siege of Dunkirk, which soon surrenders - -	361
The Spaniards, at the instigation of the Duke of York, at last resolve to divide their army - - -	362
The Duke remains Chief Commander at Nieuport -	365
The Prince de Ligny defeated by M. de Turenne - -	366
The Duke marches to Bruges - - - -	367
The Duke, in September, receives an account of Cromwell's death - - - - -	ib.

1659.

Consequences of that event	-	-	-	-	369
The Select Knot	-	-	-	-	370
Treachery of Sir R. Willis	-	-	-	-	ib.
The rising in England being deferred, the Duke goes to visit his Sister near the Hague	-	-	-	-	371
And thence proceeds to Boulogne to provide a vessel	-	-	-	-	372
Danger of the King and the Duke	-	-	-	-	374
The Duke narrowly escapes being seized at Calais	-	-	-	-	ib.
Is again alarmed in his lodgings at midnight	-	-	-	-	375
His Royal Highness goes privately to consult with M. de Turenne at Amiens	-	-	-	-	376
Generosity of that great Officer towards the Duke	-	-	-	-	377
Advises him, in consequence of Sir G. Booth's defeat by Lambert, to return to Flanders	-	-	-	-	378
Charles II. despairing of any success in England, presses the Cardinal for leave to remain with his Mother, which is refused, whereupon he returned to Bruxelles	-	-	-	-	380

1660.

All hopes concerning England being reduced to the lowest ebb, the Duke accepts the offer of commanding in Spain against Portugal, and also becomes their High Admiral	-	-	-	-	381
Unexpected changes in England, so that Charles II. was almost in his own Country before those abroad would believe there had been any revolution	-	-	-	-	ib.
Distrust which Charles II. entertained of the Spaniards	-	-	-	-	382
He embarks on board one of his ships in the Fleet commanded by General Montague, and lands with his two Brothers, the Duke of York and the Duke of Gloucester, at Dover	-	-	-	-	ib.

TOME II. OF THE MS.

1660—continued.

	Page
Joy which prevailed in England at the Restoration — the Secretary briefly retraces past events - - -	385
Deaths of the Duke of Gloucester and the Princess of Orange - - - - -	386
Candid remarks by the Secretary on the Duke of York's Marriage with the Lord Chancellor Hyde's Daughter -	387

1661.

Venner's Insurrection - - - - -	388
Advice of the good Lord Hawly to Charles II. "That the better he was guarded, the more his Enemies would fear him, and his Friends love him," contrasted with the opposite, and as it would appear less precaution, of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Southampton - -	391
Characters of some of the chief Ministers of Charles II. -	392
The Lord Chancellor blamed for not obtaining a Repeal of Statutes injurious to the Crown, which had been enacted by the Long Parliament - - - -	393

1662.

Marriage of the King with the Infanta of Portugal, negotiated and advised by the Chancellor, to whom it proved injurious - - - - -	ib.
Bradford's Conspiracy - - - - -	396
Eulogium on Lord Falmouth - - - - -	397

Lord Arlington first brought into favour by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Bristol, neither of whom were friends to Lord Falmouth	- - - - -	398
Sir William Coventry and the Duke of Buckingham become enemies of the Chancellor	- - - - -	ib.

1663.

The steps that were taken by the Duke, as Lord High Admiral, to restore the British Navy and Commerce	-	399
--	---	-----

1664.

The several Causes of the first Dutch War	- -	401
The Fleet that had been fitted out under Prince Rupert against Opdam is reinforced, and the command of it given to the Duke of York, who joins it at Portsmouth in November — His proceedings	- - - -	403
Returns with Prince Rupert to Whitehall in December	-	404

1665.

The Parliament meets, Nov. 24; and the first Dutch war is proclaimed, March 4.	- - - -	ib.
On the 23d of March the Duke goes down to Gunfleet to resume the command	- - - -	ib.
Division of the English Fleet consisting of 98 men of war, with an account of its several Commanders	- -	405
The great Sea-fight, June 3, with the Duke's conduct and danger therein	- - - -	408
Opdam blown up by a shot from the Duke's ship	-	413
A groom of the bed-chamber, wishing to keep the Duke out of danger during the night, issues a feigned Order	-	415
The Dutch are chased by the Duke of York to the very mouth of the Texel	- - - -	417

Two English Scouts, some of the best fourth rates, attack two Dutch ships of 40 guns, and take them	- -	419
In obedience to the King's commands, the Duke, accompanied by Prince Rupert, leaves the Fleet under the care of the Earl of Sandwich	- - - -	420
The Duke's anxiety to continue at sea is opposed by Charles II.		ib.
The Plague in London	- - - -	421
The Duke is sent by the King to York, to watch the discontent in the North	- - - -	ib.
The Parliament meets at Oxford in the autumn, and votes 120,000l. to the Duke for his bravery and conduct	-	422
The Duke is at last made acquainted with the manner, in which a groom of his bed-chamber had interfered with his Orders at sea	- - - -	ib.

1666.

The French join in the war with the Dutch against the English	- - - -	423
Account of the British Fleet before it put to sea, and of the Naval Operations afterwards	-	423, 424
The Parliament meets, and attacks the Papists	- -	424
Fire in London, Sept. 2.	- - - -	ib.
Bad policy of Charles II. in reducing his Naval Force, which was opposed by the Duke of York	- -	425

1667.

The following Summer the Dutch come out with their Fleet, and, passing the Nore, go up the river Medway	-	ib.
The Parliament meets, Oct. 10; the disaffected party, encouraged by the ill success at Sea, appears to be very turbulent and bold	- - - -	426

	Page
The Earl of Northumberland's threatening conversation with the Duke at St. James's, respecting the Chancellor, and the disbanding of the Troops - - -	426
The Lord Chancellor Clarendon is removed—The Secretary's remarks on what had passed respecting that event -	427, 429
The Seals are given to Sir Orlando Bridgman, as Lord Keeper - - - - -	429
The House of Commons vote an Address to Charles II. to dismiss all Catholicks from his service - -	ib.
Sir W. Coventry becomes a leading enemy of the late Chancellor, and takes the lead in his Impeachment -	431
Account of the Presbyterian party which then existed in both Houses of Parliament - - - -	ib.
Lord Clarendon's prudence and integrity in rejecting the offer made him by the Presbyterians - - -	ib.
He retires into France—His Character - - -	432

* * Pennant, in his Account of London, (page 123.) thus answers one of the many Calumnies that prevailed against this accomplished Statesman: "The virtuous Chancellor, the Earl of Clarendon, had a house facing the upper end of St. James's-street, on the site of the present Grafton-street. It was built by himself, with the stones intended for the rebuilding of St. Paul's. He purchased the materials; but a Nation, soured with an unsuccessful war, with fire and with pestilence, imputed every thing as a crime to this great and envied Character: his enemies called it Dunkirk House, calumniating him with having built it with the money arising from the sale of that Town, which had just before been given up to the French, for a large sum, by his master."

1668.

The Ministers disagree amongst themselves, but unite in their endeavours to separate the Duke from the King -	433
--	-----

The Duke of York votes against the banishment of Lord Clarendon — attempts in consequence made to prejudice the King against his Royal Highness, which are favoured by the King - - - - -	434
All the late Chancellor's friends are removed, and the adherents of Buckingham and Arlington are preferred -	ib.
The Duke of Ormonde removed from the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, which is given to Lord Roberts - -	435
Sir Thomas Osburn and Sir Thomas Littleton made Treasurers of the Navy, without acquainting the Duke of York -	436
The good example which the Duke gave on that occasion to others of the King's Subjects - - -	ib.
Remarkable expressions of Charles II. after his late conduct to his Brother, respecting his confidence in the Duke of York - - - - -	437
The mind of the Duke of Monmouth was poisoned at this time towards the Duke - - - -	ib.
The project of the King's being divorced was a snare laid by the Court Party for the Duke - - -	438
The Duke of York cautions the King against the Commonwealth Party that still prevailed - - -	ib.
Lord Rosse's Divorce brought forward, as a precedent for the King's - - - - -	439
The King's former kindness for his Brother at length returns	440

1669.

The Duke of York's inclination to become a member of the Church of Rome — His Interview with Father Simons, a Jesuit - - - - -	440, 441
The King is of the same mind, and chuses the 25th of January (the Conversion of St. Paul) to hold a private meeting on that subject, with the Lords Arundel, Arlington and Clifford, in the Duke's closet - - -	441

Account of what passed on that fatal day to JAMES - 442, 443

* * It is singular that Charles II. should not on that occasion have remembered, what may be called the dying Injunction of his Father, " IN THIS (the Church of England) I CHARGE YOU TO PERSEVERE." (See in Appendix, Charles I. Advice to his Son).

The treaty with the French King, who engages to give two hundred thousand pounds a year, to enable Charles II. to overturn the Protestant Religion, and join with France in making war on Holland - - - - 443

The Duke of Buckingham endeavours to restore his interest with the King, by means of the Dutchess of Orleans - 444

Lord Arlington is informed of the Secret Treaty by the Duke of York, who had first received the intelligence from Sir Elis Leighton - - - - ib.

Sir Thomas Osburn's and Sir Thomas Littleton's accusations against the Commissioners of the Navy, heard and controverted before the Duke of York - - - - 445

Death of the Queen Mother, youngest daughter of Henry IV. of France, at Colombe near Paris - - - - ib.

* * The body of the Queen, HENRIETTA MARIA, was conveyed to the Monastery of Chaliot, and a magnificent Mausoleum in memory of her, was afterwards built by her Nephew, Louis XIV., in the Abbey Church of St. Dennis.

The Duke regulates, with the French Ambassador, the salutes at sea in the Mediterranean between the British and French ships - - - - 446 1670.

Death of General the Duke of Albemarle - - - - ib.

The Coldstream given to Lord Craven, and made a second regiment of Guards; and the late General's troop of Guards is called the Queen's Troop - - - - 447

	Page
The King's only Sister, MADAME, DUTCHESS OF OR- LEANS, comes to England in May - - -	448
In consequence of her Royal Highness's interview with the King, War with the Dutch is resolved on - - -	449
The Duke's reasons against beginning with the Dutch War, which are overruled - - -	450
The Duke of Buckingham is restored, by MADAME, to His Majesty's favour, and reconciled with Lord Arlington -	451

1671.

The Duchess of York dies a Catholick, March 31. -	452
The Duke is recommended by the King to marry the Princess of Inspruck - - - -	453

1672.

State of Politics at the beginning of this year - -	454
The Cabal — The Duke alone opposes the Embargo as being injurious to Trade - - -	454, 455
Exertions of the Duke in fitting out the Fleet against the Dutch - - - -	455
Sir R. Holmes sent with a Squadron to intercept the Dutch Smyrna Fleet - - - -	456
The Second Dutch War proclaimed — the Duke sails from the Nore - - - -	457
Account of the British Fleet, and the manner in which it was officered - - - -	458
Transactions of the Fleet - - -	459—465
Prudent and brief Orders that were issued by the Duke of York before the Action - - -	465
Particulars of the Earl of Sandwich's Engagement with Van Ghent and Captain Brakell - - -	467

	Page
The Duke's Ship being quite disabled, he goes on board the London, Sir E. Spragge, after being nearly an hour in his boat - - - - -	470
Retrospect of some remarkable instances of British Valour on the 28th of May - - - - -	472
Account of what passed on the 29th of May -	475—477
Towards the end of June, the King comes to the Nore, with some of his Ministers, to consult with the Duke of York	478
The Duke puts to sea again, and cruises between the Vly and the Texel, to watch for the Dutch East India Fleet	479
The King again visits the Duke at the Nore, accompanied by Prince Rupert and the Earl of Shaftsbury -	480
The Duke, in opposition to Prince Rupert and the Earl of Shaftsbury, strongly recommends that the Fleet should not go out any more that year, to which the King consents -	ib.
Soon after the Duke's return to Court, Lord Shaftsbury is made Lord Chancellor - - - - -	481
The Lord Clifford made Lord Treasurer at the recommendation of the Duke of York - - - - -	482
Charles II., after what had passed in 1669, in vain attempts to persuade the Duke of York to receive the Sacrament with him at Christmas, according to the Church of England - - - - -	ib.

1673.

The Party hostile to the Duke of York procure, March 29th, the Test, owing to which he became incapable of holding any Employment, Civil or Military - - - - -	483
Prince Rupert in consequence commands the Fleet during the Summer - - - - -	ib.
Lord Clifford, incapable as a Roman Catholick of being Lord Treasurer, retires from that situation June 19th,

which is then given to Sir T. Osborne, created Earl of Danby, at the recommendation of the Duke and Lord Clifford	- - - - -	484
The Earl of Peterborow sent first to the Court of Neubourgh, and afterwards to Modena, to find a Consort for the Duke	-	ib.
Warm Debate in the Commons respecting the Duke of York's marrying a Roman Catholick	- - - - -	485
The Princess of Modena lands at Dover November 21	-	486
The real causes of the Duke's Unpopularity stated	- -	487
The Duke's reply to his pretended friends, who had advised him to return into the country, from all publick business	-	ib.
The Great Seal taken from Lord Shaftsbury, November 9th, and given to Sir Heneage Finch, with the title of Lord Keeper	- - - - -	488
Character of the Earl of Shaftsbury	- - -	ib.

1674.

Peace concluded with the Dutch, Feb. 9.	- - -	489
The Party hostile to the Duke introduce a second Test — the Duke excepted by a majority only of two votes	- -	490
The various means stated that were employed to exclude the Duke of York from the Succession	- - -	ib.
Account of the Duke of Monmouth, and his Mother	-	491—498

1675.

The Lords Danby and Lauderdale, in January, have an interview with the Duke, respecting the Laws being put in execution against all Dissenters and Roman Catholicks	-	499
The Ministers endeavour, in order to pacify the Parliament, to marry the Duke's eldest daughter with the Prince of Orange	- - - - -	500

What passed on that occasion between Charles II. and the Duke of York	- - - - -	501
--	-----------	-----

1676.

Conversation between the Duke and the Bishop of London, Dr. Compton, respecting the Princess Mary's being confirmed	- - - - -	502
The Prince of Orange sends Mons. de Bentinck to England		503
Lord Shaftsbury's project to dissolve the Parliament	-	504
Excuses that were made by the Party, to disavow the Clause respecting the Parliament having power to alter the Succession	- - - - -	505
Proceedings in the House of Lords	- - -	ib.
The Duke of Ormonde is restored to the Lieutenancy of Ireland	- - - - -	507
The arrival of the Prince of Orange in England	-	508
His interview with the Duke of York	- - -	ib.
The King in Council, Oct. 22, gives his assent to the Marriage of the Prince of Orange with the Princess Mary	- - - - -	509
Design of the Prince of Orange to engage Charles II. in a war with France	- - - - -	510
Lord Duras sent to France with a Plan of the Peace adapted to offend that Court, and promote the above design	-	ib.

1678.

The United Provinces make a separate Peace with France — Conduct of the Prince of Orange when he knew the Peace was signed	- - - - -	511
The House of Commons is more jealous of the power of Charles II. than of that of France	- - -	512

	Page
Cabals of the Duke of Monmouth to remove the Duke of York from Court - - - - -	512
Generous conduct of the Duke of York to the Lord Treasurer -	513
Oates's Plot - - - - -	514
The Duke's own account of it, extracted from the seventh volume of His Private Memoirs - -	515—519
The design of this Plot was to injure the Duke of York -	522
Mortification which the Duke experienced, respecting the Priests who attended on the Dutchess - -	523
The Earl of Shaftsbury moves in the House, Nov. 2, "That the Duke might be removed from all Councils and Publick Affaires" - - - - -	524
The King gives positive orders to his friends, to oppose any such motion, and then when the stream began to set violently against his Brother, he deserts the Duke -	ib.
Yet afterwards, when the Succession was in danger, the King again espouses his Brother's cause - - -	525
The Court Party, Nov. 30, carry their proviso to exempt the Duke from the penalty of the Act - - -	526
The insidious manner in which the death of Sir Edmond Bury Godfrey was managed by the Opposition - - -	ib.
Bedloe's Information - - - - -	527
The Queen is accused of an intention to poison the King -	529
The information which the Duke gave to the King respecting the lurking designs of their Enemies; from the seventh volume of his Private Memoirs - - -	530
Projected ruin of the Lord Treasurer - - -	531
Colman condemned and executed - - -	533

1679.

Others condemned, and several Noblemen impeached -	534
---	-----

The Parliament dissolved, Jan. 24, which had sat for 17 years	- - - - -	534
Recantation of one of the Conspirators, named Prance	-	535
Green, Bary, and Hill condemned for the death of Sir Edmond Bury Godfrey	- - - -	ib.
The Jesuits Whitebread and Fenwick are condemned and hanged	- - - - -	536
The Duke lays open his situation to the King	- -	ib.
The Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of Winchester request the Duke to return to the Protestant Church — The Duke's reply and letter to the Archbishop	-	537—540
The interview which afterwards took place between Charles II. and his Brother; extracted from the eighth volume of the Duke's Private Memoirs	- - - -	540
The King's Letter to the Duke, Feb. 28, on his leaving England, written at His Royal Highness's request	-	541
His Daughter the PRINCESS ANNE is not permitted to accompany her Father	- - - -	542
The Parliament meets, March 6, — The King's Speech	-	ib.
The Lord Treasurer Danby having surrendered himself, April 15, is sent to the Tower and impeached — The Duke of York's reflections on his Character; extracted from the eighth volume of his Private Memoirs	- -	544
The account of a threatened French Invasion, reported by Lady Shaftsbury's butler, alarms the Nation and the Parliament	- - - - -	546
Charles II. again apprehensive lest the Succession should be attacked, resolves to support the Duke of York	-	547
Parliamentary debates against the Duke — The King, April 30, offers "to agree to any Law they could devise for the security of Religion, provided the descent in the right Line were not defeated"	- - -	548

	Page
The replies of the Duke's Friends - - -	549
The Commons vote, May 15, to exclude the Duke from inheriting the Crown - - -	550
The sentiments of the King on that occasion, as conveyed in his Private Letters to the Duke - - -	ib.
The Duke's private Letter to the King - - -	551
The King, after balancing between his regard for the Duke, and his love of the Duke of Monmouth, prorogues the Parliament, and delivers an animated and catemporary Speech, May 27 - - -	554
The Duke returns his thanks to the King and presses to be allowed to return, that he may again expose his life in the King's service - - -	ib.
The Duke's friends exhort him to be cautious and less open in his conduct - - -	555
Irresolution of the King - - -	556
The Lords Essex, Halifax, Sunderland, and the Dutchess of Portsmouth, were the specious friends, in favour with the King, whom the Duke dreaded most - -	ib.
The King's private Letter to the Duke, in which he declares, that the temper of the people would not admit of his return - - -	557
A new Council is formed, with Lord Shaftsbury at the head of it - - -	558
An Insurrection in Scotland — Assassination of the Bishop of St. Andrews — The Duke of Monmouth is sent to quell it - - -	559
Substance of the Duke's private letters on that occasion -	ib.
The Duke's friends again press him to change his Religion -	560
Severe treatment of the Duke's friends, the Queen and H. R. Highness are accused of being in the Plot -	561
The King's reasons for not suffering the Duke to return -	562

	Page
The Duke answers the objections that had been made to his recal - - - - -	563
LITTLE SINCERITY, a cant word with Charles II. and his Brother for Lord Shaftsbury - - -	ib.
Secret Treaty with the French Ambassador to relieve the King's pecuniary necessities - - - -	564
The King is taken ill at Windsor, August 22. — The Duke is allowed to return, but is ordered to make it appear as if proceeding from his own determination - - -	565
Surprise and vexation of the Duke of Monmouth at the return of the Duke of York - - - -	566
The Duke of York is informed by Lords Sunderland, Essex, Halifax, &c. that he must again leave the country, and that the King would send away the Duke of Monmouth -	567
Proposition of the Ministers to the Duke, to join with them against the Duke of Lauderdale - - -	569
The Duke's spirit was not yet broke by his adversities — His firm refusal and manly reply - - - -	570
Violent conduct of the Duke of Monmouth when informed of the King's determination respecting him - - -	ib.
Proposition of Mr. Secretary Coventry, that the Duke of York might be sent to Scotland, rather than abroad -	571
The Duke returns to Bruxelles, Sept. 25, and, following the methods that had been agreed upon, comes suddenly back to London - - - - -	573
But is sent after all to Scotland, Oct. 27 - - -	574
And is obliged to leave the PRINCESSES ANNE and ISABELLA at St. James's - - - -	ib.
Resolution and attachment of the amiable DUTCHESS OF YORK	ib.
The Duke's argument with the Lord Montrosse against the necessity of taking the Oath of Allegiance, on sitting in Council in Scotland - - - - -	576

	Page
Arrives at Edinburgh Dec. 4. — Meets with letters from the King and the Duke of Lauderdale, respecting the necessity of taking the Oath - - - -	577
The Duke of Monmouth returns, without permission, from Holland - - - - -	578
The King orders him immediately to leave the Kingdom, which he disobeys - - - - -	ib.
The King takes from him all his Employments - - -	579
The Duke of York preserves a judicious neutrality in Scotland - - - - -	580
Parliamentary proceedings condensed from the Stuart Letters - - - - -	581
The King's letter to the Duke not to return immediately — II. R. Highness is much hurt at the severities that were reported to have been exercised against the Roman Catholicks, and writes a remonstrance to his Brother -	582, 583

1680.

The Parliament is prorogued, Jan. 26, and the Duke is ordered to return from Scotland - - -	585
Motives of Charles II.'s conduct at that time - - -	586
An Address from Norfolk to thank the King for recalling the Duke of York - - - - -	588
The factious Party alarmed at the return of the Duke of York - - - - -	589
The discovery of a Black Box with its contents - - -	ib.
Lord Shaftsbury indicts the Duke, June 16, for recusancy -	590
The Dutchess of Portsmouth brought over to the factious Party - - - - -	592
The Duke of York urges his own justification and other important truths to the King; extracted from the eighth volume of his Private Memoirs - - -	ib.

The Duke is notwithstanding again sent into Scotland —
His conversation on that occasion with the King -	594, 595
His interview at taking leave - - - - -	597
Some account of the political intrigues which had induced the King to part with his Brother - - - - -	599
The Parliament meets Oct. 21, and the Bill of Exclusion is brought in - - - - -	600
Abstract of the solemn and extraordinary Debate on that Bill, which took place, Oct. 26 - - - - -	601—613
The Duke writes to the King, on what had passed, and recalls his attention to the consequences that must ensue -	613
The King's message to the Commons, that he will never pass the Bill - - - - -	614
Lord Halifax first manifests in Council his zeal against the Bill, to his utter separation from the other party — Lord Sunderland and Mr. Godolphin desert the Duke's interest - - - - -	615
Parliamentary proceedings on that occasion -	615—618
The Zeal and Loyalty of Lord Halifax — The Bill is re- jected in that House by a majority of thirty-three voices -	618
Lord Halifax proposes the banishment of the Duke of York for life — They propose also the King's being divorced and marrying a Protestant - - - - -	619
The Commons, Nov. 17, refuse succours for Tangier -	620
Observations on the argument which Lord Halifax had used against the Bill of Exclusion, with part of Mr. Hampden's Speech - - - - -	621
The Duke's friends attacked, and Sir Edward Seymour im- peached for building 30 ships — Address the King to remove Lord Halifax - - - - -	622
New accusations brought against the Duke concerning the Plot - - - - -	623

	Page
Dispute in the House of Commons respecting the pardon for the witnesses - - - - -	624
The Commons present an Address, Nov. 29, against the Plot and prevailing influence of the Papists - -	ib.
The Duke alone was the person against whom the Storm was raised - - - - -	626
The Duke of York's friends renew their solicitations, that H. R. Highness would change his Religion - -	627
The Duke's reply, in which he states the first origin of his doubts respecting the Church of England; extracted from the eighth volume of his Private Memoirs -	629—634
The Duke of York is presented again by the Grand Jury of Westminster for Recusancy, and the Bill of Limitation and 34 Articles of Treason are framed against him -	634
Lord Stafford is tried, Nov. 20, and condemned after a Trial which lasted five days - - - -	635
The Duke aimed at in this and in all other prosecutions -	637
The Party is afraid to try Lord Arundel - - -	638
Conduct of the Lords Carlisle and Howard of Escrick -	639
Charles II. ill advised in remaining neuter during the Trial	ib.
Dismal prospect of the Duke's affairs, all men in power being against him - - - - -	640
Mr. Sidney, Envoy at the Hague, is reprimanded by the King for the Memorial sent - - - -	642
The Duke gains ground in Scotland - - -	644
The Dutchess of Portsmouth alarmed at being told, that the House "threatened to throw her into the lump of grievances" - - - - -	645
Great endeavours used to remove the Duke's Friends -	646
Projects for the destruction of Popery - - -	647
The Lords and Commons differ respecting Priviledges and Impleyments - - - - -	648

	Page
A contrivance to have made Lord Shaftsbury Lord Mayor -	651
The Party boldly require, that Lord Halifax, the Marques of Worcester, Lord Clarendon, Lord Feversham, and Mr. Hyde might be removed - - - -	652
The Duke of Monmouth attempts to bring about his own re-admission at Court - - - -	653
Oates declares publickly, That the Duke of York was possess'd with a Devil, and, that for the love he bore the Nation, he would make no scruple to kill him with his own hand -	ib.

1681.

Charles II. being of opinion, that whatever money he got from the Commons, it would cost him more Prerogative than it was worth, prorogues the Parliament, Jan. 10 -	654
Vote which the Commons previously had passed respecting the Bill of Exclusion - - - -	655
The influence of the Party is felt by the Duke at Edinburgh -	ib.
The Duke of York's arguments for being recalled -	ib.
His friends, backed by the King, again urge him to become a Protestant - - - -	657
Amidst the endless variation in the mind of Charles II. a project was made him, That in case the Duke survived him, His Royal Highness should be regarded as a Minor, and put under the tuition of his own Children; and neither the Prince nor Princess of Orange were passive in this scheme - - - -	658
Certain reforms made in the King's Family and Council -	ib.
The Duke, surrounded by Enemies and false Friends, places his confidence in one of his attendants, Mr. Churchill, and sends him to the King to remonstrate - -	659
The Prince of Orange writes to the Duke, and is known to be favourable to the Bill of Exclusion - -	662

	Page
The designs of the Prince of Orange begin to be suspected by the Duke's party — The answer which was given by the Duke, to what was termed, "The Snake which lurked under this compliment upon the Prerogative" - -	662
The men whom Charles II. termed his Useful Friends, were those whom the Duke most suspected - - -	663
The Duke's caution in not moving "with too much violence those wheels which seem'd to stop, for fear of breaking all in pieces" - - - - -	664
The King agrees to a Treaty with France, which was part of Mr. Churchill's commission from the Duke of York -	ib.
The Dutchess of Portsmouth in vain attempts to change sides again, and to endeavour to be reconciled to the Duke -	665
Activity of the Duke's Enemies to convict him as a Papist -	666
Preparations against the meeting of Parliament - -	667
Fitzharris's Plot - - - - -	668
The Duke's youngest Daughter, the Lady ISABELLA, dies in London - - - - -	670
The King is offered 60,000l. if he would pass the Bill, which he refuses - - - - -	ib.
The King's Speech on opening the Sessions at Oxford, March 21 - - - - -	ib.
The expedient proposed by the King is considered by the Duke as bad as the Bill of Exclusion - - -	671
The King, perceiving the heat and animosity that prevailed between both Houses of Parliament, appears unexpectedly in the House of Lords in his Robes and directs the Chancellor to dissolve the Parliament - - -	673
His Majesty after this unexpected exertion, sends an express to the Duke to inform him of it - - -	ib.
The Duke is still unable to obtain leave to return — Extract from the King's letter to his Brother - - -	674

	Page
The Duke narrowly escapes being convicted of recusancy -	675
Fresh obstacles to the Duke's return - - -	676
Extract from the King's private Letter to the Duke -	678
His Reflections on what had passed—" Had I affected Popularity, or considered only my own well-being in the world, I had not trodden the paths which I now am so intangled in" - - - -	679
Mr. Churchill is sent to Court, to beg leave that the Dutchess might go to Bath - - - -	ib.
The Duke, finding every expedient fail for his return, occupies himself entirely with the business of Scotland, and the PRINCESS ANNE comes to him - - -	682
The Duke, in consequence of the wishes of many of the chief men in Scotland, writes to the King to desire that a Parliament might be called there - - -	683
The Scotch Parliament is in consequence appointed to meet, July 28th, and the Duke is named as the King's Commissioner in it - - - -	684
Fitzharris is tried - - - -	ib.
Attempt made by Lord Shaftsbury to keep up the credit of the late Plot - - - -	685
Some Machinations of the Dutchess of Portsmouth against the Duke of York are brought to light by the trial of Fitzharris—" So now His Royal Highness saw, what a special friend she had been to him all along" -	686
Lord Howard of Escrick sent to the Tower, and Bishop Plunket, the Catholick Primate in Ireland, is executed -	687
Lord Shaftsbury committed to the Tower, and hooted at for a Traitor as he went through the City - -	688
The Character of that Nobleman, " Who had the cunning to keep the wind on his back and to swim continually with the tide, so that in all changes from the year fourthy to sixty, he came sailing down before it" - -	ib.

	Page
The Prince of Orange earnestly requests to visit the King—
The Duke's dread of the political effects of the Interview, which he transmits in a letter to his Brother - -	690
The Prince of Orange arrives, July 24, and gives all imaginable reasons of jealousy to the Duke of York -	ib.
Minutes of a Conversation that passed between Charles II. and the Prince of Orange, respecting the meeting of a Parliament, the Bill of Exclusion, Limitation, &c. extracted from the Stuart Letters - - -	691
The Lords Halifax, Hyde, and Mr. Seymour, endeavour to dissuade the Prince of Orange from dining in the City, it then being in direct opposition against the King—The Prince replies, "He had promised, and he would go" -	ib.
The King sends for him to come immediately to Windsor—Their renewed Conversation respecting the assembling of Parliament, and the Bill of Exclusion - -	692
The Prince of Orange returns home, "as ill satisfyd with others as others were with him" - - -	693
"The dregs which he left behind rais'd such a ferment after he was gon, as made his Royal Highness apprehend that notwithstanding all his struggling, he should fall a sacrifice in the end" - - -	ib.
Speech of H. R. H. the Duke of York on opening the Parliament in Scotland, from his Private Memoirs -	694
The Parliament of Scotland passes an Act to assert the Rights of Succession, and declares, that no difference in Religion nor Act of Parliament itself could alter or divert the said Rights - - -	696
The Duke's friends, the Lords Conway and Hyde, renew H. R. Highness's solicitations to be recalled - -	697
Opposed by Lord Halifax, who was displeased in not being in the confidence of the Duke - - -	698

Lord Hyde is sent to Edinburgh to inform the Duke, "That unless he would conforme and go to Church, he must expect no leave to return to Court "	- -	699
Firmness of the Duke of York in what he considered to be his duty	- - - - -	701
The King is satisfied with Lord Hyde's report, " that tho' H. R. H. was immoveable in his Religion, he had been no less zealous and indeed no less successfull in his Majesty's business "	- - - - -	702
The Duke of York's Scheme for the Government of Scotland, which he sent by Lord Hyde to Charles II.	-	702—707
The King appears to be thoroughly satisfied with his Brother's judgment respecting Scotland, and complies with whatever changes he had proposed	- - -	707
The Duke meets with opposition respecting the new Test in Scotland	- - - - -	ib.
The Earl of Argyle is prosecuted for refusing the Test	-	708
Complaints of harsh usage—Escapes from Prison—Sentence is passed upon him	- - - - -	709
Lord and Lady Lautherdale exert themselves in behalf of Lord Lorn	- - - - -	711
Jealousy of Lord Halifax increased respecting Lord Hyde		ib.
Lord Lorn has leave to come up and plead for himself— which the King refused until the Duke of York consented		712
Lord Shaftsbury is acquitted	- - - - -	713
The Prince of Orange exerts his influence abroad to force the King into an union with the Parliament and a breach with France	- - - - -	714
Charles II. being pressed for pecuniary supplies, makes a private Treaty with France, for a Pension of 50,000 l. a quarter — the first payment is made at the end of June 1681	- - - - -	715

Owing to "the capricious fancies of Ministers, the hidden intrigues of the woemen, and the King's unsteddy temper," the Duke had nearly been recalled when he least expected it	- - - - -	716
The whole design is crushed by Lord Halifax, "who was always for cleaving a hair in his advice"	- -	718
State of the Duke's mind on that trying occasion	- -	719

1682.

Difficulties with which the King was surrounded — The line of conduct he had determined to adopt respecting the meeting of Parliament — Fixes on Cambridge as the place for its assembling	- - - - -	720
Remonstrance of the French King to the Memorial which the English and Dutch Ministers had presented	-	ib.
The Dutch Ambassadors accuse Charles II. of bribery from France and a manifest breach of his promise	-	721
Intrigues of the Prince of Orange abroad	-	722
An unforeseen accident brings the Duke back to Court, and by means of a person he least expected it from	-	722—730
The Duke returns, May 3d, to Scotland, to fetch the Dutchess and the PRINCESS ANNE, and is in danger of being lost	- - - - -	730
Good condition of public affairs at the Duke's return, the King having followed those vigorous measures which his Brother had advised	- - - - -	733
The Earl of Shaftsbury sends an ambiguous message and sues for pardon from the Duke of York	- -	734
The Duke's guarded reply	- - - -	ib.
The Earl of Sunderland's anxiety to secure his own interests on the Duke's return	- - - -	735

	Page
The Dutchess of Portsmouth resumes her jealousy of the Duke - - - - -	736
The Duke of Monmouth makes overtures towards a reconciliation with the King - - - - -	737

1683.

The King fines the late Sheriffs of London, and brings a Quo Warranto against the Charter and Franchises of the City - - - - -	ib.
The Rye-house Conspiracy - - - - -	738
The Duke of Monmouth, who had absconded, and been pardoned, is banished from the Court - - - - -	744

* * Pennant informs us, in his Account of London, (page 117.) that the DUKE OF MONMOUTH lived in the center house in Soho Square, facing the Statue. "Originally the Square was called, in honour of him, Monmouth Square; and afterwards changed to that of King Square. I have a tradition, that, on his death, the admirers of that unfortunate man changed it to Soho, being the word of the day at the field of Sedgemoor. The House was purchased by the late Lord Bateman, and let by the present Lord to the Comte de Guerchy, the French Ambassador. After which it was leased on building leases. The name of the unfortunate Duke is still preserved in Monmouth Street."

1684.

The PRINCESS ANNE is married to PRINCE GEORGE of Denmark - - - - -	745
The cordiality which at last prevailed between the King and his Brother the Duke of York, who continued indefatigable in his attention to public business, and is restored to his situation of High Admiral and Privy Counsellor—Prospect of future tranquillity to Charles II.—When

suddenly, Feb. 2, his Majesty is seized with a fit of
apoplexy	746
Charles II. desires to die in the Faith and Communion of
the Roman Catholick Church	748
After expressing the affection of a Brother for the Duke of
York, who at the King's earnest request sends for a
Catholick Priest, the King expires, Feb. 6.	749
Character of Charles II.	750

* * Mr. Walter Scott, in his valuable Notes to Dryden's Historical Poem of Absalom and Achitophel, has given much attention to the Character of Lord Shaftsbury, the leading Enemy of CHARLES THE SECOND. (Vol. IX. p. 222.)

“ For close designs, and crooked Counsels fit, Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit.
In Friendship false, implacable in hate,
Resolved to ruin or to rule the State.”

“ The Earl of Shaftesbury,” says Mr. Scott, (page 326) “ was at the head of the Cabal, which advised the measures of repealing the Test, of shutting the Exchequer, of breaking the Triple Alliance, and uniting with France to the destruction of Holland. . . . Lord Shaftesbury (page 297) in the Parliament of 1679, insinuated an accusation against the Duke, (of Ormonde) on account of the alleged favour he shewed to Papists. From this charge he was vindicated by the Earl of Ossory, with an uncommon degree of spirited eloquence. After pleading his Father's services against the Roman Catholic Rebels, the danger of assassination from them which he had repeatedly escaped, and the active share he had in preventing the perversion of the DUKE OF GLOUCESTER from the Protestant Faith, he thus retorted upon Shaftesbury: Having spoke of what he has done, I presume with the same truth to tell your Lordship what he has not done. He never advised the breaking the Triple League ; he never advised the shutting up of the Exchequer ; he never advised the Declaration for a Toleration ; he never advised the falling out with the Dutch, and the joining with France ; he was not the Author of that most excellent position, 'DELENDA EST CARTHAGO ; that Holland, a Protestant Country, should contrary to the true interest of England, be totally destroyed. I beg your Lordship will be so just, as to judge of my Father, and of all Men, according to their Actions and Counsels." This great and distinguished Nobleman the Faithful Friend of CHARLES II. is described by Dryden, under the name of Barzillai, (page 241) when speaking of the Friends of that Monarch.

" Friends he has few, so high the madness grows;
 Who dare be such must be the people's foes:
 Yet some there were, even in the worst of days,
 Some let me name, and naming is to praise.
 In this short file Barzillai first appears, Barzillai, crowned with honour and with years."

ERRATA IN THIS VOLUME.

Preface, page x. l. 20. For "these" read "those."

Page 225. Dele in the first Line the repeated words "the Count."

Page 738. l. 5 For "seized in" read "seized in to."

* * The Extract in French from this Life relating to the Wars of M. de Turenne, which King JAMES sent to the Cardinal de Bouillon, and which has been occasionally referred to in the notes by the Editor, (particularly at pages 144 and 379) will be found at the end of the Life of Turenne by Ramsay, 2 vols. quarto, Paris.

THE LIFE
OF
H.R.H. JAMES DUKE OF YORK, LORD HIGH ADMIRAL OF ENGLAND, COMPILED
BY HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS'S PRIVATE SECRETARY OUT OF MEMOIRS WRITTEN BY THAT PRINCE.

THE LIFE
OF
JAMES THE SECOND,
KING OF ENGLAND, &c.

COLLECTED OUT OF MEMOIRS WRIT OF HIS OWN HAND.

THE FIRST PART.

To. I.
P A R T
I.

JAMES Duke of York son of Charles the First King of Great Britain, and of Henrietta Maria daughter to Henry the 4th, King of France, was born at the palace of St. James on the 14th of October in the year 1633, and till the time that the King his father left London in the year 1641, he was there educated with the rest of the King's children.

The Duke's birth, 14th Oct. 1633

But when by reason of the tumults, the King, Queen and Prince of Wales, were in a manner forced out of London, the Duke went also with them, together with the Princesse Mary his eldest sister (then newly marryd to the Prince of Orange) first to Hampton-Court and afterwards to Windsor; where his Majesty, hearing that the disorders in the city still increased, took the resolution of sending the Queen with the Princesse Mary into Holland, and accordingly carryd them to Dover, without passing thorow London: and at the same time he sent the Duke of York to St. James's, to stay there with his brother the Duke of Gloucester and the Princesse Elisabeth.

1641.
The King forced out of London, the Duke go's with him to Windsor.

The disorders increasing, the Queen and the Princesse Mary are sent into Holland and the Duke is sent to St.
James's.

ORIG. MEM.
Part 1. p. 1.

P A R T

I.

1642.

The King go's with the Pr of Wales to York.

He sends for the Duke.

The Duke arrives at York where he is made Knight of the Garter.

The King makes use of his Royall H: to get possession of Hull.

OR. MEM.
Part 1. p. 2.

His Majesty after having seen the Queen and the Princesse of Orange on ship board, taking the Prince along with him, went immediatly to York: soon after which, still finding differences growing to that high between him and the Parliament, that there was litle probability of agreement, he sent order a litle before Easter to the Marquess of Hertford, to bring the Duke of York to him; of which the Parliament having notice, sent a message to the Marquess forbidding him to do it: notwithstanding which to [he] obeyd the King, and upon Easter Munday setting forth from London, he conducted the Duke to York, where his Royall Highnes being arriued, he was made Knight of the Garter; And not long after, the King made use of him (as young as he was) to get possession of the town of Hull; having reason to suspect that the governour Sr John Hotham might refuse to admitt his Ma^{ty} in his own person, out of fear of displeasing the Parliament, wherefore he sent the Duke thither, as if it were only out of curiosity to see the place.

With the Duke there went the Prince Elector Palatin, and severall lords and gentlemen; and his Ma^{ty} resolv'd to follow the next day together with the Prince, beleevving that if the Duke were once in the town, accompanied as he then was, it would not be in the power of the governour to keep them out, thō he should endeavour it.

The King
misses of gaining Hull, and how.

But the event did not answer his expectation, for the next morning, the Duke being then on the platforme, accompanied by the governour, Sir Lewis Dyves came in and told his Highness that the King was coming, then turning to the governour, he acquainted him from the King, that he would dine with him that day. At which news Hotham suddenly turn'd very pale, struck himself on the breast, and return'd no answer to him, but immediatly desir'd the Duke with his company to retire to his lodging, which was accordingly done.

Sr Jo: Hotham confines the Duke to his lodging.

Then causing the gates to be shutt, he commanded the garrison to stand to their armes. Presently the King came to the gates, which finding shutt against him, and soldiers appearing upon the walls, he demanded to speak with the governour, who accordingly appearing, endeavour'd to excuse himself for refusing to admitt his Ma^{ty} into the town, alledging that he was intrusted with that government by the Parliament; after which he fell upon the old common place of declaiming against evill Counsellors with such canting expressions as were generally in use amongst that party. To all which his Majesty replyd with a moderation of a Prince who had no other means of reducing him to his duty, but perswasions and arguments; vrging to him what a good subject and an honest, ought to do in his case and how undutyfull and criminall it was, according to the known law of the land, for a subject to deny his Sovereign entrance into his own town; and by such an open act of Rebellion begun by him, he would make himself guilty of all the evils and blood-shed that might ther-upon insue.

But all these reasons had no effect upon Hotham; for besides his being peringaged in the faction of the Parliament to confirm him in his refractorines, he had newly receiv'd an advertisment from Mr. William Murray a groom of the King's bed chamber, that it was resolved so soon as the King was master of the town, first to secure him, and then by a court martiall to try him for his life. This intelligence thō wholly void of truth, had nevertheless the effect maliciously intended of keeping out the King. So that all perswasions proving unsuccessfull, his Majesty at last told him, that he hoped thō he would not give him entrance, he would at least suffer his son, and his nephew with the rest of their company, to come out to him; which indeed he did, but with this caution, that he sent them out one by one, that so it might not

P A R T

I.

1642.

And refuses the King's entrance into Hull. Ibid.

The Duke being let out of Hull, go's back with the King to York.
OR. MEM.
Part 1. p. 3.

P A R T

I.

1642.

be in their power to attempt any thing. So soon as they were all out of the town, his Majesty went directly to Beverley wher he lay that night, and from thence to York.

Thus having miss'd of gaining Hull, he not only left a strong place (at least so reckon'd in those days) in the hands of the Parliament (which afterwards prov'd very ruinous to his affairs, by the unsuccessfull seige which was layd to it by the Marquess of Newcastle) but therby was almost put out of capacity of raising an army; for in that town ther was a plentifull magazin of armes and ammunition for a body of above twenty thousand men, with a train of artillery proportionable to it, his Majesty at that time not being otherwise furnished wherewithall to arme a hundred men.

Hull missed of by ill managem^t.
Ibid.

And certainly this Place was not only miss'd of by the disloyalty of the governour, and treachery of him who sent the message, but more particularly by the ill management of the whole affaire: For had the King, instead of sending Sir Lewis Dyves, surpriz'd the governour by an unexpected visite, and without warning of his coming, in all probability he had been master of the place, for the inhabitants at that time were very affectionat to his service; and besides he was attended by so many gentlemen of that country, and others, that how disaffected soever the garrison had been, they could haue made no considerable resistance. Neither did it appear that the soldiers themselves were ill intention'd; the generality of them throwing down their armes, when they were call'd on, so to do, by some who attended his Majesty without the wall, when they heard Sir John Hotham refuse him entrance; in so much that the officers with swords in their hands compell'd them with threatnings, before they would take them up again.

Another great errour in this conduct was, that the King did not instruct some one bold and vigourous man of their number who were sent before with the Duke, with a commission to secur the person of Sir John Hotham, in case he should prove refractory, and with a positive order for the rest to obey the person so intrusted upon his producing the commission. This might easily have been effected, either when Sir Lewis Dyves first brought the message from the King to the governour, or a litle after when Hotham came in to the room unattended by any of his officers, wher he had confin'd the Duke and all his company: And many since have wonderd at it, that amongst so many noblemen and gentlemen who attended the Duke, no one of them should think of making use of such an oppertunity of doing the King so considerable a service. True it is, that Hotham was no sooner out of the room, then Sir Lewis Dyves, and Mr. William Murray (one of the grooms of the Duke's bedchamber, and a much honester man then his name-sake) without imparting their design to any one, made a shift to get out after the governour, with a firm resolution either to throw him over the walls, or to kill him. But he seeing them approach at the same time when he was in conference with the King, immediatly ordered them to be seiz'd, and a guard to be sett on them, which was accordingly executed, and they detained prisoners, till such time as the Duke departed out of the town; and then they were dismiss'd, because he was not able to prove any thing against them.

Thus it pleas'd God, that this governour should not then receiue his punishment; but it appear'd afterwards, that he was reserved by the justice of Providence, in a more extraordinary manner, to receiue his due reward and to lose his head; for they wer the instruments of the Divinc Vengeance, for whose sakes and in whose quarrell, he then began the rebellion: It so happening that the Parliament afterwards put both him and his son to death on the same day, for designing to deliver that very garrison into the hands of His Majesty, and that the father and the son accus'd and betrayd each the

P A R T
I.

1642.

How easy it had been to secur the person of Sir John Hotham. OR. MEM. Part 1. p. . . N.B. The number of the page has been cut out by the binder.

A remarkable punishment of God upon Hotham for his disloyalty.

Ibid. p. 5.

P A R T other, whilst both had hopes given them of saving their lives
I. by a separate confession.

1642.

The King begins to raise an Army for his own security. Ibid.

The Queen sends a supply of arms and ammunition from Holland to the King by one Captain Straughan a Scotsman.

His Majesty being come to York, thought it high time for him to endeavour his own security by raising an army, as the Parliament already had given him the example, but he wanted both mony and armes: Of the first he had no other supply but what the Loyall Lords and Gentlemen about him did voluntarily furnish; and as for armes, it was impossible for him to get any sufficient quantity but from beyond seas, which also was exceeding difficult to do, the Parliament having all the Navy at their disposall, except a ship or two of those that conveyd the Queen to Holland; one of which called the Providence, commanded by Captain Straughan a Scotsman, her Majesty dispatch'd back fraught with armes and ammunition, about the time when the King had been refused entrance into Hull; without which seasonable assistance, it had been impossible for his Majesty to have rais'd any body of an army. The captain ran such hazards in his passage and incounter'd with so many difficulties in executing his commission, that these passages deserve to be related as they were taken out of his Journall in manner following.

A particular account of this Captain's great conduct and bravery in executing his commission.

OR. MEM.
Part I. p. 7.

Captain Straughan being commanded by her Majesty to carry over to the King a quantity of armes, and to convoy over a ketch loden with powder; and being inform'd that the coast all along was layd to intercept him, or any other ships or vessells, that should be design'd to bring over armes or ammunition to his Majesty (the Parliament knowing the great want he had of them) chose, as the best way of performing his commission, to saile directly for the Humber, wher he beleev'd they never would expect him; and ther at a place by him appointed, to run his ship a shore, and land what he brought over; having to this purpose sent before, to give notice to his Majesty of his intention, and to desire that some might be in a readines at the place agreed on, to receive the armes and ammunition; and that upon his coming near the place, and making such a signall, they should answer him with the like, by which he might understand they were there attending him: Accordingly he set sayle from the Brill, and came into the Humber, and made the signall which was appointed, but was not answer'd, for which reason he did not adventure to run in, where he first intended; but the tyde being spent, was forced to come to an anchor, with his ketch by him, that it might not be driven out to sea. He was no sooner at an anchor, but there came down from Hull a Parliament ship of 54 guns, which came to an anchor near him; and another of their ships which was in Grimsbey-road, which had weigh'd as he past by her, and stood up after him, came likewise to an anchor, a stern of him, and immediatly sent their boat to command him on boord of them; which he refused, as being in one of his Majesty's own built ships, and that therefore it was their duty to come on boord of him; yet, upon his refusall they did not stir, as thinking it more proper, and time enough to do their busines at the tyde of flood. The Captain was then under great hardships what to do; he could not possibly go out to sea, for besides that their two ships waited on him, his own was in so ill a condition, that he durst not venture out; he therefore resolved to weigh anchor with the tyde of flood, and to turn up as far as he could above the town, and then run his ship a shore, where he hoped some might come into his rescue. Having fixed on this expedient, he sent on board the Parliament ships, desiring them to lend him a couple of cables and anchors, he being in great want of them, and that it was the custome of men of war to be helpfull to each other in such extremitys. But they refusing this, he sent them word (the better to disguise his intention) that so soon as the tyde serv'd he would go for Hull, and complain

P A R T I.
 1642. to the governour of their denyall; being assur'd he would check them for it, and furnish him with what he wanted. In the mean time he caus'd his ketch which rode by him, to yeere on board him upon his quarter, which was from their ships; and cutt a hole in his own quarter, through which passage he took in all the poudre which was on board the ketch, and stowed it in his own ship: After which, so soon as the tyde serv'd, he weigh'd and stood up towards Hull, the two Parliament ships doing the like, and keeping a good distance, a starn of him, to make sure that he might not get out to sea. In this manner they continued turning up, till it was almost high water. At which time his pilot told him he thought he could now secure him, and the ship, without running the hazard of passing under the guns of the town; for that he was come up with a sand which was very narrow, over which ther was but twelve foot water at the top of the tyde; and being once got over that, he had depth enough, and could run on shore where he thought convenient, without danger of the Parliament ships which drew more water. Whereupon the Captain took the resolution of passing over his ship, drawing at eleven foot and a half, and accordingly setting up all his sails, stood boldly over it, and got into the other channell. The two Parliament ships endeavour'd to follow him, but having no water enough, stuck fast. The Captain continued his way down, till he came to a place call'd Paull, some miles below Hull, on the same side of the Humber, and there ran his ship a shore, so that she serv'd him for a battery to defend him in landing the armes and ammunition, which he immediatly did, and dispatch'd away a messenger to the King at York to give him notice of his arrivall at that place.

After which, having severall gentlemen and officers on board, they fell immediatly to work, and intrenched themselves, while the seamen were unloding, apprehending that their neighbours of Hull might take them unprovided, and bereave them of what they had hitherto preserv'd with so much danger and difficulty; and they us'd such diligence in this, that they were in a posture of defence before the Enemy could attempt any thing upon them. For though they of the town came out, before any releif could be brought from York, yet seeing how advantageously Straughan was posted, they return'd without making the least attempt, and left them quiet till his Majesty sent men to convoy them up to York.

As for the ship his Majesty was moved to have her burnt, since she must fall of necessity into the Rebell's hands; but he absolutely refus'd it, saying, She had done him too much service to be so us'd, and that besides he did not despaire of having again both her and all the rest in his own possession. So she was left there after her guns were taken out, which were carryd to York, and most of her seamen made gunners.

The next day after she was clear'd, they of Hull came out and took possession of her: however the hope of his Majesty was in some sort propheticall, for when his Son was restor'd, that very ship with all the rest came to be in his power.

With this supply of armes and ammunition being enabled to raise an Army, his Majesty after having secur'd York, and left those parts in a good condition for his service, went attended with a considerable number of officers to Nottingham, and there first set up his Standard. Then it was that the zeal and affection of those Noblemen and Gentlemen who continued loyall to him, appear'd in a most exemplary manner, shewing what might be perform'd, when men well born and rightly principled undertake to serve their Prince with diligence; For in a very litle time, without any fund of mony but what themselves furnish'd, they rais'd so considerable an Army, that before the end of October the King was in a condition to fight a battell with

The King sets up his standard at Nottingham.
Orig. Mem.
Part 1. p.—

P A R T I. the Rebels, thō they had begun to raise forces before him, and wanted neither mony, nor armes, nor ammunition, nor indeed any thing to make themselves as numerous and as well appointed, as they pleas'd; whereas his Majesty, notwithstanding the supply which he had received from Holland, was obliged as he passed along from York to Nottingham, and from thence to Shrewsbury, to disarm the train'd bands in all places, and to furnish his new rais'd forces with their armes; And yet after all those shifts and hardships, many of his men remain'd unarm'd.

1642.

His Majesty's Army being thus form'd, he departed from Shrewsbury about the midle of October, with a resolution to incounter the Army of the Rebels; and upon the 22 of the same month he came to Edgect in Northamptonshire, not far from Bambury, where having notice that the Enemy's forces under the command of the Earle of Essex were within a days march of him, he order'd his whole Army to meet him the next day at Edge hill. He was no sooner arriv'd there with his first troop, than he saw the van of the Rebell's Army down in the bottom by Keynton, which soon after began to draw up in battell in the plain before that village, but advanced no further.

The Battell of Edge hill fought the 23 of October.
ORIG. MEM.
Part I. p. 15.

When all his Majesty's troops were come up to him, he march'd down the hill, and order'd Ruthven (who was then but Feild Marshall thō soon afterwards made Earle of Branford) an experienced officer who had serv'd the King of Sweden in the quality of Major General, to draw up his Army in battell. But the Earle of Lindsay who was Generall, was so much displeas'd at this preference, that he said, Since his Majesty thought him not fitt to perform the office of Commander in Chief, he would serve him as a Collonell, and immediatly went and put himself at the head of his Regim't of foot, which he desir'd might be placed opposite to that of the Earle of Essex, hoping therby that he might ingage him personally. The foot was drawn up that day much differing from the manner now in use, but according to the Swedish Brigade as they then called it, and the horse in two wings; the right commanded by Prince Rupert who was generall of it, and the left by the Lord Wilmott his leiftenant generall. Each wing had a second line or reserve, the one composed of the Lord Digby's and Sir Thomas Aston's regiment, with whom were some dragoons under the command of Collonell Edward Gray, the other of the Lord Biron's regiment, they themselves being at the head of them; and on the right hand of the right wing, were likewise some dragoons commanded by S^r Arthur Aston. According to the best relation of those who were present and could best tell, his Majesty's Army consisted of about eight thousand foot and two thousand five hundred horse, and ten piece of cannon: And the Rebels had between ten and eleven thousand foot, and they somewhat outnumber'd the Royall Army in horse as also in cannon. As for their order of Battell, they made not their wing so equall as his Majesty's, for knowing Prince Rupert was to command the King's right wing, they put the greatest part of their best cavalry into their left; as having lately felt the effects of his courage and conduct neer Worcester, where being much inferiour in number to them, he routed a body of their best horse: Besides this, to strengthen that wing, they had small platoons of musquetiers betwixt every squadron, and on their left hand some dragoons: As for their right wing of horse, which were not all come up, they drew that part of them which was present behind their foot, seeing they were not strong enough to encounter with the King's left wing, and lin'd the bushes with some dragoons to make a shew. In this posture they stood, expecting to be be charg'd, without advancing one step to meet the King's Army.

P A R T
I.

1642.

OR. MEM.
Part 1. p. 16.

P A R T
I.

1642.

The fight of Edgehill begun at 3 in the afternoon, 23 October.
On. Mem.
Part 1. p. 17.

The King with the P^{ce} of W, and the Duke march'd im-mediatly after the foot.
Ibid.

The foot so close to one another that they are within push of pike.

The Foot continue till night firing at one another.
Ibid.

It was almost three of the clock in the afternoon before his Majesty's Army was wholly drawn up in Battell; at which time they march'd on with a slow steady pace, and a very daring resolution. So soon as they were within reach of cannon, the Rebels fir'd at them, and their volly was made before the King's began to play. His Majesty with the Prince of Wales and the Duke of York, march'd immediatly after the foot, attended by several of the Lords whom he had commanded to stay by him, and by the band of pensioners on horseback led on by their leiftenant Sir William Howard; and that it might be known in what part of the Army the person of the King was, he had a scarlet cornet larger than ordinary carryd before him. When the Royall Army was advanced within musket shot of the Enemy, the foot on both sides began to fire, the King's still coming on, and the Rebell's continuing only to keep their ground; so that they came so near to one another that some of the batalions were at push of pike, particularly the regiment of Guards commanded by the Lord Willoughby and the Generall's regiment, with some others; in so much that the Lord Willoughby with his pike kill'd an officer of the Earle of Essex his own regiment, and hurt another. The foot being thus ingaged in such warm and close service, it were reasonable to imagine that one side should run and be disorder'd; but it happen'd otherwise, for each as if by mutuall consent retired some few paces, and then stuck down their coulours, continuing to fire at one another even till night; a thing so very extraordinary, that nothing less then so many witnesses as were there preseat, could make it credible; nor can any other reason be given for it, but the naturall courage of English men, which prompted them to maintain their ground, tho the rawnes and unexperience of both partys had not furnished them with skill to make the best use of their advantages. 'Tis observed that of all nations the English stick the closest to their Officers, and tis hardly seen that our common Soldiers will turn their backs, if they who commanded them do not first shew them the bad example, or leave them unofficer'd by being kill'd themselves upon the place.

But there was not the same equality of courage in the horse; for the Royalists march'd up with all the gallantry and resolution imaginable, especially the right wing led by Prince Rupert; thō while they advanced, the Enemy's cannon continually playd upon them, as did the small divisions of their Foot which were placed in the intervalls betwixt their squadrons, neither of which did in the least discompose them, or oblige them so much as to mend their pace. Thus they continued moving, till they came up close to the Enemy's Cavalery, which after having spent their first fire, immediatly turn'd their backs, the Royalists pursuing them with great eagernes. One Ramsey who commanded that wing of the Enemys, was it seems so thorowly frightened, that he never left running till he came to London.

While this past, the left wing had not much to do, as having only some dragoons, and two or three regiments of foot before them, of which they made a quick dispatch; and then observing the Enemy's left wing intirely beaten, follow'd the chace of them in stead of falling into the flanck or reere of the Rebells foot. The same errour was committed by the second lines of each wing; for in stead of staying by their foot, or charging the Enemy's foot, they also follow'd the chace of the routed horse, and continued the pursuit through Keynton, with such eagernes, that notwithstanding all the endeavours which were used by Prince Rupert, they were not to be rallied, till they met with two regiments of the Enemy's foot, who had with them some feild-pieces, and were coming up to joyn the rest of their Army: But the King's horse were then

P A R T I.

1642.

The right wing of the King's horse led by P^r Rupert.
Ibid. p. 18.

The left wing of the Rebells horse defeated by P^r Rupert.
Ibid.

The King's left wing having routed some foot and dragoons that were before them, follow the chace of the Rebells left wing and leave their own foot engaged.
Ibid.

The same errour committed by the second lines of each wing.
Ibid.

P^r Rupert endeavours in vain to rally them.
OR. MEM.
Par: 1. p. 18.

P A R T

I.

1642.

The King's horse being all gone off, his foot is charged in the flank by a part of the Enemy's horse w^{ch} put them in disorder.
Ibid. p. 19.

The King's Standard taken and S^r Edmond Verney killed holding it in his hand.
Ibid. p. 21

in so much disorder, that it was impossible for Prince Rupert to put them into a condition of doing any further service; it being almost dark before he could bring them back to the assistance of the foot whom he had left engaged, and who while all this was passing, were reduced to great extremities; for the Earle of Essex observing that all the King's horse were gone off in pursuit of his left wing, commanded that part of his cavallery which was behind his foot, to charge the King's and the general's regiments in the flank, just at the time when they were so warmly engaged at push of pike with his men. 'Tis true they were not broken with this charge, yet they were put into some disorder, which the Enemy's foot observing, advanced upon them, and drove them back as far as to their cannon; and to heighten their success, at the same time they took the King's Standard which was carryd by Sir Edmond Verney, who was killed upon the place holding it in his hand: But the King's cannon playd upon them with such execution that it stopt their further progress, and gave leisure to those regiments on the left hand which had given ground, to put themselves once more in good order, which the Enemy finding, advanced no further. At the same time the remnant of their foot were pressing vigourously on the King's, and had not the right hand Brigade commanded by Coll. Charles Gerard kept their order, and plyd those regiments which advanced upon them, with so great courage that they put the Enemy to a stand, the whole body of the King's foot had run great hazard of an absolute defeat; for had his Majesty's two wings given way, those in the main-battell could have made no long resistance. After this neither party press'd the other, but contented themselves to keep their ground, and continued fireing, till night put an end to the dispute.

A gallant action of Lord Willoughby.
Ibid. p. 20.

And here deserves to be mention'd a gallant action perform'd by the Lord Willoughby, who in the heat of the Action hearing

it reported that a blue riban was fallen, and knowing it could be no other then the Earle of Lindsay his father, he hasten'd from the head of the Guards to his assistance, and found him lying in the front of his own regiment with one leg broken by a musket-shott: Now this happening at that point of time when they received the charge of the Enemy's horse, so that it was impossible to carry him off, he stood undauntedly with his pike in his hand bestriding his father, and in that posture wounded one of their Captains in the face, and almost push'd him off of his horse; but his own men at the same time giving back, he was left ingaged in the midst of the Enemies', chusing rather to be taken with his father, that so he might be in a condition of rendering him what service was in his power, then to save himself by leaving him in that distress.

All this while his Majesty was behind the foot; where perceiving the disorder they were in by the charge given them by the horse, and that at the same time the Enemy's foot advanced against them, he resolved to march up to them himself to encourage them by his presence, and thereby to prevent their intire defeat; but judging it not fit to expose the Prince and the Duke of York to same danger, he order'd the Duke of Richmond to carry them out of the battell, and conduct them to the top of the hill; who excusing himself from that employment, the King layd the same command on the Earle of Dorset, who answer'd him with an oath, That he would not be thought a Coward for the sake of any King's Sons in Christendom, and therefore humbly desir'd his Majesty to committ that charge to some other man: Therupon the King layd an absolute command on S^r Will. Howard, with his pensioners, which were about fifty, to go off with them. After which his Majesty with those who were remaining with him, pursuing his former resolution, marched directly to the foot, who, according to his expectation took new courage from his presence,

The King perceiving his foot in disorder, marcheth up to them himself to encourage them.
OB. MEM.
P. I. p. 20.

The foot take new courage from his Majesty's presence and maintain their ground.
OB. MEM.
Part I. p. 22.

P A R T
I.

1642.

The Prince
and the Duke are carryd out of the battell by the King's order.

Ibid. p. 23.

The Prince
and the Duke escape narrowly from being taken prisoners at Edge hill.
Ibid. p. 24.

and maintain'd their ground. As he advanced, one of his footmen was shott in the face just by his horse's side; after which he continued in the reer of the foot, till the battell was ended by the night. At the same time when the King was marching to the foot, S^r Will. Howard went off with the Prince and Duke pursuant to his orders, and they had not gone above musket shott of from the place, when they saw a body of horse advancing directly towards them from the left hand of the King's foot; upon which sending to see what they were, and finding them to be the Enemy, they drew behind a little barn not far distant from them, which was incompassed by a hedge. In this barn severall of the King's wounded men were then dressing, but the Enemy observing the King's men to be within the inclosure, drew immediatly back without ingaging them, by which means the Prince and the Duke escaped the evident danger of being taken; for had they charged that small party they could not haue fail'd of beating them, considering the vast advantage of their numbers. Upon their drawing back to joyn their foot, the small body which attended the Prince and the Duke, were glad of the occasion to draw off further to the top of the hill towards the dusk of the evening, and as the darknes came on both Armys began to draw off, the Royalists to the broue of the hill, and the Enemy to Keynton: they left six pieces of their cannon behind them in the feild, and the King's Army some of theirs, without any soldiers to guard either. The next morning at break of day, his Ma^{ty} seeing the cannon still remaining as they were left, sent five hundred horse, which brought off both his own and the Enemy's, in the face of their Army, who saw the action perform'd without once endeavouring to oppose it. It was then proposed to march down again, and fall upon them; but the King finding his foot much decreased in number, the greatest part of them being stragled into the neighbouring villages to get victuals, thought it not adviseable to undertake that action, and therefore about evening return'd to his former quarters at Edgcott; the Enemy at the same retreating towards Warwick.

P A R T
I.

1642.

And now it remains to give an account of what men were slain, the number of which was not so great as was commonly reported; for according to the best information, there were not above fifteen hundred bodys of both partys remaining on the feild of battell. Of persons of note on the King's side were slayn the Lord Aubigny, brother to the Duke of Richmond and captain of the Duke's troop, Monro a Scotchman, leiftenant collonell to the Generall's Regiment of foot, and some few days afterwards the Earle of Lindsey the Generall dyd of his wounds in Warwick Castle, whither he had been carryd prisoner with his son. There wer wounded the Lord Taff, Colonell Charles Gerard, Colonell Sir Nicholas Biron, Sir George Stroad an officer of the ordinance, Sir Richard Graham one of his Majesty's querryes, and Sir Gervaise Scroop, who was left for dead upon the place and found next morning by his son with three and twenty wounds on him, strip'd of all his cloaths, unable to stirr, and lying amongst the dead bodys. It was the opinion of many chirurgions, that the frost which happen'd that night, occasion'd the saving of his life, by stopping of his blood. On the Rebell's side were slayn the Lord S^t John, Colonell Charles Essex, and other officers of inferiour quality.

About 1500 men kill'd on both sides at the Battell of Edgehill.
OR. MEM.
Part 1. p. —

The Royal Standard was once taken by the Enemy, but retaken by Captain John Smith, brother to the Lord Carington; who as he return'd from the pursuite of the Enemy's horse, happily fell upon that body of men which were carrying it away, for which service he was by his Majesty made Knight Banneret in the feild.

The Royal Standard retaken by a brother of the Lord Caring-ton.
OR. MEM.
Part: 1. p. 26.

The day after the Battell, Prince Rupert proposed to his Majesty, that he might be immediatly sent with the greatest part of the horse, and three thousand commanded foot to Lon-

P A R T

I.

1642.

The King instead of marching straight to London, is perswaded to take Banbury, and from thence to march to Oxford.
OR. MEM.
Part: I. p. 26.

The King marcheth at last for London in November, but it

don ; and undertook with them to possess himself of Whitehall and Westminster, and to drive out the rebellious part of the Parliament from thence, and to make good that part of the town 'till his Majesty should come up with the remainder of his Army ; which might easily be effected, before the Earle of Essex with his shatter'd forces cou'd march thither to oppose him : But this so seasonable a proposition was first obstructed, and finally layd aside by the aduice of many in the Councill, who were affraid least his Majesty shou'd return by conquest ; one of them in plain terms telling him, that it was too hazardous for him to send Prince Rupert on that design, who being a young man, and naturally passionate might possibly be urg'd in heat of blood to fire the town. By these and such like cautious remonstrances made and seconded by men of the same principles, the King was first perswaded to go and take in Banbury, which was commanded by Colonell Fiennes for the Parliament ; and that being perform'd, he was wrought on further, to march from thence to Oxford ; where staying some days, he delayd his opportunity so long that he lost it and the Earle of Essex got before him to the city, which oversight of his Majesty was of fatall consequence to his affaires : For in appearance had he marched directly thither, he had put an end to the warr, and wholly extinguish'd the rebellion. Because the factious party of the Parliament, and all their adherents in the town, were under so great a consternation that they wou'd certainly have gone out at one end of it, whilst his Majesty was entring at the other. But the Earle of Essex being return'd to them, and the King's Army not appearing before they had recover'd from their fright, they took heart again, gave order to recruit their broken forces, and settled the minds of their wavering freinds ; as plainly appear'd, when his Majesty afterwards too late advanced towards them.

For leaving Oxford in the beginning of Nouember, he marched

P A R T
I.

1642. was then too late, Essex having got before him.
OR: MEM:
Part I. p. 27.

His Majesty's forces pass at Brandford in November.
OR. MEM.
Part I. p. 27.

at last for London, finding no opposition in his way till he came to Brandford, which was on the twelfth of the foremention'd month: There were quarter'd in that place two or three regi-ments of the Rebells's foot, with some horse who endeavour'd to make good the bridge; but after a hot dispute which continued for some houres, the pass was forced, and all their foot taken or kill'd upon the place. It has since been confessed by a person of quality, who was then with the Earle of Essex, that had the King's troops marched on without delay, they had infallibly master'd London, the Enemy's forces being so dispersed in severall quarters without the town, and most of the horse on the other side of the water at Kingston; so that when the Earle of Essex came that evening to Hamersmith, he had but a very inconsiderable number of troops with him, and expected every moment to have been driven in to the town. But the next morning most of his forces came up to him, and at the least ten thousand of the train'd bands out of the city; all which he drew up on Turnham Green, so that then it was not advise-able for the King to fight them, they being double his number, nor consequently was it safe for him to stay in their neighbour-hood. For which reason the same evening his Majesty drew back to Hampton Court, and the next day passing the river, he marched to Oatlands, from thence to Bagshott, and so to Read-ing, where the King continued for some days, because the Prince at that time fell sick of the meazell; but so soon as he was recover'd, his Majesty leaving that town garrison'd, march'd on to Oxford.

Earle of Essex' forces being too strong, the King is obliged to draw back to Reading and from thence to Oxford. Ibid.

The Prince fell sick of the meazells at Reading.
Ibid. p. 29.

1643.
Reading besieged and taken by the Rebells, in April.
OR. MEM.
Par: I. p. 29.

About the middle of Aprill the Earle of Essex beseiged Read-ing; of which the King receiuing notice, assembled his Army, and marched up to the releif of it: but failing of his attempt, he return'd to Oxford, and a day or two after his retreat the town was surrender'd to the Parliament: In this expedition he took the Prince along with him, but left the Duke behind.

P A R T
I.

1643.
Prince Rupert takes Bristol in July. Ibid.

The King go's thither and takes the Prince and Duke with him. Ibid.

He besieges Glocester,
10 August.
Ibid.

The Siege of Glocester of fatal consequence to the King's affaires.
Ibid.

Towards the end of July, Bristoll was taken by Prince Rupert, and about the same time the Queen came to Oxford within a day or two after Bristoll was in the King's possession; he went to that City taking with him both the Prince and the Duke, and about the 10th of August marched to Glocester and besieged it.

The conduct of that Seige proved fatall to the King's affaires, first in breaking ground at too great a distance, and secondly in preparing gallerys to pass the ditch, which were absolutely unnecessary, the ditch being neither so deep nor so large as to oblige them to that loss of time; To this may be added, that when S^r Jacob Ashlay was ready to spring his Mine, he was hinder'd from it because the Earle of Branford at his attaque was not ready to do the same. All this put together gave the Earle of Essex leasure to march from London with his Army to the releef of the placc; whereas had the Seige been vigourously managed, as it might have been, the town cou'd not have held out aboue four days.

So soon as his Majesty was inform'd that the Rebells were marching towards him, he commanded Prince Rupert with most of the horse, to meet them in their way, to attend their motion, and endeavour all he cou'd to retard their march; which he perform'd with so much conduct, that he hinder'd them at least two days; But it prov'd of no advantage to the King, because he was not far enough advanced in the Seige to master the town in that space of time gain'd by Prince Rupert. And now the Earle of Essex was come so near, that it was necessary for his Majesty to draw off, which he did about the 8th of September, and marched towards the Parliament's Army with resolution to engage them. In pursuance of this he arriu'd at Sudely Castle, when the Enemy was at Winchcom; from Sudely the Prince and the Duke were sent back to Oxford: But the Earle of Essex, who having reliev'd Glocester, had no

After the raising of the seige of Glocester the Prince and the Duke are sent back to Oxford, in September.

design to fight, gave the King's Army the slip, and retreated with what haste he cou'd to London: So that his Majesty with all his diligence cou'd not overtake him, till they came to Auburn and Newberry where they fought.

P A R T
I.

Some time before the Seige of Gloucester, the Queen came to Oxford, as has been already mention'd, she continued there till Aprile, 1644, and about that time went to Exceter; where in June following she was deliver'd of the Princesse Henrietta, fifteen days after whose birth, she was forced in that weak condition, for fear of the Parliament's Army, to provide for her own safety by going into France, and to leave the Princesse there.

1644.
The Queen is deliver'd of the p^{res} Henrietta at Exceter in June and 15 days after is forced to retire into France.

In the same year about the third of June, his Majesty marched out of Oxford with all his horse and musketers, to avoid being inclosed in that city by two Armies of the Rebels, the one commanded by the Earle of Essex, and the other by S^r Will. Waller, but he left his pikemen and cannon in the Town; he then took the Prince along with him, but thought fitt that the Duke should stay in Oxford. The King passed happily between their Armys, and having got clear of them marched towards Worcester; for which reason the Earle of Essex commanded Sir Will: Waller with his forces to follow the King, and attend his motions, while himself marched into the west as hoping to reduce that part of the country under the power of the Parliament, while S^r William by his neighbourhood should find employment for the King's Army: But his Majesty having timely notice of his design, once more gave the slip to Waller and march'd back towards Oxford.

The King marches out of Oxford.

Then sending for his pikemen and cannon to joine him, he turn'd back upon Waller and defeated him at Capredy Bridge on the 29th of June. After which Victory he immediatly follow'd Essex into the west, and drove him up into a nooke of Cornwall to Lestihiel; where that Earle, by the advice of

The King defeats Waller at Capredy Bridge. 29 June.

He follows Essex into the West and drives him up into a nooke.

P A R T Lord Roberts, forsook his Army and went by sea to Pleamouth,
 I. (the only garrison remaining to the Parliament in all those 1644. parts) After his departure his horse broke through the King's Army, and by the negligence of the Lord Goreing, got to Pleamouth also. The Parliament's foot thus doubly deserted, by their Generall and by their horse, treated for themselves and made conditions to march away leaving behind them their armes, cannon and ammunion.

While these things passed where his Majesty was in person, his armes in the north were unsuccessfull: For York being York besieged by the Rebels. besieged by the forces of the Rebels in those parts, Prince Rupert drew together all the troops which he could make in the neighbouring countries, with resolution to releive it; and the Enemy being advertised of his march towards them, rais'd the Seige, and drew off about four or five miles distance from the town.

At which time Prince Rupert received a positue order from his Majesty to fight them. In pursuance of which he sent to the Marquis of Newcastle for all the forces he could spare him out of York. Thus recruited, he follow'd the Enemy, and press'd him so very close, that he was obliged to turn his face and fight. The day in all probability had been the King's, if the Lord Biron had punctually obeyd his orders, for Prince Rupert had posted him very advantageously behind a warren and a slough, with positue command not to quitt his ground, but in that posture only to expect and to receive there the charge of the Enemy; who must of necessity be much disorder'd in passing over to him, as being to receive the fire of seven hundred muskietiers in their advance to him, which undoubtedly had been very dangerous if not wholly ruinous to them: But in stead of maintaining his post, as he ought in duty to have done, when the Enemy had only drawn down two or three feild pieces, and with them play'd upon him, he

The Battell of Marstonmoore.

suffer'd himself to be persuaded by Colonel Hurrey to march over the morass and charge them, by which inconsiderate action he gave them the same advantage which he had formerly over them; for they charging him in his passage over the ground already mention'd, he was immediatly routed: Whereupon thō the left wing commanded by the Lord Goreing had actually beaten the right wing of the Rebell's Army, yet their left which was led by Cromwell and David Lesley, after having routed the Lord Biron, still keeping themselves firme in a body, easily forced the Lord Goreing out of the feild, and destroyd a considerable number of the King's foot.

Some few days after their Victory, they sate down again before the town, which was surrender'd to them by the Marquis of Newcastle, who, besides that he now despair'd of releif, had lost the greatest number of his foot in the late Battell.

In this manner, that fatall order which was sent to Prince Rupert, and his obeying it too strictly, occasion'd not only the loss of the fight, and of the town, but drew after it a more unhappy consequence, namely the loss of the whole Kingdom. For after this Battell, which was struck at Marston-moore, the affaires of his Majesty began visibly to decline, and the Rebels having reduced that part of the country under their command (which they easily perform'd and in a short time) those troops which were under the Earle of Manchester had leasure and oppertunity to joyn them, and with that reinforcement they were encouraged to fight the second Battell of Newberry against the King who lost it. And here it will not be amiss to relate, what has since been averr'd by a person of quality, who at that time was in the Rebell's Army before York; that after they had rais'd their Seige, their Generalls who were the Earle of Manchester, the Lord Fairfax, and old Lesley, were under the greatest consternation imaginable, as 1644.

P A R T
I.

York surrender'd up to the Rebells.

P A R T I. not knowing how to keep their Army together ; so that had they not been pressed by Prince Rupert as they were, and compell'd to come in a battell, they must of necessity have separated within four days at farthest, and consequently have left him in quiet possession of the country.

Great oversights committed by the King's advisers, which occasion'd the loss of the Battell of Newberry.

1644.

But this was not the only oversight committed by those who were then in power about the King ; for after that series of good successes, which he had first against Waller and afterwards against the Earle of Essex in the west, being return'd to Sherbourn, Prince Rupert came thither to him ; where it was resolved in a councill of war that his Majesty should not advance any further then Salisbury, till Prince Rupert first went into Wales to the Lord Gerard, and brought back such forces as could be spared from thence for the reinforcement of the King's Army ; Till which time it was not thought adviseable for his Majesty to expose himself in fight against the forces of the Enemy, which were now drawing together about Windsor, being recruited by the troops of the Earle of Manchester which had joyn'd them from the North. But no sooner was Prince Rupert gone for Wales, and the King come to Salisbury, where he had notice had Sir William Waller was at Andover with his forces, but it was resolved to beat up his quarters ; which doubtless had been vigourously perform'd, if his Majesty's troops had all come in to the rendezvous at the time appointed.

But while the King was staying for them, Sir William having notice of his intention drew out of his quarters with great diligence, So that when his Majestie's Van arrived there, they found the Enemy's already drawn out of the town, and falling upon their rear, they obliged them to a hasty and disorderly retreat : Upon which little success, the Lord Digby ambitious of doing somewhat extraordinary in the absence of Prince Rupert, advised his Majesty to pursue his advantage and follow him to Newberry: Of which resolution the Enemy having quick intelligence, drew all their forces into one body, and march'd to meet him. So that being twice his number, the most seasonable advice his Majesty could have taken, was to have made a timely retreat to Oxford, by which means he had given leasure to Prince Rupert to have joyn'd him with those forces, which he was bringing from Wales to his Majesty's assistance, before the Enemy could have forced him to a battell: But this counsell, which in common prudence had been the only way of safety, was neglected.

Neither was this the only error then committed, for when the resolution was taken to maintain the post they were in, yet the Army was not intrench (which ought in the first place to have been done) tho' they had three days leasure to have perform'd it. But in stead of this, they endeavour'd to make good the quarter of Spinay, which was too far distant from their Town; whereas if they had drawn somewhat farther back, they would have had less ground to maintain, and the advantage of being flanked by Duñington Castle.

I shall omitt the particulars of the ensuing battell, which was not successfull to the King, and only say, that his Army drew off in the night, marching first to Wallingford, and then to Oxford, leaving their cannon in Duñington Castle, which was presently besieged by the Enemy, who assur'd themselves to be masters of it with small expense of time, or labour. But the event prov'd contrary to their expectation; for before they could bring their design to pass, Prince Rupert had brought such recruits to his Majesty from Wales, that he marched back and releived the Castle, brought off his cannon, and offer'd battell to the Rebels, but they not thinking themselves strong enough to answer the Challenge, kept close within Newberry and refused to fight: wherupon the King's Army drew

Battell of Newberry.

The King releives the Castle of Duñington and offers battell to the Rebells.

P A R T

I.

1645.

Fairfax beseiges Oxford, where the King had left the Duke with the greatest part of his Councill.

The Councill sends pressing letters to the King to come to the releif of Oxford.

The Seige is rais'd.

off next day, as having perform'd the busines for which they came, and this action concluded that Campagne.

About the beginning of March 164 $\frac{1}{2}$ his Majesty sent the Prince into the west; And himself marched out of Oxford on the 3^d of May leaving the Duke of York with the greatest part of his Councill in that City: And towards the end of May the 'Town was besieged by the new modell'd Army of the Rebels commanded by Sir Thomas Fairfax. There was then in the 'Town a garrison of about five thousand men experienced Soldiers; and they were so well provided of all things necessary to sustain a Seige, that they were out of all apprehensions of the 'Town being taken by the Army, which then lay before it. And indeed that Seige was the best thing which could then happen for the King's affaires; for while they were busying themselves in making vain attempts on that Town, they gave him a favourable opportunity and leasure enough to make some considerable progress towards the north, whither he then design'd to go. But whither it was the pannick fear, or (to give it a softer name) the indiscretion of the Councill, they immediatly dispatched letters to his Majesty, pressing him to return to releive them; declaring that in case he did not, they should be forced to surrender up the 'Town, and they were obstinate to send this message, thō the Governor Collonell William Legg assur'd them positively they were not in the least danger, and that he was furnished with all things necessary for their defence: And soon after he made good his promise; for on the 2^d of June he sallyed out up on the only quarter which was advanced by the Enemy near the Town, on Hadington Hill, from which he beat them, and took and kill'd a considerable number of their men. This Action so startled them, and made them so sensible of the strength within the Town, that they rais'd the Seige immediatly, and, in all appearance, before they had notice of his Majesty's returning to raise it.

The letter sent by the Council from Oxford, found the King at Leycester, or near that place, which he had newly taken : So that beleaving Oxford to be in danger, he alter'd his resolution of going northward, and march'd back to raise the Seige. But he met with the Army of the Enemy at Naseby, and there fought that unfortunate and fattall Battell, which he lost so absolutely that it was decisive of the quarrell, and the last he ever fought for his Crown and life: for after it, he could never draw together the body of an Army, having there totally lost his old foot. On the other side, the Rebells' Army went on victorious in all places, for having beaten the King's own Army, they lost no time, but march'd directly into the west where they defeated the Lord Goreing, and, before winter, had reduced the most considerable places of that Country under the power of the Parliament. In all other parts of the Kingdom his Majesty's affaires had the same ill success; so that he had now remaining to him no place of tolerable security but only Oxford; to which he retired about the beginning of Nouember, and therein pass'd the whole winter.

About the latter end of Aprill 1646 he went from thence disguis'd, and pass'd undiscover'd through all the quarters of the Enemy, to the Scotch Army, hoping there to have found that safety, which he could no longer expect in a Town which was already block'd up and was immediatly to be beseiged, and not daring to trust his person in the hands of that Army which was coming to beleager it. He had it once in his thoughts to have carryd the Duke along with him, but did not.

On the first of May Oxford was actually beseig'd; and after the Enemy had settled their quarters round the Town, they began to make their approaches to the Est-gate of it from the top of Hedington hill, and ran them down within an hundrd paces of the works of the Town, without coming

P A R T
I.

1645.

The King takes Leycester.

The Battell of Naseby.
OR: MEM:
Part 1. p. 30.

Lord Goreing defeated in the West.
Ibid.

The King retires to Oxford the only place of security he had then remaining in England, Nouember.
Ibid.

1646.

Oxford
block'd up,
the King passes disguised through the Enemy's quarters to the Scotch Army and leaves the Duke in Oxford. Ibid.

P A R T

I.

1646.

They begin to treat the 18th.
ON: MEM:
P. 1. p. 30.

nearer ; as not judging it necessary to expose their men, or to press the place more vigourously, which they knew in a short time must inevitably fall into their hands. On the 18th of the same month the Councill sent to demand leave of the Enemy, that their Commissioners might come out, and treat concerning the surrender of the Town.

Ibid. p. 31.

Accordingly the Treaty was begun and carryd on till the 20th of June, before it was brought to a conclusion. During all which time, thō there was no cessation of armes till three days before the Articles were absolutely agreed, yet there happen'd no very considerable action ; only continuall skirmishes, which were commonly without the north gate ; on which quarter the Enemy had made no approaches, contenting themselves with drawing a line of Countervallation about cañon-shot of the Town, from one River to the other.

Prince Rupert wounded in Oxford.
ON: MEM:
P. 1. p. 31.

In one of these encounters Prince Rupert receiv'd a shot in the right shoulder, of which he soon was well, because it was so favourable that no bone was broke by it.

Oxford sur-render'd up to Fairfax the 24th of June.
Ibid.

No article made for the Duke, he is deliver'd into the hands of the Parliament.
Ibid.

On the 24th of June (S^t John Baptist's day) the Town was surrender'd to Sir Thomas Fairfax: no other Article being made for the Duke then that he was to be deliver'd into the hands of the Parliament, to be disposed of according to their pleasure. And this particular was the more observable, because so exact a care was taken in relation to all others besides the Duke. As for Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice they had liberty to go beyond the Seas ; and all other persons had the same freedom in the conditions which were made for them, in case they were so disposed, otherwise they had it at their choice to stay, and the leasure of six months allow'd them to make their peace by compounding for their Estates. Accordingly upon the delivery of the Town, S^t George Ratcliff receiv'd orders from Fairfax to continue with the Duke, till the pleasure of the Parliament should be known in the disposall of his person.

On the same day or the day after they enter'd the Town, the Generall with most of his Officers came to visit his Royall Hyghness, Sir Thomas Fairfax making him a kind of speech which certainly was none of the most eloquent, he being a much better Soldier then he was an Orator. He was the only man of all the Officers who kiss'd not the Duke's hand; for yet they had not banish'd all appearances of respect to the Royall Family. Yet none of them were so ceremonious as to kneel in the performance of that action, excepting only Cromwell who was then Leiftenant Generall.

The Duke remain'd at Oxford till the beginning of July, in which time thō he was not kept a closs prisoner, yet he was never permitted to take the aire without the Town, unless attended with a sufficient guard of horse.

Not long before the Duke went for London, Sir George Ratcliff received letters from the Queen, who was then at Paris, and had heard that his Royall Highnes was yet in Oxford: In those letters he was directed (in case it were yet in his power) either to carry the Duke into Ireland, or to bring him into France to her: But Sir George absolutely refused to comply with either of those commands; alledging for his excuse, that he durst not convey any of the King's Sons out of the Kingdom, without an express order from his Majesty; which nicety, or I may rather call it indiscretion of his, might haue cost his R: Highnes dear, as being the occasion of his being put into the Rebell's hands.

Soon after this, the Duke's Governor received orders from the Parliament to bring him up to London, which was accordingly done; and about three or four miles out of the Town the Duke was mett by the Earle of Northumberland (whom the Parliament had newly appointed for his Governor) and by severall others of the best quality amongst them, who receiv'd him from the hands of Sir George Ratcliff, whom they imme-

P A R T
I.

1646.
Fairfax visits
the Duke and makes him a speech. Ibid.

Cromwell kneels and kisses the Duke's hand.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 31.

The Duke carryd to London.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 32.

E. Northumberland appointed by the Parliam^t to be his Governor.
Ibid.

P A R T
I.

1646.
Sir George Ratcliff and all the rest of the Duke's servants dis-charg'd, and new ones given him by the Parliament. Ibid.

The Duke kept at St.
James's with the Duke of Glocester
and the P^{ce} Elizabeth.
Ibid.

Endeavours made for the Duke's Escape. Ibid.

He falls sick of an Ague.
Ibid. p. 33.

1647.
The King delivered up by the governing party of Scotland to the Parliament of England.

On: MEM:
P. I. p. 33.

Is brought prisoner to Holmeby.
Ibid.

Taken from Holmeby and brought to the Army.

The Duke permitted to wait on his Majesty at Maiden-head.

The City with a part of the Parliament declare against the Army.
Ibid.

dially discharg'd from his attendance, together with all the rest of the Duke's servants, not so much as excepting a dwarf whom his Royall Highness was desirous to have retain'd with him.

Thus was he carryd to St. James's where the Duke of Gloucester and the Princesse Elizabeth already were, having been left there by his Majesty when he departed out of London: And in the room of those who were dismissed, the Parliament put new servants to the Duke of their own chusing. But the Earle of Northumberland himself and his Lady treated the King's three children with the same respect and care, as if they had been intrusted with them immediatly from his Majesty.

That winter there were endeavours made for the Duke's escape; Coll. Edward Villars was imployd in it by his Majesty, but by some means or other the design was discover'd to the Parliament, so that it missed of the effect. The same winter the Duke was seized with a long ague, which continued from the end of January till the last of March.

Not long afterwards, the King was deliver'd up by the governing party in Scotland (of which the Marquis of Argyle was the cheif) to the Parliament and was brought prisoner to Holmeby in Northamptonshire, where he remain'd in that condition till the beginning of the summer, 1647. At which time he was taken from thence by Cornet Joycc, and brought to the Army which was then marching towards London. In their approach to it, as he passed by Maiden-head the Duke was permitted to go and wait on him, from whence his R. Highness was carryd back to London.

Immediatly after this, the City with a great part of the Parliament declared against the Army; Others of them, of which number was the Earle of Northumberland, left the Town and went to the Army. The Earle had design'd to have the Duke privately conveyd together with his Brother and Sister to Sion house wher he then was, and accordingly sent his brother in law Henry Howard to St. James's to be assisting in their escape. But the City-faction having a jealousy of his intention, caus'd him to be watched so narrowly, that the design was impossible to be effected; for thō they were all prepar'd to go, yet the guards sett about the house were so exceedingly watchfull, that it was impossible to get out of doors without being discover'd. The next day the Parliament searched into this matter with the most exact inquiry they could make, and all the servants were under a strict examination; but that business was soon ended; for the City and that part of the Parliament that joyn'd with them, were forced to submit, and the Army march'd into the Town.

At the latter end of summer his Majesty was carryd to Hampton-court, and the Duke was permitted severall times to attend him there; going and coming generally twice or thrice a week; till such time as his Majesty made his escape from thence to the Isle of Wight, where he was again made prisoner.

That winter there was another attempt made to have deliver'd the Duke; It was managed by the assistance of Mrs. Kilvert sister to the then Bishop of Salisbury, who waited on the Princesse Elizabeth, and one Hill a barber, who had been placed by the Parliament in the Duke's Service, and whom his R. Highness had gain'd to be serviceable in the design: But when they were almost ready to put it in execution, a letter which the Duke sent concerning that busines, happen'd to be intercepted, by which the whole secret was discover'd; Hill was imprison'd, and, some time after being releas'd, he was discharg'd the Duke's Service. As for Mrs. Kilvert she had better fortune, for it was never found out that she had any part in that design. In the former attempt which had been made, when it came to be discover'd, the Duke had resolutely

P A R T
I.

1647.
Earle of Northumberland retires to the Army and designs to convey the Duke privately thither. Ibid.

Another attempt made for the Duke's escape.
ON: MEM:
P. 1. p. 33.

P A R T

I.

1647.

denyd that he had the least knowledge of it, or that he was any way concern'd in prosecution of it; but the evidence of this last was too clear to be disown'd, for they had the undeniable proof of his letter in their hands, with some Cypher in it, which they knew was of his writing, so that he was forced to acknowledge it. But upon the first notice he had that the busines was discover'd, he gave the Cypher (which he formerly had received from the King his Father) into the keeping of Mrs. Kilvert, desiring her to hide it in some such part of the house, as was agreed betwixt them, that he might be in his power to recover it again, thō she herself shou'd be sent away.

The Duke
under examination.
OR: MEM:
Part I. p. 34.

The Duke had no sooner given this order, then there came to him a Committee of both houses, two Lords and four Commoners, who were sent on purpose to examine him. They began by shewing him the letter which he could not deny to be his own hand writing, they then ask'd him for the Cypher, to which he answer'd, That he had burnt it: After this they examin'd him on severall other particulars, and press'd him exceedingly to discover to them, who had been assisting to him in his intended escape, but found him so very reserued in all which related to that affaire, that he would acknowledge nothing of it; thō they urged so far, as to intimate to him, the danger he run of being sent prisoner to the Tower, in case he would not be ingenuous (so they term'd it) and discover his accomplices. But when they saw that none of their artifices could prevail over his settled resolution, they at last left him: and upon their report made to both houses, the Earle of Northumberland was charged to keep a stricter watch over him, till they had come to a resolution how to dispose of him. It was moved by many amongst them to have sent the Duke to the Tower, and it was once in a probability of being so ordered, but when the first heat was over, by the help of some moderate men in the house of Commons, it was carryd in the negative, and the charge of the Duke (as above mention'd) committed to the Earle of Northumberland, which he made difficulty of accepting, and declared he would not be answerable for him, or incurr any blame by his escape, if it should so happen. It was then agreed that nothing should be imputed to him in case of any miscarriage, and thus taking the Duke in his own terms, he continued to be his Governor ; only he desir'd them to appoint some persons who might have a particular eye over his Royall Highness, to prevent his escape, because he would not oblige himself to that part of the employment ; This they granted him, and farther they extorted from the Duke a promise that he would not receive no letters from any person whomsoever without imparting them to the Earle of Northumberland ; But nothing they cou'd do or say to him was capable of hindering him from endeavouring his escape.

And even in the very heat of this affaire while the Duke was yet under examination, he began to forme a new design for his liberty, by the assistance of Mr. George Howard brother to the Earle of Suffolk who at that time was his Master of Horse, and was placed in his service by the Parliament. Him (he) absolutely gain'd, and sent him to Coll: Joseph Bamfeild, whom he knew to have been employ'd about the same affaire before the discovery of the last design, there having been severall persons intrusted in it, which in all probability was the reason that it was discover'd ; But Bamfeild's part in it not being arrived to the knowledge of the Parliament, he had not been obliged to depart the Town, as many others had been forced to do. His Royall Highness being therefore sensible of the hazard he had run by the discovery of his last attempt, was resolv'd absolutly to committ the management of this to no hands, but only theirs ; and to reject whatsoever propositions shou'd be made by any others in order to his escape. By this means he had the better opportunity of concealing his

P A R T
I.

1647.

The Duke formes a new design for his Liberty. The success and various adventures thereof.

P A R T intentions : In pursuance of which he refused to receive a letter which was brought him from the Queen his mother, thō it came by one whom he knew to be honest, and might have safely trusted ; which exceedingly surprized the bearer who had long watch'd an opportunity to deliver it ; At last he found, thō they strictly observed all the Duke's actions, the means of offering it, as his R: Highness went into the Tennis-Court at St. James's ; and while he was slipping it into the Duke's hand, he told him softly, It was from the Queen ; to which the Duke only answered, I must keep my promise, and for that reason can not receive it ; saying this, he passed onward so that no notice was taken of the action. When this was afterwards related to the Queen, she was much displeas'd with the Duke, and could not imagine what he meant by refusing a letter from her ; but some time after she was satisfied of the reason. And indeed 'twas necessary for him to be very circumspect, for had he been discover'd in those practices, his former experience sufficiently told him how it was likely to have gone with him.
I.

1647.

1648.

All ready for the Duke's escape the 20th Aprill.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 37.

But notwithstanding all the diligence which was used by Bamfeild, it was the 20th of Aprill before all things were in readiness for the Duke's escape. During the whole management of this affaire there was no one particular of it committed to paper ; neither was it necessary ; Mr. George Howard every day carrying verball messages betwixt the Duke and Bamfeild, which was all the part he had in the imployment.

The Duke
after supper go's to play at hide and seek, to cover his design'd escape.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 37.

All things being in this readines, on the night of the fore-mentioned day, the Duke went to supper at his usuall hour (which was about seven) in the company of his Brother and Sister ; when supper was ended, they went to play at Hide and Seek, with the rest of the young people in the house : At this childish sport the Duke had accustom'd himself to play for a fortnight together every night, and had us'd to hide himself in places so difficult to find that most commonly they were half an hour in searching for him; at the end of which time he usually came out to them of his own accord: This blind he layd for his design, that they might be accustomed to miss him, before he really intended his escape; By which means, when he came to practise it in earnest, he was secure of gaining that half houre, before they could reasonably suspect he was gone.

His invention had all the effect he could desire: for that night, so soon as they began their play, he pretended according to his custom to hide himself, but in stead of so doing, he went first into his Sister's chamber, and there lock'd up a litle dog which us'd to follow him, that he might not be discover'd by him; Then, slipping down by a paire of back stairs which led into the inmost garden, having found means before hand to furnish himself with a key of a back door from the said garden into the park, he there found Bamfeild who was ready to receive him, and waited there with a footman who brought a cloke, which he threw over him and put on a perriwig. From thence they went through the spring-garden, where one Mr. Tripp was ready with a hackney-coach, which carried them as far as Salisbury-house. There the Duke went out of the coach with Bamfeild as if he had intended some visite in that house, and Tripp went forward with the coach, having received directions to drive into the City, and keep the coach as long as he could conveniently at that end of the Town. But when they were gone, the Duke and Bamfeild went down Ivy-Lane, wher they took boat, and landed again on the same side of the River close by the bridge. From thence they went into the house of one Loe a surgeon where they found Mrs. Murray, who had women's cloths in a readines to disguise the Duke. Being immediatly dress'd in them, he departed thence, attended by Bamfeild and his footman to Lyon-key, where there waited a barge of four oars, into which they

P A R T
I.

1647.

1648.

The Duke disguises himself in women's cloths, and attended by Bamfeild go's down the river in a Barge of 4 oars.
Or: MEM:
P: 1: p: 38.

P A R T enter'd and so went down the River, the tide serving for the
I. passage.

1648.

The Master of the Barge very jealous.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 38.

'They were no sooner in the barge but the master began to suspect somewhat; for when Bamfeild bespoke his attendance there with his barge, he had only told him, he was to bring a freind, but now finding a young woman was brought without other company, it made him jealous there was something more in the busines then he had first imagin'd; The consideration of which did so much affright him, that his whole discourse in going down was imployd in telling them, It was impossible to pass by the Blockhouse at Gravesend without discovery, and that they had no other way to get on boord the Ship which waited for them in the Hope, then to land at Gravesend, and from thence procure a paire of oares to carry them on ship-boord. And when Bamfeild debated the matter with him, shewing the difficulty and hazard of procuring a boat which shou'd convey them to their ship, he rais'd new objections of his own danger from the shining of the Moon and other inconveniences; but while they two were thus reasoning the matter, the master of the barge became fully satisfied concerning those suspitions which he had, that this woman was some disguised person of considerable quality; for peeping through a cranny of the door into the barge room, where there was a candle burning befor the Duke, he perceiv'd his Royall Highnes laying his leg upon the table, and plucking up his stocking in so unwomanish a manner, that he concluded his former surmizes of him were undoubted truths, as he afterwards acknowledg'd to them.

The Duke discovers himself to the master of the Barge.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 39.

This Vision so absolutely confounded him, that he hardly knew what he did or said; which they perceiving, that (thought) it best for them to confess the truth, and trust him with their lives, being well assured before hand of his honesty. Therupon the Duke told him who he was, and with all assured him he would not be unmindfull of this action, but take care of his fortune, and provide for him ; And that if he thought it hazardous to return to London, he would carry him over with him into Holland.

P A R T
I.

1648.

This ingagement confirm'd his mind, and then he assur'd them, that he would venture to pass by the Blockhouses at Gravesend, without setting them a shore, which he accordingly perform'd: For when they approached the Town, he put out the light, and suffer'd the barge to drive down with the tyde, by which means they past undiscover'd by the block houses, and arrived at the Ship, which was a Dutch pinck of seventy tuns, that lay ready for them at the upper end of the Hope, and had already been discharged at Gravesend: Sir Nich: Armorer, Collonell Mayard, and Richard Johnson, with each of them a servant attending on him, were already before them on shipboord, in expectation of the Duke's coming which Bamfeild had intrusted to their knowledge, that by their assistance they might be masters of the Vessell, in case there shou'd be occasion for it.

He go's aboard of a Dutch Pink that Bamfeild had prepar'd for him, to carry him to Holland. Ibid.

At break of day, they get their anchors aboard, and setting sayle with a faire wind, the next morning early came to an anchor before Flushing: There they stayd, expecting the benefit of a tyd to carry them up to Middleburg. The master of the Ship with two of his five hands, went ashore to Flushing in his boat, intending to be back again by that time the water was high enough to carry him to Middleburg. But before he return'd, Owen the master of the barge, who was come along with the Duke, came down with great amazement into the litle cabban where His R. Highnes was with the rest of the Company, and told them, That there was a Parliament Frigate just coming in, which he was confident came in pursuit of them ; that she wou'd be up with them immediatly, and therefore they ought to get their anchor on boord as speedily as they

The Duke comes to an anchor before Flushing.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 40.

P A R T

I.

1648.

were able, and without losing time set sayl for Middleburg. One of the company then asking him, whither he were assured it was a Frigate, he, who was a seaman, so positively affirm'd it, that none amongst them having at that time any knowledge of Sea affaires, they were easily perswaded to beleieve him; where upon they gave orders to the two Seamen, who were remaining still on boord, to get up their anchor, and set sayle, which they refusing to perform till such time as the master shou'd return, they forced them to comply with their orders, by the help of the two servants; and John Owen charg'd himself with carrying the Ship to Middleburg in safety notwithstanding he was told by the Seamen, that there was hardly sufficient water, and that he ran the hazard of loosing the Vessell. But the fear he had of the English Ship, which he took for a man of war that follow'd them, prevail'd above the other of running on ground; though afterwards it prov'd only to be a merchant man: According as he had been foretold, the Ship struck twice upon the Barr; yet at length they got over safely, and without any dammage to the Vessell, it being flood; And they were no sooner over the skole places, then Owen himself acknowledg'd his mistake. And the Master coming on boord at the same time, they arriv'd at Middleburg before the tyde was wholly spent.

The Duke in danger of Shipwrack.
On: MEM:
P: 1: p: 41.

He arrives at Middleburg.
Ibid.

Sends Bamfeild to the Hague to give notice of his arrival. Ibid.

Is met by the Prince and P^{er} of Orange at Maesland Slyce and carryd to Honslardyke.
Ibid.

The Duke went on shore in his woman's habit and continued there that night; the next day he took boat for Dort; where being arriv'd, he sent away Bamfeild to the Hague to give notice to his Sister and the Prince of Orange of his being there, and to provide him with some cloths, not having brought over any with him, besides the disguise which he then wore. Immediately (they) sent their Yachts to bring him to Maesland Slyce, whither his sister came to meet him; the Prince of Orange having before mett him, as he pass'd by the Brill, and so soon as he was landed they carryd him to their house of Honslardÿke. P A R T

I.

Having thus related the Duke's escape, it will not be impertinent to give an account of what pass'd at St James's after his departure. He had not gone an hour from thence, before they began to miss him, and to search for him in every room of the house. Where not finding him, they sent immediate notice of it to Whitehall, and to the Generall St Thomas Fairfax. Thereupon there were orders issued out, that all the passages about London should be layd for him, especially the northern road, and those towards Wales, imagining he had either taken that way or towards Scotland. Directions were also given to stop all the Ports; but he was already pass'd by Gravesend before their orders came: And they gave not over their searching for him, till they had news from Holland that he was there.

1648.
The allarme at St. James's upon notice of the Duke's escape.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 42.

Soon after this, happen'd the rising in Kent, upon which all the men of war then riding in the Downes declar'd allso for his Majesty, and turn'd all their Officers on shore, making a new choice of Commanders among themselves, whose Loyalty and conduct they might trust; which action was so extraordinary that it deserves a particular relation.

The rising in Kent. Ibid.

Rainsborough who commanded the Fleet then riding in the Downes, which consisted of one 2^d rate, one 3^d rate, three or four 4th rates, one 5th rate, and three or four 6th rates besides some Ketches, having notice given him, that the three Castles in the Downes were surprized and seized by those of Kent, who had declared for his Majesty, and being further inform'd that the Town of Deal had been very instrumentall in it, he went on boord of a Ketch, that he might go neerer in to the shore, therby the better to observe what they (were) doing in that Town.

From thence he sent order to his Ships to weigh and get them under sail to stand in as near as they cou'd possibly to

P A R T
I.

1648.

A very extraordinary action of one Lindale a Bosen, who with the help of three common Seamen was the means of bringing off a whole Squadron of Ships to the King. Ibid.
P: 43.

the shore to batter the Town, and do all the mischief in their power: According to this order they fell to work to get their anchors on board, which while they were performing in the Constant Reformation (Rainsborough's own Ship) and were heaving at the Capstern, one of the boatswain's Mates by name Rob: Lindale, thought it then the most proper time to execute the resolution which he had formerly taken, and had communicated to three seamen of the same Ship, whom he found to be of his own principles, of doing the King some considerable service in the Fleet; Accordingly he and they, as they were heaving at the Capstern, began to grumble at the orders which they had received, and more at the employment which was impos'd on them, saying aloud, That they knew no reason they had to batter the Town of Deal, which was full of their wives, children and relations, and to involve them all in that destruction. When they saw this argument began to work on their Companions, they pursued their point, and said, It would be much more honest and more for their interest to joyn with them who had already risen, and declare likewise for his Majesty: Immediately the whole Company of the Ship took the word, and cryd one and all, for the King. Lindale then told them, he believ'd the lieutenant and some other officers of the Ship wou'd be against it, and that therefore they ought speedily to take possession of the gun room, and ther arm themselves; which being done they might easily secure their officers, and any others which shou'd refuse to joyn with them.

This was immediatly perform'd; and then Lindale went up and seiz'd the officers, telling them plainly their resolution of declaring for the King; and presuming he shou'd not have their concurrence in it, yet he assur'd them that when their work was done, they shou'd be fairely set a shore with all their goods, together with those in their company who shou'd desire it, but that in the mean time, for the common security, they must go into the hold. The Lieutenant and one or two of the other Officers, seeing there was no remedy, submitted without resistance to this order, and glad they were to receive no worse usage. This being done, and all things quietly settled in that Ship, and having secured some others whom he look'd upon as disaffected, he got the Ship under Sail, and went up along the broadside of the Ship that was nearest, declaring what he had already done, and exhorting them to follow his example and secure their disaffected Officers, or otherwise he would sink them : In this manner he went from Ship to Ship, till every one had declar'd for the King. Hereupon Rainsborough seeing his Fleet was under sail, and yet that it came not up to him according to his order, but that they were plying to and again, and speaking to each other, went to them in his Ketch to inquire into the meaning of this odd cariage ; and coming up with his own Ship, ask'd for what reason they had work'd after that manner ? and at the same time offer'd to haue gone aboard. But they resolutely told him, that he must not set his foot within the Ship, for they had declar'd for the King, that they wou'd however presently send off to him his goods and servants, together with some Officers whom they had detain'd ; this they immediatly perform'd : but when in the mean time he was entering into farther treating with them, and endeavouring to perswade them to return (as he term'd it) to their obedience, they bad him forbear any discourse of that nature, or otherwise they wou'd fire at him : He seeing it in vain to urge any further arguments, lay by without saying any more, till they had sent him what they promised him ; and then went away in his Ketch up the River, to give notice to the Parliament of what had happen'd. On boord all the other Ships they also turn'd out their Commanders, permitting only some Warrant Officers to stay, of whose Loyalty they were all assur'd.

P A R T

I.

1648.

And now having executed their design, they thought it time to send to the Kentish-men, and let them know what they had done, desiring the gentlemen in that County who were Seamen to come on boord and to command them. In pursuance of which request, S^r William Palmer, Captain Bargrave, Captain Fogg and others, went to them and took the command of their Ships upon them, filling up the vacant places of those Officers whom they had sent away. But before they cou'd put themselves in a readines of sailing out of the Downes, the Earle of Warwick came down to them in a Ketch, being sent thither by the Parliament, to try if he cou'd be more successfull then Rainsborough had been to seduce them from their obedience to his Majesty.

Accordingly the Earle sent to know, If they wou'd suffer him to come on boord, and speak with them? In return to which message, they sent one of the three Seamen who had been so instrumentall in this affaire, to demande what business he had with them; of which they desir'd to be satisfied, before he shou'd have permission to come on boord. To this the Earle replyd, that he was commissioned by the Parliament to come to them and offer them what satisfaction they cou'd desire, with a pardon for what had already pass'd, in case they would receive him on boord of them, and again declare for the Parliament: that farther he was encouraged by a letter from some amongst them to come down, and that they had invited him, with assurance of success in that negociation. The Seaman answer'd, that for the promises made by the Parliament they did not value them; that as they had declar'd for his Majesty, so they were resolved to continue his loyall Subjects; that he knew not who they were who had written to his L^dsp, and invited him to come down amongst them, but that he was certain his own hand was not to that letter, and thereupon desir'd to see it. The Earle gave it him to read, and when he had perus'd.

it, he put it into his pocket; and sayd, That thō they could not permitt his Ldsp to come on boord, yet he wou'd take order that who ever had written that letter should immediatly wait on him.

P A R T
L 1648.

Having said this, he return'd on boord the Constant Reformation, with the letter in his hand, and so from Ship to Ship; sending off to the Earle every one of those persons who had subscribed that paper to him.

When the Earle found his perswasions were not prevalent, he sent to desire he might have one of their Ships for his better accommodation in going up the River, ingaging his word to them that it should be return'd. They complyd with this request, and sent him the Nicodemus a sixth rate Fregate, but he broke his promise, and never sent her back.

After this, when they had settled all things in every Ship, they thought the best thing they could do for the intrest of his Majesty, was to sayle for Holland, where they were inform'd the Duke of York was; for there they should be in a readines to receive such commands as either the Prince or the Duke should lay upon them for the service of his Majesty: And accordingly they made the best of their way to Helvoet-sluis, where they arrived about the latter end of May.

The Ships revolted from the Parliament service at Helvoet-sluis in May.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 48.

Upon their arrivall, they sent to advertise the Duke of what had pass'd, who went immediatly to them, and stayd with them on boord, till the Prince came by Sea from France, and took himself the command of that Fleet; with which some few days after he put out to Sea, and sayl'd into the Downes, leaving the Duke in Holland with his sister; and having before his departure discharg'd Bamfeild from the Duke's service, who being a man of a turbulent intriguing head, had been tampering with the Seamen even while the Duke was on boord with them, and driving on a Presbyterian intrest to the great disturbance of his Majesty's service: for he had push'd the design so far, that he

The Duke
takes the command of them till the Prince his brother came.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 48.

The Prince sayles into the Downes: Leaves the Duke in Holland. Ibid.

Bamfeild being a turbulent man and carrying on a Presbyterian intrest, is discharg'd the Duke's service.
Ibid.

P A R T
I.

1648.

attempted to make use of his credit with the Duke, to have set up that intrest against the Prince; But his propositions being rejected by the Duke and discover'd to the Prince, that unquiet man lost all the advantages that he might have reasonably expected from those Services which he had lately perform'd. And the Duke was so justly incensed against him, that he would never afterwards readmitt him into his service, thō divers applications were made to him on his behalf: Yet in consideration of what he had perform'd for the Duke, his Royall Highness supplyd his wants, as well as he was able in that low condition to which he was reduced himself, and continued those effects of his charity to him, till some time after his Majesty's Restoration, when he ran himself into such insufferable misdemeanours, that it was no longer fitt for the Duke to supply him.

The Prince returns to the Fleet to Helvoet-sluis.
On: MEM.
P: 1. p: 49.

About the end of the summer, the Prince return'd with the Fleet under his command to Helvoet-sluis, and from thence he went to the Hague. Not long afterwards, the Earle of Warwick with the Parliament Fleet came to Helvoet-sluis; but the Dutch interposing their authority in their own port, hinder'd either side from committing any Act of hostility against each other. When the Earle had stayd till the approach of winter and found he could perform nothing against the King's Fleet, he return'd with the Parliament's from England: and during the same winter, after the Parliament's Ships were gone, the command of the remaining part of his Majesty's Ships was conferr'd on Prince Rupert, who together with his brother Prince Maurice went with them first to Ireland, and from thence to Portugal, then to Streights, and lastly to the West Indies, where Prince Maurice with many of the Ships were lost, it having never been certainly known where they were cast away, nor any news ever since heard of them: Only it was beleev'd, they suffered Ship-wrack amongst the Virginia

The command of the King's Fleet conferr'd on Prince Rupert. Ibid.

Prince Maurice with many of the Ships lost in the West Indies.
Ibid. p: 50.

Islands; Before this loss happen'd, Prince Rupert's own Ship the Constant Reformation founder'd under him in a great tempest, so that he only saved himself, and two or three others, not without great difficulty and hazard on boord his brother's Ship; and after having run many adventures, return'd into Europe in the year 1653, and landed at Nantes.

The Duke stayd about eight months in Holland from his first arrival thither; having passed all the Christmas at the Hague with his brother the Prince and his sister the Princesse of Orange. The day after twelfth day he began his journey to France in obedience to the commands of the Queen his mother. He took his way by Brussells, and when he was come as far as Cambray, he received a letter from the Queen which gave him to understand what had happen'd at Paris on twelfth night: The summ of all was this, That the King of France had been constrain'd by the disorders in that City, to leave it for his own security; and that he and the Court were removed to St Germain's: that this was done with so much precipitation, that he was forced to go away in the night, but that having thus secur'd himself and drawn his forces together, he had blocked up Paris with his Army with a resolution of reducing them to their obedience; her Majesty concluded with her commands to him to continue where that letter found him, till he should receive her further orders.

The Arch Duke Leopold, then Governour of the Low Countries, hearing of his R: Highness stay in Flanders, sent one of his cheif officers to him with a very civill message, and offers of some more commodious place for his abode then that frontier Town in which he then was, proposing the Abbaye of St Amand, which was but one day's journey back: which being accepted by the Duke, he went thither, where he was nobly entertain'd by the Monks who were of St Bennet's order, and stayd there 'till the 8th of February. At which time he receiv'd

PART I.

1648.
P: Rupert after four years absence lands safe in France, in 1653.

OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 50.
The Duke
after eight months stay in Holland begins his journey to France the 6. January 1648.

1648.
The Duke stopp'd in his journey at Cambray by a letter from the Queen.
Ibid.

The Duke nobly intertain'd at the Abbey of St Amand by the Monks.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 51.

P A R T

I.

164th.

The Duke arrives in Paris the 13th of Feb. Ibid.

Here the Queen and
the Duke receive the news of the horrid murder of the King.
Ibid.

The Duke waits on the King and Queen of France at St Germain's, his reception there.
OR: MEM:
P: 1. p: 51.

He returns to Paris, and stays with the Queen his mother.
The King his brother arrives from Holland and both pass the Summer at St Germain's.
Ibid.

1649.

letters from the Queen with her commands to come to Paris. In pursuance of which he return'd to Cambray, from thence went to Peronne, and so on to Paris, where he arrived on the 13th of February: For thō the Town continued still to be block'd up by the King's Army, yet he had leave obtain'd for him to go into it, and to be there with the Queen his mother.

A day or two after the Duke's arrivall in Paris, he heard of the most horrid murder of the King his Father; and what impression that made both upon the Queen and the Duke, may be more easily imagin'd, then express'd.

About the same time the Parisians feeling the smart of their Rebellion, and growing sensible that they could no ways be releev'd, came to terms of accommodation, and submitted to the King. When the Peace was made, the Duke went to St Germain's to wait on the King and Queen of France, where he was received with all the kindnes he could expect, and treated with all the magnificence due to his quality, in the same manner as if the Royall Family had still continued in their former greatnes.

After this his Royall Highness return'd to Paris, and there stayd with the Queen his Mother till the King his Brother came out of Holland into France; and then they went together to St Germain's, the French Court being remov'd from thence to Paris.

The intention of the King's journey into France was reported to be only in order to take it in his way to Ireland, which had declared for him, and was at that time almost intirely under his obedience, there being litle left in the possession of the Rebels, but Dublin and Londonderry; But in stead of passing only through the Contry, his Majesty stayd allmost all the summer at St Germain's, and at last was overperswaded to change his resolution of going streight to Ireland and instead therof to go to Jersey, whither he set forth on the 19th of September and tooke the Duke along with him.

On the 26th of the same month his Majesty arrived at Cōutance, and from thence he went down next morning to Coutenville, where he had appointed to embarke. When he was come thither, most were of opinion that it would be convenient for his Majesty to stay there till next day ; during which time he might inform himself whither the Coast were clear of Parliament Ships, before he adventur'd his person in going over. The Duke and Sir John Berkley were the only two who oppos'd that Counsell, and advised that he should immediatly imbarke, which they carryd, and it may be truely said, that they thereby preserv'd his Majesty. The reason which they gave was this, That in all probability there could be no danger if he put to Sea that day, because the wind was but newly come up easterly, and therefore that the Parliament Ships which lay at Guernesey could not take advantage of getting up time enough to hinder him from landing ; but in case he should defer it till the next morning, they might have leasure to put themselves between him and home.

This advicce, as is said, prevailing with his Majesty, he sett sayle immediatly, and in the space of three hours he landed safe in Jersey : The next morning (as had been foreseen) by break of day six or seven of the Rebells Ships appear'd, which gaue chase to the Vessells in which the King's horses were imbarked ; they not setting out till the morning, to avoid being taken, were forced to venture in amongst the Rocks, with all which hazard they had much ado to escape the Enemy ; which makes it evident, that if the King had follow'd the same method, he must have run the Same hazard.

Whilst his Majesty with the Duke stayd in that Island, they received the uncomfortable news of the defeat of the Lord of Ormonde, and the Confederate Loyall Party before Dublin ;

P A R T
I.

1649.

The King's and the Duke's expedition to Jersey in September.
Ibid. p: 52.

The affairs of Ireland in a bad condition.
Or: MEM:
P: 1: pag. 53.

P A R T
I.

1649.
The King lays aside the thoughts of going into that Kingdom.
Ibid.

Addresses made to the King in Jersey from Scotland.
Ibid.

After which, and the raising of the Seige of Londonderry, his Majesty's affairs in Ireland were in so desperate condition, that the thought of going thither was absolutly layd aside; and therefore the two Dutch men of war which the Prince of Orange had sent to Jersey for the King's transportation into Ireland, were sent back to Holland.

Not long after that, before his Majesty parted from Jersey, some addresses were made to him from Scotland, which were brought him by one Windram a Very loyall gentleman. Vpon which his Majesty took a resolution of returning into Holland, which he judged to be the most proper place of treating with his Subjects of that Kingdom, the best part of which had ever since the murder of the King his Father, protested against and oppos'd the wicked and violent proceedings in England.

1650.

The King go's to Holland, the Scots' Commissioners attend him at Breda, wher all things being agreed, he passes over into Scotland.
On: MEM:
P: 1. p: 53.
The Duke
left at Jersey.
Ibid.

In order to this, the spring being now come, his Majesty past over into France, And after having stayd some time at Beauuais with the Queen his Mother, who came thither from Paris purposely to meet him, he pursued his journy into Holland, and having at Breda agreed all things with the Scots' Commissioners he went over into that Kingdom.

In the mean time the Duke was left behind at Jersey, where he stayd till the beginning of September, And then (being so commanded by his Majesty) he return'd into France, arriving at Paris on the 17th of the same month he stayd not long in that City; for in the same letter wherein the King had order'd him to leave Jersey, there were some ambiguous expressions which seem'd to intimate that he desir'd he would go to Holland. These doubtfull words were made use of by some about the Duke, in whom he repos'd the greatest confidence, to make him leave France, particularly by Sir George Ratcliff, Dean Stuart (whom the King had commanded to attend him) and Doctor Killigrew his Chaplain. These having some designs

Returns to Paris in Sep:
Ibid.

of their own, were so urgent with him to have him pass into Holland, that notwithstanding the Queen was wholly averse from it, yet she could not oblige him to stay at Paris, from which place he departed on the 4th of October, and arrived at Brussels on the 13th.

There he continued for some time, receiving first the sad news of the death of his sister the Princesse Elizabeth, who dyd in September at Carisbrook Castle in the Isle of Wight; and afterwards that of the Scots' defeat at Dunbarr, which happen'd on the 3^d of the same month.

After the Duke had been a while in Brussells, he sent to his Sister the Princesse of Orange concerning his coming into Holland; But the Queen having written to her from Paris, in what manner the Duke was come from thence, and how unsatisfied she was with him, the Princesse advis'd his Royall Highness to deferr his journey into Holland, letting him know how much she was concern'd for the Queen's displeasure to him, and that it was necessary he should first endeavour to make his peace with her Majesty, before she could, with respect to the Queen, invite him to come to her. This letter from his Sister obliged him to stop at Brussels till these differences could be composed; where, not long after, he received the afflicting news of the death of the Prince of Orange who dyd of the small pox about the beginning of November. This was indeed one of the greatest losses which in that juncture of time could possibly befall the Royall family; But to allay this Sorrow in some measure, soon after came the news that his Sister was deliver'd of a Son (the present P^{ce} of Orange) who was born on the 14th of the same month, nine days after the decease of his Father.

The Duke having thus continued at Brussells till the middle of December, went from thence to Rhenen, a house belonging to the Queen of Bohemia in the province of Utrecht, which he

P A R T
I.

1650.

The Duke at Brussels gets the news of the death of his sister P^{ce} Elizabeth, and of the Scots' defeat at Dunbar.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 54.

The P^{ce} of Orange dys of the small pox in November.
Ibid.

Birth of the present P^{ce} of Orange 14 November.
Ibid.

The Duke go's from Brussels to Rhenen in December.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 54.

P A R T
I.

1650.

Is reduced to great hardships for want of money. Ibid.

had borrowed of her, resolving to live privatly there, till he could perswade his Sister to let him come to the Hague.

During all this while he was reduced to great hardships; for when he left Paris, he was wholly unfurnish'd of mony, and had he not been casually supplyd with the tenths of some Prizes, which were taken by the Jersey Fregats to the northwards, and which by reason of contrary winds had put into Dunkirk, he could not possibly haue subsisted, (and) must have been driven to the last extremitys.

1657.

The Duke comes to the Hague the 12 of January, and stays there all the winter.

The Duke go's to Breda, to avoid meeting the Parliament's embass^r.
On: MEM:
P: 1: p: 54.

So soon he was come to Rhenen, he sent again to his Sister to press his going to her; and not long afterwards she sent him word that he might come, she having now obtain'd the Queen's permission for it. When the Duke had received the wellcom news he immediatly left Rhenen, and came to the Hague on the 12th of January where he continued all that winter, till such time as the Embassadors from the English Rebels were to be received there; and then thinking it no way proper for him to remain in a Town where they were to make their solemn entry, and to avoide the mortification of so disagreeable a sight, when the murderers of his Father were to be received in State, he retired from the Hague to pass some time in the City of Breda.

But when the formalities of that ceremony were over, his Royall Highness return'd and liv'd with so much circumspection at the Hague, that he never met with those Embassadors in the streets. And he had the less difficulty to avoid them, because as on the one side it could not be very pleasing to him to incounter them in a place, where it was not permitted him to take that revenge on them which they well deserved; so on the other, the States had been cautious enough to hinder it, by obliging both him and them to avoid each other, as justly apprehending what might be the consequences of such a meeting; and this warines in the States was no more then necessary at that time (when it was their intrest to make their court to England) considering how much those Embassadors were hated by the common people, who would gladly have layd hold in the least occasion to have them in pieces. Indeed the best endeavours and all the authority they could employ, was but barely sufficient to protect those English from being assaulted in their house, for which reason they were forced to assign them a guard of foot, to secure them from receiving some signall affront; and notwithstanding all this foresight, both themselves and those of their Train had many indignities put upon them by the populace.

In the beginning of June the Duke received a letter from his Majesty then in Scotland, by which he commanded him to return to Paris, and withall Signifyd his displeasure for his removall from thence; And by the same letter he was order'd to dismiss Doctor Killigrew from his service, and no more to follow the advice of Sir George Ratcliff, but to submit himself, and be intirely govern'd by the directions of the Queen his Mother; all which commands were immediatly obeyd by his Royall Highness, who accordingly left the Hague, and went for France and arriv'd at Paris towards the end of June.

The Duke being now of an age capable of enduring fatigue, the Queen his Mother out of the care she had for him, that he might improve his knowledge and forme himself for action, resolv'd to send him along with the Court of France when they should leave Paris, of which there was then a probability; And in pursuance of this design she ask'd leave of the Queen and Cardinall, that he might follow the King of France. They readily approv'd of the proposition, with assurances that he should be particularly in their care: But before the French Court went out of Paris, there came news, That the affairs of his Majesty in Scotland went so ill, that he was forced upon a

P A R T
I.

1651.

The Duke receives a letter from the King to return to Paris.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 55.

He arrives at Paris in June.
Ibid.

P A R T
I.

1651.

The Duke hinder'd from accompanying the Court of France by the news of the King's defeat at Worcester.

OR: MEM:

P: 1: p: 56.

The King landed at Feschamp in Oct: Ibid.

desperate resolution of marching into England ; and soon after came the confirmation of his defeat at Worcester, which caus'd the Queen to alter her design of sending the Duke to accompany the Court ; and therefore when they left the Town, which was in the latter end of September, and went towards Berry, the Duke remain'd in Paris with her Majesty, where they were all in dreadfull apprehension for the King, and continu'd in that fearfull amazement till the midst of October, when they receiv'd the comfortable news of his Majestys being safely landed at Feschamp in Normandy, being attended only by the Lord Wilmott.

Wee shall not here relate the particular manner of the King's escape, nor all the hazards he ran, or hardships which he endur'd from the time of his being forced to disguise himself, till that of his arrivall in France, Only in generall say, That had not God endued him with much presence of mind and resolution, as well as given him a strong constitution of body, he could never have escaped from England in so almost miraculous a way.

The Duke
go's and meets the King at Magny.

OR: MEM:

P: 1: p: 57.

Cardinal de Retz affectionat to the King, a particular instance of it.
Ibid.

On the news of his arriual, the Duke thought it his duty to go and meet him : he had the happiness of seeing him at Magny a place between Paris and Rouen, and afterwards attended him to Paris ; where he was not only wellcom'd by the Queen his Mother, but received by all the persons of quality then in Town, with all the demonstrations of joy which could possibly be expected. In particular the Cardinal de Retz when he came to wait on him, offer'd to lend him a considerable sum of mony, which, being in gold, he for that purpose brought along with him in his coach. But thō he pressed him exceedingly to take it, his Majesty excused himself with many thanks from receiving it. And not only on this, but on all other occasions, that Cardinall allways shew'd himself most affectionate in his interest and service.

His Majesty had not been long in Paris, before some private overtures, at least intimations, were made to him from some confidants of Madmoiselle, eldest daughter to the Duke of Orleans, concerning a marriage to be made betwixt them. Which proposition was then readily embraced by him, and was likewise approved by the Queen his mother. And he proceeded so far, that the King was every day to visite her; She at the same time giving him reason to beleve that it would succeed. But on the sudden he found her growing cooler, without knowing the occasion of it; so that he was obliged in prudence to forbear his frequent visites, till at length he came to understand the cause of this alteration in her behaviour, which in effect was this: Some who either were, or at least pretended to be her friends, put into her head the imagination of a marriage with the King of France, which they made her beleve they might compass with great ease, considering the ill condition of his affairs at that time. The Queen and Cardinall (as they perswaded her) would be forced to consent to it for their own security, and to draw themselves out of their present difficulties. This thought as unreasonable as it was, yet was so strongly imprinted in her mind, that it caus'd her wholly to break off with the King of England; by which means reaching at what she could not get, she lost what was in her power to have had, and miss'd both of them.

About the same time also a marriage was proposed to both their Majestys for the Duke. The person named was Madmoiselle de Longueville, only daughter to the Duke de Longueville, whom he had by his first wife who was Sister to the Count of Soissons: This Lady was at that time next to Madmoiselle the greatest match in France. The King and Queen of England approving it, proposed it to the Duke, who for his part being easily induced to it, the Treaty went so far

P A R T
I.

1651.

A proposall of marriage betwixt the King and M^{lle}.
Ibid.

M^{lle} de Longueville propos'd as a match for the Duke.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 58.

P A R T I. that the consent of the Court of France was ask'd, which being denyd it was broken off.

1652.

The spring of the year 1652 was now coming, and the Affairs of France were in such a posture, that there remain'd no hopes of an accommodation betwixt the King and the Princes, by the return of the Cardinal Mazarin, but on the other side a probability of great action in that Campagne. This being considered by the Duke, who was very desirous to improve himself that he might one day be fitt * to serve in the French King's Army as a volunteer, And thō when he made this proposition at first, all but Sir John Berkley opposed it, yet by daily urging it, he at length prevail'd, and had the consent both of the King and Queen to go.

The Duke obtains the King and Queen's consent to go and serve in the French King's Army.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 58.

The streights the Duke was in at his setting out to his first Campagne.
Ibid. p: 60.

When the Duke had obtain'd this, a greater difficulty still remain'd to be overcome, which was want of mony to furnish out an equipage, and to maintain his expences in the Army. Mony was then a scarce commodity in the English Court, which at last the Duke procur'd from a Gascoun call'd Gautier, who had served in England; Of him he borrow'd three hundred pistoles, which with a sett of Poland coach horses, brought out of that country by the Lord Crofts, and given him by the King his Brother, enabled his Royall Highness to fit himselfe out for the Campagne; without this assistance it had been impossible for him to set forth, for at that time mony abounded as litle in the French Court as in the English. Thus accommodated, the Duke set forth with his small equipage, his train consisting only of Sir John Berkley, Collonel Worden, two or three other servants, and as many groomes, without so much as a led-horse in case of necessity; his feild bed and all the equipage of his servants being carryd on two Mules, which were hired only as far as the French Army, where he was promised to be furnish'd with better conveniences for carriage. Yet he chose rather to go this way then not at all. He took care only to manage the busines as privately as he could, for fear of being stop'd, or that some other inconveniency should happen to him, if his intention of going to the King's Army had been divulged: Besides which consideration, it was not thought fitt for his Royall Highnes to take leave of his uncle the Duke of Orleans, against whose party he was going to ingage.

* Here some words appear to have been omitted by the Secretary, who probably intended to have written, "That he might one day be fitt to command, he resolved to serve," &c. — EDITOR.

P A R T
I.

1652.

To avoid all which inconveniences, the Duke accompanied the King his Brother to S^t Germain's, under a pretence of hunting; and after he had stayd there only three or four days, he sett out on his intended journey for the Army on the 21th of Aprill; and passing through the fauxbourg S^t Antoine, his way lying under the walls of Paris, he could reach no further that night then to Charenton.

The Duke parts from S^t Germain's the 21. of Aprill in order to joyne
the Army and begin his first Campaigne.
On: MEM:
P: 1: p: 60.

The next day he travell'd to Corbeil, where upon his arrivall, he found some companies of the regiment of Guards in the Suburbs; the Inhabitants having shutt their gates with a resolution not to receive them into the Town: Of which being inform'd by some Officers whom he met there, he was in great apprehension of not being admitted: However he presented himself at the gate, where they made difficulty of receiving him, yet having used some perswasions to them, they at length open'd the wickett, and permitted the Duke to enter on foot, with condition to leave his horses without the gate; and being once got in himself he wrought upon the Magistrats so far, as not only to take in his horses, but even the guard, by representing to them the danger they ran in case they should refuse them entrance: thō it was most certain, that had they continued to keep their gates shutt, the Court which then lay at Melun,

The Duke
perswades the Magistrats of Corbeil to receive the King of France's Guards into the Town, a good piece of service at that time.
On: MEM:
P: 1: p: 60.

P A R T would have found great difficulty in taking it, considering the
 I. strength of its scituation, and its nearness to Paris: And had 1652. not the King by this unexpected means gott possession of that Town, it had much prejudiced his affairs, as on the contrary it prov'd afterwards a very advantageous post, and was very usefull to him on Severall occasions. So soon as the Court, which (as is above related) lay then at Melun, heard of the admission of those Companies which had been purposely sent before to Corbeil, they came immediatly thither, where the Duke stayd expecting them; and there got a small recruit of mony, another horse and two Mules, all which came very seasonably to him; for he and his poor retenue had not above twenty pistoles left amongst them at their arrivall in that place.
 And the same evening being the 24th of Aprill, his Royall Higness went to Châtres, severall other volontiers of the Court accompanying him thither; and there he found the Army, which arriued at that Town but some few hours before him.

The Duke
 joyns the French Court and the French Army at Châtres the 24
 Aprill.
 OR: MEM.
 P: 1: p: 61.

BUT before we relate the actions of this Campagne and those which succeeded it while the Duke was in the French Army, it will be necessary to take the matter a litle higher, that the Reader may in some measure be inform'd of the State of Affairs, as they then stood in France.

State of the French Affairs when the Duke began his first Cam-pagne.
Ibid. pag. 62.

The Crown was reduced to a most deplorable condition in the beginning of this year; Few there were who preserved their loyalty to the King, and even they whose interest as well as duty it was to have maintain'd the Crown, were the chief instruments and causers of those distractions; grounding themselves on that common and plausible pretence which has occasion'd So many Rebellions in all ages,—namely, The removing evill Counsellors from about the person of the King; to make which Argument the more popular, they farther urged, how great a disreputation it was to France to be govern'd by a Stranger ; when so many Princes of the blood were both more capable, and more proper to undertake the Ministry then Cardinal Mazarin.

P A R T

I.

1652.

The heads of this Party were the Duke of Orleans, the King's unkeel, the Princes of Condé and Conty, both Princes of the blood, who were follow'd by a very considerable part of the Nobility and cheif Gentry of the Kingdom. To aggravat which mischeif, almost all the great and populous Towns, and most of the Parliaments, adhered to them ; as in the first place, Paris, Orleans, and generally all the Citys down the river of Loire, with Bordeaux and most of the inland Towns. And thō the Duke of Longueville with the Town and Parliament of Rouen did not positively declare themselves against the King, yet it was evident that they inclined to the Princes' Party ; To prove which there needs no other argument, then that in the midst of a Rebellion they sett up for a Neutrality, as being indeed desirous to be lookers on, and watch their opportunity to take part with the Strongest. For thō many overtures were made to them from the King, yet they found pretences to excuse themselves from receiving him into the Town, when his affaires were in the low condition that he was refused entrance by all the greatest Cities. In effect the poison was So generally spread through the whole Kingdom, that even the litle places took courage from the example of the greater, as has been already instanced in Corbeil, which had certainly persisted in excluding the King, if they had not distrusted their own strength.

To compleat the miserys of that Nation, they were not only imbroyl'd at home, but had their antient Enemies the Spaniards at their doors, who were ready to add fuell to their fire by all the means they could imagine, that they might make their profit of those distractions, by regaining in the space of some few months, what had been taken from them by the

P A R T French with great expence in length of time, and with the loss of
 I. many of their bravest men. Vndoubtedly they had in prospect 1652. far greater designs flattering themselves with the imagination that they shou'd either totally oppress the French, and ruine their Monarchi, or at least reduce them to so low a condition that they shou'd not be capable to attacke them of a long time. Tis reasonable to beleeeve they would have effected one of these, or at least gone farther then they did, had they taken their measures more justely ; but their too cautious maximes, both then and afterwards, render'd all their undertakings fruitless.

The affaires of France being in this posture, the Spaniards besides their large promises and making distribution of mony to severall of the cheif Malcontents, sent some Troopes from Flanders into France under the conduct of the Duke of Nemours, to strengthen the Army of the Princes ; he having been sent purposely to Brussels to demand their assistance. This Army of Spaniards which he led, enter'd France in the beginning of the spring ; their numbers were about seven thousand men in horse and foot, and they pass'd the Seyne at Mante ; of which place the Duke de Sully was then Governour, who granted them free passage, which had he not done, their march had been very much retarded, and they could not so soon have joyn'd the Princes' Army which was assembled about no far from

After the conjunction of the Princes' Army with the Spaniards, and the taking of Angers by the King, there was nothing done that was considerable till the action of Blesneau ; only one day as the King's Army was marching up along the river of Loire, that of the Princes came to Gergeau, and their Van had already possest themselves of one end of the bridge, and were preparing to make themselves masters of the Town, which had nothing of defence but an ordinary gate, and few or no Soldiers in it; so that had not Mons^r. de Turenne come luckily thither upon the first allarme, it had infallibly been taken, and the King's Army therby receiv'd a considerable disadvantage. But more Troopes coming up speedily to Mons^r. de Turenne, those of the Princes were forced to abandon their design, and retire with some loss of men; the most considerable of which was one Mons^r. Sirot a Lieutenant Generall accounted one of the best officers they had. After which the Court marched to Gien upon the Loire, where their Army pass'd the River and quarter'd about Blesneau, and the neighbouring Villages either upon or near the Canal de-Briare.

The Princes' Army march'd towards them and camped at Lorris. But some time before this, the Prince of Condé finding his affaires in Guienne to be in a very ill condition, not easily to be remedyd by him, and judging that his person was more necessary at Paris and to be at the head of his Army in those parts, he left Mons^r Marsin to command in cheif his forces in Guienne, and he himself attended only by four or five persons slip'd away as privatly as he could, for fear of being taken in his passage which lay through some of the King's quarters; and very narrowly escaping by the way, he arrived at Paris, whence he immediatly went to their Army, and there having intelligence how the King's forces lay, he resolved to fall into their quarters; for it was so early in the year, being about the midst of Aprill at furthest, that there was no forage, and consequently the King's Army was constrain'd to take their quarters scatteringly in severall Villages.

Monsieur de Turenne himself lay at Briare and the Marechal d'Hocquincourt at Blesneau, who having receiv'd intelligence that the Princes' Army was upon their march to him, resolv'd on a place d'armes, or rendez-vous, in case of an allarme, betwixt both their quarters, immediatly advancing guards towards the Enemy, and puting some dragoons at a

P A R T
I.

1632.

An account of the busines of Blesneau, wherein the conduct of Mons^r de Turenne preserved both the Army and the Crown of France.
Où: MEM:
P: 1: p: 72.

P A R T I.
 1652. pass, by which in all liklyhood they were to come. Being already in this posture, Mons^r. de Turenne who likewise had notice of the Enemy's approache with their resolution of falling into his quarters, went himself to the Mareschall d'Hocquincourt, who lay next the danger, to inform him of it. But he satisfyd himself with depending of his dragoons, who he thought would have given the Enemy a stop at the pass, thō the event prov'd much otherwise; for whither by treachery or cowardise the dragoons were no sooner attacked, then they quitted their posts, and left the pass open to the Enemy, who pursuing their advantage broke in immediatly to Mons^r d'Hocquincourts quarters, and beat them up one after another, litle resistance being made: nor was the loss of men considerable on either side, only all the baggage in the quarters were taken, but the beaten troops got off by favour of the night, yet the terrour was so great that they came not to the Rendez-vous appointed; neither did the Enemy pursue them so far as they might otherwise have done, because of the darknes, and indeed having a greater design in hand; for they well knew that Monsieur de Turenne was not far off, whom they made account infallibly to beat so soon as it was day if he drew not off before.

To confess the truth he ran a great hazard, and with him the Crown of France on that occasion: for had that small Army of his been once routed, in all probability the King had fallen into the Princes' hands, and what the consequence of it would have proved, may be easily imagin'd by the Licentiousness of those times, and the Ambition of some of the great men.

But to return to Mons^r. de Turenne, So soon as he had the allarme, he drew out of his quarters, and march'd to the Rendez-vous appointed; at the same time sending out small partys to bring him intelligence of the Enemy, who returning gave him an account that their Army was very near, and had beaten up the other quarter. It was then so very dark that it was impossible for him to consider the post he had taken up; to march forward was too dangerous, the Enemy being at so near a distance, and to retire might prove ruinous, because he was not with (without) a just apprehension of discouraging his men and putting them in a great confusion. Considering those hazards he prudently resolved to stand his ground, and thereby give leisure to his parties of coming to him: At the first dawn of the day he found himself close by the Enemy, and had the good fortune to observe an advantageous post where the Princes' Army could not possibly attack him, but by marching first through a sort of défilé where only one squadron could come afront, by reason of the wood that was on either side, and the marish grounds and ditches that were in the passage. Behind this passage he drew up his small body of men (for as yet none of the other quarter which was beaten were come up to him, neither indeed did they till the evening) Some of the Officers propos'd to him to line the wood with parties of foot the better to defend the pass; but he refused it, as he has since told the Duke, on this consideration, That being himself so weak and the Enemy so strong in foot, they would soon have beaten his men out of the wood, which must have obliged him to draw down to their relief, and perhaps so far engaged him, that he could never have gotten off without endangering his whole Army. In stead of this he took a more prudent resolution, and leaving the wood unguarded drew back above muskett shott from it and the pass; and there stood expecting what the Enemy would do. Who seeing him so advantageously posted, thought it too hazardous to attack him.

Thus they stood both sides in battell, looking on each other without moving, and for some time playing with their great guns; till Mons^r. de Turenne making a shew as if he would have march'd away, began to draw off in very good order ; which the Enemy observing thought it now their time of charging him : Wherupon they advanced with their whole Army in battell to the pass, their horse beginning to come over it. There were about six squadrons past the défilé, when Monsieur de Turenne turning back march'd towards them, so that they who already were come over, were forced to retreat in very great confusion, and that to prevent their absolute defeat. And the gross of their Army was then approached so near the pass, that Mareschall de Turenne retaking his former ground, play'd on them with his cannon all the remainder of the day, with great execution, they being so near a distance, and their troopes so closely crowded, that almost every shott took place. At the close of the evening, the troopes of Mareschall d'Hoquincourt came up and joyn'd with Mons^r. de Turenne, while they were yet in presence of the Enemy, so that the party was not now so unequall as before. However both of them thought fitt to draw off, and this was the conclusion of that Action, wherein the conduct and resolution of Mons^r. de Turenne preserv'd both the Army and the Crown of France; there being no Visible means of maintaining either after a defeat, if not from a totall ruine, at least from suffering such a change as would have produced a long train of discords and disorders in that Kingdom.

P A R T

I.

1652.

After the action of Blesneau, P^{mo} of Condé leaves the Army and go's to Paris.
OR: MEM:
P. 1: p: 79.

After this action the Prince of Condé left the Army and went to Paris, where he was received with great applause; his party magnifying the advantage he had got, above what really it was. But in the mean time his absence from his Army prov'd very prejudicial to their common intrest; for there was no Commander left in cheif: Mons^r. de Tavannes commanding the Princes' troopes, Mons^r. de Valon those of the Duke of Orleans, and Mons^r. de Clinchamp the Auxiliarys which were sent from Flanders. Therefore, as it allways happens where there is no supreme authority, nothing was so well order'd as it might have been. For besides the want of so great a Generall, as was the Prince, the Lieutenant Generalls, thō each of them had personall courage, were none of them fitt to head an Army. And as all great actions have been ever better managed and with more success by a single person, then by many whose power is coordinate, So in their particular condition it was most necessary for them to have had a Supreme Commander at their head, since, thō their intrest in generall seemed to be the same, yet all three were jealous of each other. However it was, Monsieur de Turenne made his advantage of this equality and independency amongst them; for notwithstanding that they lay not far distant from one another, he amus'd them so, that by taking great and well order'd marches (the Court moving at the same time) he gave them the slip, and got betwixt them and Paris; And though he was to take a great compass, and as it were to march round them, yet his diligence was such, that he arrived at Chartres on the 14th of Aprill, when they were got no farther then Etampes: And hereby gave an opportunity to the Court of getting to Paris, which was the resolution taken when he began his march. But what the reason was, why they went not thither is uncertain; for they had been press'd and perswad'd to it both by the Cardinal de Retz and by the most considerable of the King's party who resided in the Town; some attributed it to want of resolution in the Court, who were aw'd and fright'd by intelligence from such as being no freinds to the Cardinal, desir'd not to see the King in Paris. However it was, they stop at Melun, and from thence came to Corbeil about the same time that their Army arrived at Chartres, at which place the Duke of York joyn'd it (as has been before related) on the very night of their coming, and from hence forward his Royall Highness was present and ingaged in all the Actions of this Campagne.

P A R T
I.

1652.

OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 82.

P A R T
I.

1652.
The famous action of the Suburbs of Etampes. The first action in France the Duke was.
Ibid: p: 83.

There happen'd no considerable action for some litle time after the Duke's arrivall, only small partys were sent out towards Etampes, who brought in daily men and horses which they took at forage; and by those prisoners they understood that the Enemy's whole Army was quarter'd in that Town and Suburbs. But after some few days, Mons^r. de Turenne receiv'd a letter from Madmoiselle by a trumpett, in which she desir'd a pass to go to Paris, she having been at Orleans, which Town, by her presence and credit there, she had caus'd to declare for the Princes, and now in her way to Paris she could not avoid passing through both Armys: At first the Mareschall made some difficulty of granting it, without the leave and participation of the Court, and dispatch'd a messenger thither for that purpose; but before his return having consider'd that probably he might make some advantage of her request, and knowing on what day she would be at Etampes, he gratifyd her by the sending of a pass; and having understood by his partys, that the Enemy had not been out at forage for two or three days last past, he conjectur'd that on that day, which was the 3^d of May, Madmoiselle would see the Army, and that on the next she wou'd go away for Paris, so that he reckon'd they would not go out to forage till the 4th; That the forage having been so long deferr'd would be great, and that it was likely enough they would not be very carefull, but that most of the Generall Officers would conduct Madmoiselle part of the way; So that weighing all these Circumstances, he and Monsieur d'Hocquincourt resolv'd to march away all night with the whole Army, leaving only an hundred horse and a small regiment of foot to guard the baggage, which was left at Châtres.

The King's Army commanded by
Mr. de Turenne and Mr. d'Hocquincourt marches to Etampes.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 85.

This they put in immediate execution, giving but an houres warning for preparation, and that without beat of drum or sound of trumpett, beginning the march about eight of the clock at night. Their design was to have put themselves between the Enemy's Army and their foragers, thinking, as has been already said, that the foragers would be out at the time computed, and they might have swept them all away with them. They march'd all that night in great order and silence, Monsieur d'Hocquincourt having the Van, as it was then his turn; and before Sun-rise they had pass'd all the defilés, having taken a compass to put themselves betwixt stampes and Orleans, which was the way the Enemy used to go a foraging.

They were now getting into order, when some of their small partys, who were sent out for intelligence, brought back word, That instead of the Enemies being at forage, their whole Army was drawn up in battell about a league from them on the plaine above Etampes. Upon which advice the King's forces immediately drew up in the bottom where they were, and marched directly up the hill with a resolution of ingaging the Enemy; but they, as soon as they perceiv'd this, began to draw back into the Town, which the King's Generalls observing, march'd with their horses at a round trot after them, hoping to have fallen upon their rear before they could all have gotten into shelter, giving direction at the same time to their foot and cañon to make what hast they could after them.

The reason why the Enemy were drawn up in battell before the Town, instead of going out to forage as Mareschall de Turenne imagin'd they would have done, was to entertain Madmoiselle with a view of their Army, who that morning was going on her way to Paris without having the least notice of the King's forces being so near; which when they discover'd they ask'd her advice what shou'd be done? to which she answer'd, That they best knew what orders were left with them by her Father and the Prince of Condé; after which she pursu'd her journey, and they drew back into the Town and Suburbs

PART with so much expedition, that before the two Mareschalls
 1. Turenne and Hocquincourt had gain'd the heighth above the City, 1652. all the troopes of the Enemy were already in security. Upon which sudden retreat of theirs the two Mareschalls took a new resolution, which was to attack the suburbs, for which they sent immediat orders to the foot, that in marching they might prepare for it and get ready their commanded men, which was done accordingly.

Description of Etampes and what number of Troopes were then in the Town and Suburbs.
 OR: MEM:
 P: 1: p: 88.

Etampes is distant from Paris about fourteen or fifteen leagues, upon the road betwixt Paris and Orleans. Tis situate in a bottom, having a litle river running under the walls on the back part of it, which river falls into the Seyne by Corbeil.
 All that side of the Town and suburbs, which is on the right hand as you come from Châtres, is commanded by a hill, which yet is not very high; for from the top of an old round tower in the Town which is very high, the plaine which lyes above it or at least a great part of it may be discover'd. The Town-wall (as many are in France) is flank'd with small round towers, not cannon proof, and incompass'd only with a dry ditch on the side towards Châtres. The suburbs on the Orleans side are large and have a river on the one side, and a brooke on the other, which joyn under the wall of the Town towards the Orleans gate; so that there is no communication betwixt the City and the suburbs but through that gate. In this suburb lay part of the Enemys Army which had intrenched themselves, wherunto the brooke had very much contributed, for it cover'd all one side, excepting only a litle space which was near the gate, and which they supplyd with a line. In this quarter lay at that time about nine regiments of foot, as namely those of Condè, Conty and Bourgogne of the Prince's own troopes, with all the auxiliary foot of the Spaniards, as Berlo, Pleur, Vangè la Motte, Pelnitz, and one or two more, and about four or five hundred horses; the reste of their horse and foot was quarter'd in the Town.

As soon as the King's foot came up, they fell on immediately, scarce staying till their cañon had fir'd two or three shott at the Enemys retrenchments, which was rather done to let them see they had cannon, then for any execution they expected from them. Monsieur d'Hocquincourt's foot had the right hand, so that their attack was made where the brooke was; which prov'd to be deeper then they expected at their coming thither; they not knowing it, march'd down, and came to the very brink of it, the Enemy firing at them all the while, till the officers thrusting in their pikes to fathom the depth found it impassable, wherupon they drew off in good order, and march'd some what higher to a mill.

In the mean time Mons^r. de Turenne's foot, commanded by Mons^r. de Gadagne Lieut: Col: of the regiment de la marine, fell in with the Enemy on that part of their line which was in the left hand next to the Town, and without any resistance gain'd it. This was the only part that was ill maintain'd and yet was the place of the greatest consequence, for by losing it they were cutt off from all releif; and to improve this advantage a baricado was made cross the street over against the gate of the Town. At the same time Mons^r. de Turenne enter'd at this place all his foot, which instantly made way also for the horse; at the head of which Mareschall d'Hocquincourt came in, but with such eager hast, that he forgott to give order to the rest of his wing what they should next perform, so that they were all following him into the suburb, which being perceiv'd by Monsi^{er} de Turenne, he came up to them, and stopt them all but two or three of the former squadrons, and order'd them to draw off to the top of the hill where all his own horse were posted, because more then enow were already enter'd to second the foot; and besides, the rest of the Enemy's Army, which was in the Town, might have taken a great advantage, if half the horse had been engaged in the suburbs,

P A R T
I.

1652.

The King's Army begin to attack the Suburbs of Etampes.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 91.

P A R T by falling upon the King's forces out of the other gate ; their
 I. numbers of horse and foot then in the Town, without reckoning 1652. those who were in the suburbs, equalling all those under the two Mareschalls.

In the mean time the regiment of Picardy and the rest of Mons^r. de Hocquincourts foot, which march'd upward to the mill, there passed the brooke, and attacked the Enemy very vigourously ; who all (excepting the regiment de Bourgogne, which defended the place where Mons^r. de Gadagne enter'd) fought with all imaginable bravery ; and even after M^r. d'Hocquincourt's foot were enter'd the suburbs, they disputed evry wall and every place that was possibly to be maintain'd ; for M^r. de Turenne's foot so soon as they were enter'd, and had secured the traverse against the Town, turn'd immediatly to the right hand, and fell on the flanks of them who defended the line : Yet notwithstanding they were thus charg'd, and that at the same time the King's cannon playd furiously upon them doing great execution, they (as is said) obstinately disputed every wall, for the Line ran along the back sides and gardens which had stone walls, wherein they had made gaps or breaches for six men to pass a front in their going round the Line : Every one of these they defended with wonderful resolution, and sometimes forced the King's men from walls they had gain'd ; and once they put them into so great a disorder that they were driven back a considerable way, and had it not been for the regiment de Turenne, who made a stand and put a stop to them, which gave time to the King's men to rally about their Coulours, it was probable enough that these last had been beaten out of all they had gain'd ; But having repell'd that effort of the Enemy, they advanced upon them with new vigour, and drove them before them from wall to wall, till they had push'd them to the very last.

There the Enemy made a stand, and facing again upon their pursuers, beat them back out of the next closs or garden, and destroy'd many of their men. 'Tis true that they by pursuing the Enemy before too hotly had put themselves into great disorder, some horse of theirs being mix'd with their foot; but the Enemy did not pursue their advantage, contenting themselves to have made good their last wall, whilst the King's men rallyd behind the covert of the next, so that there was the space of an inclosure between the two partys. And now the soldiers having sufficiently smarted for their overforwardness in pursuite, took breath a while before they would venture to press on the Enemy again, so that for some considerable time, both parties from behind their walls lay pelting at each other.

And there the Duke saw an officer of the Enemy (whom he afterwards found to be Dumont the Major of Condé) perform an action, which, had it been seconded by his party, might have put some stop to the current of the Victory on the King's side, for while both partys were continuing thus to fire at one another, he sallyd out with his pike in his hand, expos'd to all the shott of the King's party and at the distance only of twenty paces, the closs being no broder, and advanced half way towards them; but not being follow'd by any of his men, was constrain'd to return: this he attempted three severall times, without any one to second him, and by a miracle of good fortune received no hurt. Which undauntednes of his rais'd so great an emulation in some of his Ma^{ties} Officers, that perhaps it made them adventure more then they would have done at another time.

A brave action perform'd by one Dumont, and taken notice of by the Duke, who was present in that place where the hottest service was.
Or: MEM:
P: 1: p: 96.

The duty would indced have been very hard to have directly attacked the open passage of the Enemys wall, which was maintain'd by so many resolute men; yet there was an Officer of the Royalists who ran from the gap of the wall that was on their side, and in the face of the Enemy came up to their wall, under which he placed himself as closely as (he) could, and was follow'd by as many of the King's men as could stand free from the Enemy's shott, the closs being narrow and nothing but the walls betwixt both partys. There by a new kind of skirmish they heav'd large stones, which lay uppermost on the wall, against each other, so that by litle and litle the wall decreased: At the same time some of the Royall party observing a rising ground, from whence they could see the Enemy behind their wall, and there firing at them with this advantage, it grew too hott for them to keep their ground; especially because while they were thus pelted, they were also pressed by the other Royalists, who were in front of them; therfore quitting their last wall, they ran for refuge to a neighbouring Church, whither also the regiment of Picardy had driven those whom they attacked, but not being able to maintain it, they were immediatly forced to ask quarter, which was given them. Some few of their horse sav'd themselves over the brooke or river that was behind them, having lost their Commander the Baron de Briole, and the Count de Fursternberg, both kill'd upon the place.

PART

L

1652.

M. de Turenne advances to sustain the baricade.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: P: 99.

But while the Royalists were thus hottly ingaged in the suburbs, the Enemy in the Town sallyd out, and attacked the baricade which the Royalists had made a cross the Street before the gate of the Town; and indeed those who defended it were so pressed by the Enemy, that they began to call for the assistance of the horse, and for more poudre: So that had not Mons^r. de Turenne himself advanced with a squadron of horse within almost pistoll-shott of the Town, to sustain them and keep off the Enemy, and had he not withall supplyd them with poudre, they had been beaten from that post, which in all probability had been the loss of the whole Enterprise; for all their foot were ingaged in the suburbs to the last man, and had not at that time done their business, the dispute being then at the hottest; So that had they of the Town recover'd that Baricade, being so strong as they were in foot, they would not only have releev'd their own men, but have cutt off all the King's Infantry; for the Enemy had three thousand of their best foot still remaining in the Town; But they were beaten back by Mons^r de Turenne's advancing as he did, and by the vigour of Gadagne, who defended the baricade and settled the soldiers well again in that post, which they were almost ready to have abandon'd: This being done, Monsieur de Turenne drew off again with the horse. 'Tis true the Enemy made two sallies more, but they were both times beat back with loss; after which the Royalists began to be much more at their ease, and finished happily their undertaking.

They kill'd above a thousand of the Enemy upon the place, and took a considerable number of prisoners, so that of the nine regiments of foot that defended the suburbs, hardly any escaped. Amongst the prisoners were M^r. de Briol Mareschal de Camp, M^r. de Montal who commanded the Prince of Condé's regiment of foot, M^r. Dumont Major of the same regiment, whom, when the Duke saw prisoner, he recolected to be the same whom he had seen do so bravely at the defence of the last wall, where he sallyd thrice out (as has been already related) but was not follow'd by any of his men. Besides these above named, there were also taken all the officers and soldiers of the three French Regiments of Condé, Conty and Bourgogne; and of the auxiliaries, the Baron de Berlo Mareschall de bataille, Vange, Pleur and la Motte, all three Colonells with their men and officers. The Royalists lost at least five hundred who were either kill'd or dyd afterwards of their wounds, but not one of note. Some Captains they had kill'd. The young Comte de Quincé was shott through the body, and Count Carlo de Broglio throw the arm, but both recover'd.

By the exact account which the Duke gives in his Memoires

P A R T

I.

1652.

An account of the slain and prisoners at the attack of the Suburbs of Etampes.

OR: MEM:

P: 1: p: 101.

P A R T

I.

1652.

written in his own hand of every particular circumstance of this great Action, it may be observed that his Royall Highness (thō he never mentions his own danger) was present in the places where the Service was hottest, which demonstrably appears by his remembring Mons^r. Dumont when he was taken prisoner, to be the same person whom he had seen performing that bold action above mention'd at the last wall in the suburbs of Etampes.

This Action as it was very daring, so it was also very fortunate; and, perhaps, had the two Generalls known the weakness of their foot, before they ingaged, they had not attempted it, for they had not there present above two thousand. Tis true the whole number was to have been five thousand, but their march was so suddain, and in the night, that many of the foot who were gone out in small partys, came not up before the Action was quite over, wheras on the other side the Enemy in the suburbs were near three thousand foot, besides four or five hundred horse, and in the Town was the same number of foot, and the rest of their horse was equall to the King's; But the raison which made the two Generalls undertake it, was, in the first place, the great disorder in which they observ'd the Enemy to be when the King's forces first appear'd on the top of the hill which overlooks the suburbs; and secondly the knowledge they had of the officers with whom they had to deal, who thō sufficiently brave in their own persons, yet (as has been formerly hinted) * as the affairs required; And besides, being equall in command, what one directed, another might contradict, or at least give out orders to one part of the soldiers which might prove destructive to the other. And of this the Royall Army it self found the inconveniency in this very enterprise; for when they drew off in the evening from the suburbs, Mons^r. d'Hocquincourt who had the Van march'd away directly for Etrechy without halting, or having the least consideration how he left Mons^r. de Turenne, who had the rear-guard, and was to draw off the soldiers from the barricade before the gate, and out of the suburbs, where many of the men were yet plundering; so that had the Enemy taken the advantage then offer'd, they might easily have beaten the King's whole Army: for the Van was almost at their quarters, before the Reer was wholly drawn off from their posts. And had those of the Town sallyd out from the Paris-gate, they might have got betwixt the two bodies of the Royalists, and taken their choice of first defeating which they pleas'd, and both successiuey. But in stead of this they bent all their forces on Mons^r. de Turenne's men as they were drawing off, and indeed press'd them so hard, that Mons^r. de Turenne in person, the Duke being with him, was forced to advance with some horse to disengage and bring off the foot. When they had gain'd the top of the hill, My Lord Berkley who attended the Duke, told Mons^r. de Turenne, that the Van was march'd away; to which he reply'd, shrugging up his shoulders, that it was now too late to remedy it. They therefore retreated as fast as they were able, incumber'd as they were with all the prisoners which they were to bring off, and were not a little glad when they got to their quarters at Etrechy, which is two leagues from Etampes in the road to Paris. And the next day they march'd back to their baggage which they had left at Châtres.

* The words omitted seem to have been, were not so subordinate, &c. (see page 63.)

This succes was of great reputation and advange to the King's affaires, and gave such encouragement to the Court, that the Cardinall resolv'd that Mons^r. de Turenne should block up the Enemys Army in Etampes, where it was known their forage began already to grow very scarce. And accordingly he dispatch'd his orders to Mons^r. de Turenne, and at the same

P A R T I.

1652.

The Royalists draw off in the Evening from the suburbs of Etampes.

OR: MEM:

P: 1. p. 103.

Mr. Hocquincourt marches away directly to Etrechy with the Van, leaving Mons^r. de Turenne alone, incumber'd with all the prisoners to bring off the rear guard.

Ibid. p. 104.

The Court encourag'd by the succes of the attack of the suburbs, resolves the Siege of the Town of Etampes.

OR: MEM:

P: 1. p. 105.

P A R T

I.

1652.

time was making provision of what Artillery he could, especially of great Cañon and all other necessaries, as well for the attack, as the blockade. But before these preparations were in a readines, the Army was forced to march to Palaiseau, having consum'd all the forage in the neighbourhood of Châtres; from whence they marched on the 6th of May, and stayd at Palaiseau till the 26th. That day they marched to Etrechy, and the next they incamped very near Etampes, on the same hight which is so near it.

The Seige of Etampes.
OR: MEM:
P. I: p: 106.

There they began to make a line of Contravallation against the Town upon the ridge of the hill, and within muskett shott of Etampes. As they began this work, those in the Town made frequent sallys out upon them to hinder their proceeding. At one of which attempts they cutt off above a hundred of the King's workmen, before the guard could get a horseback, but then they were very vigourously repulsed by the Marquis de Richelieu who commanded the guard and preserved the rest of the workmen. The next day the Lines were finish'd, which were but very mean, for besides the hardnes of that stony ground, the Royall Army was in great want of tooles; nor was there a stick of wood in the whole Country to make fascines; and some of the foot were lodged in the ruines of the suburbs, where they had beaten the Enemy before, and which those of the Town had burnt down upon the notice of M^r. de Turenne marching towards them. Notwithstanding that the Royall Army lay within less than Cañon shott of the Town, yet the scituation of it is so exceeding low, that they could not trouble the beseigers with their great guns; thō from the great Tower which is exceeding high, the Enemy could discern with ease all that was doing in the Camp, which was of great advantage to them. The beseigers made also a bridge over the River which is below the Town, to hinder the beseiged from foraging, and were also preparing to make bridges over the brook and River above it; by which they would haue so strained them, that in all probability they had either starv'd them out, or forced them to come forth and fight with them at great disadvantage. But while the King's Army was in the midst of these preparations and designs, the Duke of Lorraine came suddenly and broke all their measures.

This Prince had given the Cardinall such assurances of his being in his interests, that he had sent orders to the Mareschall de la Ferté then Governour of Lorraine to permitt the Duke to joyn together his divided troopes; which he had no sooner got into a body, but he march'd immediatly into France, and declared for the Princes, having had an underhand correspondence with them during all the time that he was treating with the Cardinall. This intelligence being brought to M^r. de Turenne, caus'd him to alter the methods he had taken; for instead of making it his only business to starve Etampes, he now resolv'd to try his fortune against it by plaine force, knowing that if he could not carry it soon, the Duke of Lorraine would suddenly be up with him, and releive it.

On this consideration, therefore, he fell vigourously to work, and rais'd his batteries; some upon the Line, and others in the bottom, close to the Orleans-Gate, and began to play upon that gate, and the wall betwixt it, and the great Tower, with resolution to storm an outwork which the Enemy had made betwixt the foremention'd places, but some what nearer to the gate then to the Tower; And to that purpose Mons^r. Gadagne with a thousand commanded men was order'd to attack it, which he so well perform'd, that after some dispute he master'd it and lodged upon it without any considerable loss, thō it was distant from the wall of the Town but pistoll-shott: During this attack severall bodies of horse were drawn out and placed betwixt the Town and the line on the side of the hill, to hinder the Enemy from sallying out on the back of the commanded men who made the attack; but the

P A R T
I.

1652.

On the news of the Duke of Lorraine's marching into France, M. de Turenne presses the Siege of Etampes.
On: M&M:
P: 1: p: 109.
M^r Gadagne storms an outwork and masters it, but is beat out again.
On: M&M:
P: 1. p: 110.

P A R T horse, who were placed within half musket-shott of the Town, were drawn off again just at break of day. The Sun was no sooner risen, then the Enemy made a sally, some of them coming along without the Town-ditch, to fall on Gadagne's men in the reer, while others attack'd them in front; And thō Gadagne did all that a good Officer could perform, yet he was beaten from the outwork with the loss of many of his men, and with much difficulty got off himself by making his retreat along the ditch of the Town to a baricade which the beseigers had made before the Orleans-Gate. He was already given for lost, because he came not off with the rest, and indeed his escape was very strange, for he was amongst the Enemys horse; but two or three Sergeants, and as many Musketeers standing resolutely by him, he disengaged himself (with) much ado, and came off unhurt, thō he had above twenty thrusts of swords, and some of pikes in his buff coat, which being an extraordinary good one was no peirced.

When this happen'd, Mons^r. de Turenne was newly gone to his quarter, having been all night upon the line; and had no sooner the alarm, but he went immediatly and commanded all the foot of his quarter to march down towards the work. His own regiment was the first that march'd, and he commanded them to regain the outwork. They presently went on in the face of both Armys, all of which were either spectators of that action, or ingaged in it; and without any manner of diversion, or so much as one Cañon shott to favour them, they came up to the attack, having only before them some commanded men of their number, who had been beaten out, led by a Captain of Picardy; but he being kill'd in marching up, his men ran away and carryd along with them some part of the right wing of Musketeers of M^r. de Turenne's regiment: Notwithstanding which discouragments, and the continuall fire which was made at them both from the work and the wall of the Town, they march'd on without firing one single shott; the Captains them-

A daring action perform'd by the Reg^t of Turenne in regainig the outwork.
OR: MEM:
p: 1: p: 112.

selves taking the Colours in their hands, and marching with them at the head of their Soldiers till they were advanced to the work, which was crowded with men as thick as they could stand by one another ; and then at one instant pour'd in their shott, and came up to push of pike with so much gallantry and resolution, that they beat out the Enemy, and lodg'd themselves upon the work. All this they perform'd with the loss of only one Captain of the regiment, and one or two more inferior Officers, not many of the private Soldiers falling. And indeed it was a wonder to observe that so small a number drop'd as they were marching up, considering that there was not one shott made on the beseigers' side to oblige the Enemy to keep down their heads one moment ; so that they had their full leasure to take aime, and it being then dry weather, from the line one could easily discern their shott beating up the dust, as thick almost as hail, amongst the commanded men as they went on : It was universally confess'd by all who were then present that they never saw so daring an Action. Mons'. de Turenne himself, and the most experienced officers of the Army, were all of opinion, That it had been impossible for them to have done so much, if their Colours had not been always in their view. And this Action was partly the occasion that the regiments afterwards made them new Colours ; for both the old regiments, and others, had taken an ill kind of pride in having their Colours tatter'd out, and worn so bare, that there was almost nothing to be seen but the Ensigne staff : the regiment of Turenne being the only one which had any visible Colours, not excepting the French Guards themselves.

One would have reasonably (thought) that after this, both partys shou'd have been quiet for the remaining part of the day, but it prov'd otherwise ; for the Enemy remembring how easily they had beaten the Royalists out of the work in the morning, and withall being sensible of what importance it was

P A R T to them, resolv'd on making an attempt to regain it: To which I. end, about two or three of the clock in the afternoon, they sally'd out with twenty squadrons of horse, and five battaillons of foot, resolving at the same time to attack the line, and dislodge the Royalists who were in the outwork. M^r de Turenne, who happen'd to be upon the line at that instant, seeing them come out both with horse and foot, sent to command all the troopes to their severall posts, and order'd all the foot which was remaining in the quarter to come immediatly to the place where he was in person; and farther, to gain time, commanded one of the three squadrons, which were then upon the guard, to go out of the line, and charge the first body of the Enemy which was coming up. These orders were with great bravery executed by the Count de Renel who commanded that squadron;
 but the men being overpower'd, were beaten into their lines;
 Some of them and of their horses were kill'd in the ditch of the line; others even within the line itself, which (as we have hinted) was so inconsiderable, that they who could not enter by the avenue (for it cou'd not be well call'd a bariere, because the Country afforded not wood enough to make one) leap'd over the line, and very few of them fell into the ditch by leaping short. The Count de Schomberg who was then but a volunteer with the Duke of York, was shott through the right arm by an officer of the Enemy, as he was standing in the avenue.

Schomberg wounded.
 OR: MEM:
 P: I: p: 118.

The Duke advances up with M^r de Turenne to the avenue.
Ibid.

At the same time when Mareschall de Turenne sent out this body of horse to charge, he advanced up to the avenue with the two remaining squadrons and the Duke with him, beleiving the Enemy would endeavour to press in there. The Mareschall and those who were with him were now in a very uneasy posture, the body of horse which had been commanded out being beaten in; no troopes coming up to their releif; the Enemy advancing against them with three battalions of foot and severall squadrons of their horse, some of which were already within pistoll-shott of the line, and expecting only the coming up of their foot, which were within half muskett shott of them, and were still advancing. To resist all these Mons^r. de Turenne at that instant had only two squadrons of horse, and here and there a foot Country (centry) on the line; which rather shew'd the Enemy the weaknes of those they had to deal with, then to do them any considerable harm; not one of the Cañoniers was on the battery which was upon the line, so that the Enemy receiv'd not a shott from the great guns: and besides all this, M. de Turennes party had no hope of any considerable body of foot, which could be with them soon enough for their releif; for the action of the morning had drawn most of them to the Orleans' suburbs: In the mean time the Enemy advancing still, was come so near, that the Duke had not time so much as to a light and put on his armour, but was forced to get it put on as he sat a horseback on a pad, which he had not time to change thō his charging horse stood ready by him.

In this condition they were, when there came to their assistance about two hundred Musketeers of the regiment of Guards, which was the whole number that could be pick'd up from all the quarter. These coming to the line, receiv'd command from Mons^r. de Turenne not to mind so much the firing alltogether, as to be sure to take good aime, which accordingly they did, and to so good purpose that it was beleev'd never so small a body of men did so great execution; for at their first Volly they so clear'd the first three squadrons of the Enemy, and there fell so many of their officers as well as troopers, that the second firing oblig'd them to draw farther off, they being at that time within the distance of pistoll-shott of the line; and then M^r. de Turenne's musketeers plyd the Enemys foot who were still advancing towards the line; but (very fortunatly for the Royalists) as they were coming up, they found a bank which cover'd them all but their heads from shott; and when they

P A R T
I.

1652.

The Enemy coming up to the Avenue is so near and the danger so pressing, that the Duke has not time to change his horse, nor put on his armour.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 120.

P A R T

I.

1652.

had once receiv'd the benefit of this shelter, it was no longer in the power of their officers to make them stirr, or to advance one foot forward ; thō they were seen from the line using their utmost endeavours both by cutting them, and advancing themselves to encourage them by their own example ; but it was all to no purpose : So they stop'd there, and only fir'd on the Royalists at that distance ; had they not happen'd on that shelter, in all probability they had gone fair to beat Mons^r de Turenne's small party from the line ; but by this time the horse of the other quarter were coming up to their releif, so that now the Enemy began to think of making their retreat.

While this Action continu'd, where M. de Turenne was in person, the other body of the Enemy which went towards the outwork, had no better success then their companions ; for having farther to march then those who attacked the line, the Royalists on that side had more leisure to put themselves in a posture of receiving them ; and Mons^r. de Tracy, who commanded the German horse which were in the service of the King of France, having the alarm at his quarter, and hearing that the Enemy attacked M^r. de Turenne's, in stead of coming within the line, thought it better to go between the line and the Town ; which succeeded very happily, for by that means he met those of the Enemy who were going to attack the outwork : And thō he had but four squadrons with him, and consequently was much outnumber'd by them, yet he charg'd them so vigourously that he put them to a stand, which gave time to more troopes to come up to his assistance, commanded by the Marquis de Richelieu ; Thus reinforced, they gave another charge, and constrain'd the Enemy to retire in great disorder ; but this second push being under the shott of the Town, the Royalists thought it too hazardous to pursue them.

That party of the Enemy which was engag'd with M^r. de Turenne, being stop'd (as is above related) they began to retire, and, now seeing that other party beaten, drew off more speedily than they had come on. By this time the greatest part of the beseiger's forces were come to the line, and severall of the officers were very urgent with M^r. de Turenne to fall out and pursue them; but he thought it not convenient, telling them, if he should do it the success could be of no great importance, the Enemy being so near the place of their retreat; so that it would only expose their men to the shott of the Enemy from the Town, and to be forced back in disorder. Thus the Enemy drew in again, having receiv'd a very considerable loss especially of officers, ^{why} of about sixty fell upon the place.

P A R T
I.

1652.

After this unsuccessfull attempt, the beseiged were contented to live more quietly by the beseigers, and troubled them no more with any great sallies. But the beseigers for their parts press'd hard upon them at the Orleans-gate, and from the out-work which they had taken from them; and they had at last made such progress, that they had log'd their Miner in the wall of the Town, when they receiv'd advice that Monsieur de Lorraine was marching with all imaginable expedition towards Paris, and that they were preparing for him a bridge of boats to pass over the Seyne a litle above Charenton; which oblig'd M^r. de Turenne to think of raising the Seige, to prevent his being inclosed between the Enemys two Armys.

The Miner
log'd in the wall of the Town.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 126.
The Duke of Lorraine's march obliges
M. de Turenne to raise the Seige of Etampes.
Ibid.

And to that purpose the Royall Army began to draw off their great guns from the nearest batterys; but they were so ill provided with teames to draw their cañon and amunition, that the Court was necessitated to send them all their coach-horses, those even of the King and Queen not excepted; and with all this shifting, they were yet so ill furnish'd, that they were forced to send off one half, the day before they left the Town, and to bring back the horses on the next day to draw off the remaining part of their Artillery.

P A R T

I.

1652.
They raise the Siege in great order, June 7.
Ibid. p. 127.

On the 7th of June early in the morning, the Royall Army being then in battell, they began to withdraw their men from the outwork which they had taken; which was perform'd in great order by M^r. de Navailles, who commanded in that post, thō the Enemy press'd hard upon him; and so soon as he was come up, the Army began to march, at the same time setting fire on their hutts: And indeed ' was perform'd with so much regularity, that it afforded a pleasing kind of object; for while the first line stood their ground, the second march'd off about twice twelve score, and then drew up again, facing towards the Town; After which the first line we M^r. so off with a slow motion, the Enemy in great numbers coming out to skirmish and firing on them, till they pass'd betwixt the intervalls of the second line; and when they had march'd off the same distance, which the other line had done before, they halted again, and fac'd about, at which time the other En^y began to move. After this slow but orderly manner, they retreated about a league, and then seeing no considcrable attempt was made on them, they march'd away directly to Etrechy, where they continued but two or three days, and then drew off farther from Etamper to a village call'd Ytterville towards Corbeil, and from thence to Balancourt; where having notice that the Duke of Lorraine was come to Villeneuve S^t Georges with his Army, M^r. de Turenne resolv'd to make a sudden march and fall on him before he could joyn the Army that was left behind at Etampes; nor was this impracticable, for besides that he had the conveniency of passing the Seyne at Corbeil where there was a garrison of the King's, and where his Army could leave their baggage with security.

M. de Turenne
marches to Villeneuve S^t Georges, where he surprises
the Duke of Lorraine.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 131.

Accordingly he march'd early in the morning on the 14th, passing over the River as he had design'd at Corbeil, from whence he march'd directly towards Villeneuve S^t Georges; and his march was so well order'd and perform'd with so much diligence, that the first intelligence the Enemy had of him, was the unexpected appearance of his whole Army before them.

P A R T
I.

1652.

It was in the beginning of the afternoon when the two Armys came in sight of one another; but M^r. de Turenne found he could not possibly attack the Enemy on that side, they being cover'd by a brook, which coming from Brie falls at that place into the Seyne; So that without losing any time, he march'd up along the brook till he found a passage over it, continuing his march all night and leaving great woods on his left hand. About break of day the Van of his Army was arrived at Grosbois which is within little more then a league of Villeneuve St Georges.

At that time he had a message sent him from the Duke of Lorraine, which was brought by Mons^r. Beaujeu, who had been imployd to that Duke from the Cardinall, they two having all along kept the negotiation on foot betwixt them; M^r. Dagecourt Captain of the Guards to the Duke of Lorraine, accompagn'd the messenger of the Cardinall and brought propositions from him; the first of which was to desire Mons^r. de Turenne not to advance nearer him; after which, he gave the Duke of York and M^r. de Turenne an account of the King of England's being with the Duke of Lorraine, and that his Majesty was come to that Duke's quarter the night before, upon the same business of an accommodation. M^r. de Turenne having weigh'd the matter, desir'd his Royall Highness to go immediatly to Villeneuve St Georges, to which he was easily dispos'd, because the King his Brother had sent him word that he desir'd to speak with him; The Duke therefore went, and had Monsieur de Lorraine's honour engag'd for his return: But notwithstanding this beginning of a Treaty, M^r. de Turenne's Army continued still to march, and would not be hinder'd by the artificiall delays of the Duke of Lorraine.

He receives at Grosbois a message from the Duke of Lorraine.
Ibid. p: 132.

The Duke sent to Villeneuve St Georges with proposalls to the Duke of Lorraine.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 133.

P A R T

I.

1652.
The King of England at the Conference with the Duke of Lorraine, and the motives thereof.
Ibid. p: 134.

But that it may not be wonder'd at, on what occasion the King of England took upon him this mediation, and came concerning it to that Duke, the Reader is to know, That his Majesty being at Paris receiv'd a letter from Monsieur de Lorraine, in which he gave him an account of his being in treaty with the Court of France, and that the business was drawing so neer an amicable conclusion, that he accounted it as good as done; That therefore he desir'd his Ma^{ty} to give himself the trouble of coming to him, to finish all, and become his guarantee, as also to carry him to the Court, which was then at Melun. The King upon the receipt of this letter, went immediately to Chaillot, where the Queen his Mother then was, to acquaint her with the affaire, and advise with her what was fitt for him to do on that occasion. Her Ma^{ty} was of opinion that the King should not go, saying, she knew the Duke was unsincere, and intended only to act over again some of his old deceits; in which case it was not adviseable for the King to be security for him, who was not much accusom'd to keep his word. But the inclination his Ma^{ty} had to be instrumentall in an affaire which would be of so great advantage to the Court, prevail'd upon him beyond all other considerations: Having taken this resolution, to lose no time, he took coach immediately, not so much as staying to change his cloths, and went to Villeneuve S^t Georges, taking with him the Lord Rochester, Lord Jermyn, and Lord Crofts; when he was got as far as Charenton, he met the news of the two Armys being in presence of each other, as also a farther request from the Duke of Lorraine that he would hasten to him. Being arrived at Villencuve S^t Georges, he found M^r. de Beaujeau with that Duke, who was imployd from the Court to negotiate the Treaty. He also observ'd, that Monsieur de Lorraine was extreemly discompos'd and apprehensive of the neighbourhood of Mons^r. de Turenne's Army.

Presently after the King's coming, the foremention'd Enuoyé and the Captain of the Guards, were dispatch'd away with the Duke's propositions to M^r. de Turenne, which found him near Grosbois as has been already said. But it not being yet certain what might be the issue of the Treaty, the Duke prepar'd to receive the Royall Army in case they should attack him, posting himself with all the advantages which the ground afforded him; and working very hard all night on five redouts with which he cover'd his front, he had finished them in the morning.

P A R T
I.

1652.

The Duke of Lorraine posted at Villeneuve St Georges with all the advantages the ground could afford.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 137.

He drew up his forces in excellent order. Ibid

His Army consisted of about five thousand horse, and three thousand foot, with a small train of Artillery, and he drew up his forces in this following manner; he placed the greatest part of his foot in those redouts above mention'd, keeping one great battalion for a reserve behind the midlemost redout, having most of his cañon placed upon a height by the gallows just above the Town; his horse was drawn up in two lines behind the redouts, his right hand was cover'd by a great wood, and his left by the Town and the ascent from it; which was so extreemly steep that it was impossible to approach him that way, or to do him any prejudice, so that they could only attack him on his Front.

Being drawn up in this excellent order, by which (to do him no more then common right) he shew'd himself a great and experienced Commander, he stood prepar'd for what might follow, either an attack of the Royall Army or an accommodation by way of Treaty.

When the Duke came to Villeneuve St Georges, he went directly to wait on the King his Brother, who told his Royall Highness the occasion of his being there, and then desir'd him to use his best endeavours that the Treaty might succeed, by which his Ma^{ty} might be disingaged from so perplexing an affaire; for supposing that no effect should follow from these

The Duke arrives at Villeneuve St Georges.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 139.

P A R T I. 1652. overtures, but that the two Armys should come to an ingagement, the King was very much put to it how he should behave himself: It was not consisting with his reputation, when there was a suddain prospect of a battell, to withdraw without having his share in the honour of it; but which side he was to take, was a matter of no slight consideration: He had been sent for by the Duke of Lorraine to assist him in his Treaty with the Court; he had particular obligations to him, and was then in his quarter where he had lodg'd all night: On the other side, he was at that very time under the protection of the King of France, and, by his permission, in his Country; besides which, he had a pension from him, which in that juncture was the only visible support he had: But the consideration which press'd him most was, that in fighting for the Duke of Lorraine, he manifestly appear'd in the quarrell of Rebels against their Lawfull Sovereign, and even to continue long in his quarters for that very reason look'd not well, and yet he knew not handsomly how to leave him.

His Majesty therfore ask'd the Duke, what were the propositions which he brought from Mons^r. de Turenne? to which his R. Highness answer'd, that in short they were these following: That the Duke of Lorraine should immediatly cease working at the bridge of boats over the Seyne; that he should ingage himself to march out of France within the space of fifteen days, and at the same time oblige his word that he would never more assist the Princes; And as to the first article concerning the bridge, that he had brought an officer Mons^r. Varenne by name, who was commission'd to go and see it put in execution; without which preliminary Mons^r. de Turenne was resolv'd not to proceed upon any of the rest. When the Duke had given this account to the King, his Ma^{ty} told him, that he fear'd the Duke of Lorraine wou'd never be brought to sign any such proposalls, knowing what he had promis'd to the

M. de Turenne's proposals to the Duke of Lorraine brought by the Duke.
 OR: MEM:
 P: I: p: 141.

Princes at Paris ; To which the Duke replyd, That it must then be decided by the sword ; for he was well assur'd that M^r. de Turenne wou'd not chang his mind. Immediatly after this, Monsieur de Lorraine came in to the room, to whom the Duke deliver'd what he had in charge ; he receiv'd the message in his ordinary way of raillery, but his Royall Highness cou'd easily perceive that what was naturall to him at another time, was now extreamly forced. As to the first proposall of laying aside his working at the bridge, he answer'd that he was content, and immediatly sent an officer of his own in company of M^r. de Varenne, to forbid the farther prosecution of it ; but as to the others, he protested that he could never be induced to make so dishonourable conditions. Whereupon his Royall Highness ask'd him, if he shou'd carry back that answer ? to which the Duke of Lorraine replyd, that he could give him no other. But because Monsieur de Lorraine thought that the Duke was more inclin'd to see the two Armys engaged, then that the business shou'd end peaceably, he desir'd the King to send the Lord Jermyn back along with his R. Highness, to try if he cou'd perswade M^r. de Turenne to more reasonable termes.

While this negociation was carrying on, Mons^r. de Turenne lost no time, but advanced with all imaginable speed ; so that when the Duke and Lord Jermyn were come to him, the Army was all in battell within less then a league of the Enemys posts, and marching on as fast as their present posture would allow. The Duke deliver'd Monsieur de Lorraine's answer, and the Lord Jermyn urg'd all the arguments, and us'd all the perswasions he could invent, to incline M^r. de Turenne not to insist so rigourously on his propositions ; but he was not able to prevaile for any part of them to be released : wherupon he return'd to let the Duke of Lorraine know the result of the affaire.

The Duke
returns to M^r.
de Turenne and delivers
the Duke of Lorraine's
answer.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 145.

Lord Jermyn was very desirous that the Duke would have

P A R T

I.

1652.

The Duke refuses to return back with Lord Jermyn to the Duke of Lorraine's
Army.
Ibid. p: 146.

The King of England comes to Mr.
Turenne's
Army, and makes a last attempt for an accommodation.
OR: MEM:
P: I: p: 147.

return'd with him, as hoping by that means to have gain'd some longer time, and supposing that M^r. de Turenne would not begin his attack till the Duke was come back with a finall answer ; But his R. Highness absolutly refus'd to go, assuring him, that M^r. de Turenne could never be capable of committing so great an oversight as the loss of so much time, because he well knew, that the Army of Etampes must be already on their march, and would infallibly appear very suddently on the other side of the River ; that upon this consideration the Duke was almost certain that the Armys would be engag'd before he could come back. His Royall Highness further added, that his presence would be no inducement to the Duke of Lorraine to finish the agreement, but that the advance of the Royall Army might be a more prevailing motiue to hasten the conclusion of the Treaty. With this reply Lord Jermyn went his way, and the Army continu'd to march forward ; so that they were already come within canon-shott of the Enemy, when the King himself came to Monsieur de Turenne to make the last attempt on his resolution but M. de Turenne begg'd his pardon for insisting still on the same conditions which he had sent, and added, that he knew his Ma^{ty} had so much concernment for his King, as not to press him on any change of his proposalls.

The Armys were then so very near that every moment of time was precious, and therefore the King desired Mons^r. de Turenne that he would send for the last time to the Duke of Lorraine ; to which he consented, and Mons^r. de Gadagne was commission'd to him with the former termes in writing, and order to tell Monsieur de Lorraine, that he must immediatly signe them, or he would give the signall for the fight. When M^r. de Gadagne came up to the Duke of Lorraine, he found him by the gallows, where some of his cañon were placed ; and having read the paper, he call'd out to the canoneers to fire, for by that time the Army was advanced very near them ; but it seems the canoneers were privatly better instructed then to obey, for they did not do it; and Mons^r. de Gadagne plainly told the Duke of Lorraine, that they durst not; once more assuring him, that he must either sign, or expect instantly to be attack'd. Wherupon Mons^r. de Lorraine sign'd the Treaty, and M^r. de Gadagne brought it back: The effect of which was what has been already mention'd, That the Duke of Lorraine should march immediatly away, and be out of the French Dominions within the space of fifteen days, with a solemn ingagement never afterwards to assist the Princes.

P A R T
I.

1652.

The Duke of Lorraine signs
the Treaty.
OR: MEM.
P: 1: p: 149.

So soon as Mons^r. de Turenne receiv'd it, he commanded his Army to make a halt, and sent to demand hostages for the performance of the Treaty; with all requiring that the Duke of Lorraine should immediatly begin his march. All was done accordingly: The Count de Ligneville Lieu^t. Generall of his horse, and Mons^r. Dagecourt Captain of guards, were sent as pledges, who were to be return'd so soon as Mons^r. de Vaubecourt (who was order'd to march along with Monsieur de Lorraine on Mons^r. de Turenne's party) should send word that he was out of the French Dominions. The King of England after the paper had been brought back and ratifyd, came to see M^r. de Turenne's Army, after which he return'd to the Duke of Lorraine, and taking his leave of him went back to Paris.

The King of England returns to Paris.
Ibid. p: 150.

Whilst this Treaty was transacting, Mons^r. de Beaufort the great favorite of the populace at Paris, was in the Duke of Lorraine's Camp, having with him five hundred horse, which he had brought out of that City. These his troopes were by the Articles permitted to return to Paris, but no mention was made of him their Commander: when he saw the paper of agreement in this manner sign'd, he doubted of his own security, and being unwilling to trust to the courtesy of Mons^r. de Turenne, he took a trumpetter along with him, and passing the River at Villeneuve S^t Georges, he posted away to Paris; where, at his

P A R T
I.

1652.
The Duke of Beaufort inflames the people of Paris against the King of England.
OR: MEM:
P. 1: p. 151.

arrivall, he inflam'd the people against the King of England, by suggesting to them with much malice, that it was by the perswasions of his Ma^{ty}, that Mons^r. de Lorraine had made the Treaty; whereas in truth if he was instrumentall in it, it was at the desire of the Duke of Lorraine, who pressed him for his assistance in bringing matters to an accommodation: But these insinuations wrought so farr upon the multitude, that it might haue being of dangerous consequence to the King; In so much that both he and the Queen his Mother, were obliged for their security to leave the Town in as privat a manner as they could, and go to S^t Germain's, till the rage of the Rabble was in some sorte abated.

The Duke of Lorraine in execution of the Treaty begins his march home-wards.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 154.

After the King of England was departed from Villeneuve S^t Georges the two Generalls met, and some few cold compliments having pass'd between them, each returned to his own Army; Mons^r. de Lorraine began to march away, Mons^r de Turenne's Army in the mean time standing still as they were drawn up in battell. Mons^r. de Lorraine, with his forces on their way homewards, pass'd through a long and narrow défilé in view of the Royalists, and very near them, so that they were all absolutely at Mons^r. de Turenne's mercy, if he had not been a more faithful obseruer of his word then Mons^r. de Lorraine. His troopes had no sooner enter'd that narrow passage or défilé, when the Army of the Princes, marching from Etampes, began to appear on the other side of the Seyne; which, upon notice of what had pass'd, in stead of coming towards Mons^r. de Turenne's Army (continued) their march to Paris.

Mr. de Turenne leaves Ville-neuve S^t Georges and marches to la Cheurette near S^t Denis where the Court then lay the 1st of July.
Ibid. p. 152.

Mons^r. de Turenne remain'd for some few days at Villeneuve S^t Georges, and departing thence the 21 of June, by small marches he came to Lagny, and there past the Marne on the 1st of July, camping at a Village by the Seyne called la Cheurette, about a league from S^t Denis where the Court then lay. In one of these mention'd marches at a place called Gorges, Mons^r. de Turenne was joyn'd by the Mareschall de la Ferté, who reinforced the King's Army with the troopes he had brought from his government of Lorraine, consisting of three or four Regiments of horse and two regiments of foot.

In the mean time the Princes' Army which came out of Etampes in hope of joyning with Mons^r. de Lorraine, being frustrate of that expectation and not in a condition of keeping the feild against Mons^r. de Turenne, lay near S^t Cloud behind the Seyne; so that now M^r. de Turenne having no other Enemy upon his hands, was resolv'd to ingage with them upon almost any terms, and accordingly the same day that he arrived with the King's Army at la Cheurette, he began to make bridges over the Seyne, which could not suddently be perform'd, the River being very broad in that place; and least the Enemy should interrupt the work, the two regiments of la Ferté's foot were commanded over into an Island, at the point of which it was intended to pass the Army over the bridge; and the situation of the place was so favorable to the Royalists and so disadvantageous to the Enemy, whose side of the River was the lower ground, that they durst not adventure to dispute the passage, or to hinder the progress of the bridge.

Tis true, they made a shew of disturbing the Royalists at first, and with that intention had lodg'd about a hundred foot behind a bank on the other side of the River, having also drawn up severall squadrons of horse at some distance behind their foot; but their horse were soon dislodg'd by the King's Cannon, which playing furiously upon them, they were forced to withdraw beyond reach of gun-shott; their foot still remaining upon their post, as judging themselves to be in security; but the event shew'd they were mistaken, for one la Fuitte, (Fitte) Major to M^r. de la Ferté's regiment of horse, a Very daring man and an active Officer, having found a place in the River, where the going in had good footing at the bottom, and

P A R T
I.

1652.

M^r. de la Ferté joyns M^r. de Turenne at Gorges.

Ibid. p. 153.

The Princes' Army which came from Etampes lay near S^t Cloud behind the Seyne.

OR: MEM:

P. 1. p. 157.

M^r. de Turenne begins to make bridges over the Seyne in order to attack the Princes' Army.

Ibid. p. 153,
and 158.

P A R T
I.

1652.

where he could see the going out at the other side was as secure, propos'd to swim over with fifty horse, and cutt off those foot of the Enemy, which lay pelting at the workmen. His proposition was accepted, and his attempt succeeded: for before the Enemy's horse (which were with drawn to a distance) could come up with him to the rescue of their fellows, he cutt off the hundred foot; and such of them as were not slain, he brought over in boat, and swam back in safety with his horse, not having lost one man in the action. After this, the workmen carryd on the bridge without any further interruption: but least the Enemy might make a more vigourous attempt the next morning to hinder the passage of the Army, severall of the smallest feild-pieces, with more men, were Sent into the Island, where the two regiments of la Ferté's foot were already lodg'd, with orders to make a work for their better security.

The Pass of Condé decamps from St Cloud and marches towards Charenton.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 155
and 160.

In the mean time the Prince of Condé who was then incamp'd at St Cloud with the main body of his Army, considering that it would be very difficult for his men, who were on the lower side of the River, to hinder the passage of the King's Army who were on the higher ground, and that probably their bridge would be finished next day, thought it best for him no longer to remain in that post, but leave them a free passage. And being very doubtfull whither the Town of Paris would receive him with his troopes, in case he should be driven to a necessity, he marched away in the dusk of the evening towards Charenton, and pass'd his troopes over the bridge of St Cloud, with design to place himself behind the River of Marne, where it would have been very difficult for the Royall Army to have perform'd any thing against him. To expedite his passage at St Cloud, he had likeways prepar'd a bridge of boats, over which he past his foot, at the same time that his horse were marching over the bridge of the Town, so that in a short space his whole Army, together with his cañon, baggage and ammunition, were in safety on the other side. Then he march'd through the Bois de Boulogne, and came to the gate of Paris called De la Conférence, where entrance being refused him by the Parisians, he took his march quite round the City, according to the resolution he had taken, in case he were not admitted ; his design now being to get to Charenton, and pass over the Marne there, where being betwixt the Seyne and the Marne, he could better defend himself, then where he was before incamp'd.

PART
I.

1652.

Intelligence of all this was immediatly brought to Mon^r. de Turenne, by a Messenger sent on purpose to him from some favourers of the King's Party in the Town, who because the gates were shutt, were forced to let him down in a basket over the wall. At the first notice of the news, the King's troopes were order'd to begin their march ; and the Mareschall himself gallop'd before to S^t Denis (by which place the Army was to pass) that he might conferr with the Cardinal on what was next to be put in execution. It was concluded betwixt them, to use all possible diligence to attack the Prince of Condé before he could secure his troopes in Charenton. This being resolved, the Mareschall rejoyn'd his Van, just as they were come up to S^t Denis, and hasten'd their march, without making any stay either for y^e cañon, or for the Mareschall de la Ferté's foot, which were all past over that night into the Island in two ferry boats ; so that if the Army had halted till these had joyn'd them, they had undoubtedly lost the opportunity.

Intelligence sent to M^r. de Turenne from the favourers of the King's Party in Paris.
OR: MEM:
P. I. p. 161.

Tis resolved to attack the Prince of Condé before he reach'd Charenton.
Ibid. p. 162.

Marching therefore with all expedition possible, as they came to la Chapelle they perceived the Rear Guard of the Enemy, wherupon Mons^r. de Turenne himself advanced a litle before his troopes to observe their posture ; and finding that to favour their retreat, they had put some musketeers into certain wind mills, and other litle houses which were at the entry of the fauxbourg S^t Denis, he caus'd some of his own commanded

M^r. de Turenne marching with all expedition discovers the Enemys Rear and attacks them at the entry of the fauxbourg S^t Denis.
OR: MEM:
P. I. p. 162.

P A R T

I.

1652.

foot to advance against them, who in a moment beat out the Enemys foot from those places, and made way for the King's horse to charge their Rear-guard in the very street of the fauxbourg. The Enemy receiv'd the charge with resolution enough, but at length were routed, many of their officers being either kill'd or taken, of which latter sort was one M^r. Desmarais a Mareschall de Camp who commanded them, and who after having receiv'd some wounds was made prisonner, as also the Count de Choiscüil a Captain of horse. On the King's side not any officer of quality was wounded, excepting Mons^r. Lisbourg Lieutenant Collonel of Streff, which was the regiment that charg'd, who was shott through the body.

After this Encounter which succeeded so happily, the Royalists advanced and press'd the Princes men so hard, that they got up to charge them again close by the hopital of S^t Louis; where they also routed the remaining part of the Enemys Rear-guard which consisted of betwixt two and three hundred horse, and had for a good while the execution of them, taking or killing most of their officers and soldiers before they could reach the body of their Army, which was then retiring into the fauxbourg S^t Antoine: For M^r. le Prince of Condé finding how hard M^r. de Turenne press'd upon him, and that it was imposible for him to reach Charenton, was resolv'd on playing the best of a bad game; and to that purpose drew into the fauxbourg afore mention'd, where there were very strong retrenchments already made by the inhabitants for their own security, during the Civill War: Without this casuall remedy the Prince and all his Army had infallibly been lost; for it was all he cou'd perform, to distribute his men to their severall posts before they were attacked; So that if the barricades in the street had not been ready made, he had been surprised in a defenceless posture. So soon as M^r. de Turenne came up to the main body of the Enemy, which (as has been said) was

The P^{er} of Condé not able to reach Charenton is forced to draw in the faux-bourg S^t Antoine.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 165.

drawing into the great street of the fauxbourg St Antoine, he was forced to a sudden stop, for his Van only was there, and he could not make another charge upon the Enemy without his foot, which was not yet come up to him ; so that he saw them draw in before him without being able to hinder it, for want of Infantry.

By this time, the King, Cardinal and all the Court were come to Charonne (where there is a hill which overlooks all those fauxbourgs) to be Spectators of the remaining Action.

So soon therefore as the foot was come up, they dispatch'd a messenger to M^r de Turenne, with orders for him to fall on, thō neither the Cañon was come nor M^r. de la Ferté's foot, neither had his men any tooles but their hands to help them in breaking or pulling down the garden-walls and barricades ; and thō M^r. de Turenne desired them by the messenger to haue patience for a litle time, since it was impossible for the Enemy to escape, unless the Parisians open'd their gates to them (which the Court beleev'd they would not do, having assurance from the well-affected in the City to the contrary) and withall told them, that the Prince of Condé could neither add any new retrenchments to those which he had found already made, nor any way better his condition, by the King's Army stayin for their cañon, and tooles, without which it would be difficult to force the Enemy, or indeed to perform any thing against him, considering the strength of the barricades, and garden-walls ; adding also that in case he should receive a check, it might be the loss of the whole enterprise, which could not possibly miscarry, when his troopes should be provided of what they wanted, and had the assistance of their Cañon ; yet such was the eagernes or rather blind precipitation of the Court, that by new Messages they still press'd the Mareschall to an attack ; and even Mons^r. de Bouillon himself, who was but newly reëconciled in the beginning of that Campagne to Cardinal

P A R T
I.

1652.

The Court at Charoñe spectators of the action of the fauxbourg St Antoine.
Or: MEM:
P. 1. p. 166.

Precipitation of the Court pressing M^r. de Turenne to fall on.
Or: MEM:
P. 1. p. 168.

P A R T
I.

1652.

Mazarin, was more urgent then any man with his Brother the Mareschall de Turenne; being of opinion, that it was better to follow that rash advice, then to expose himself to the censure of some about the King, who might be apt to say, That he deferr'd the attack in favour of the Prince of Condé: thō if former passages between the Prince and the Mareschall had been well consider'd, it would have been found, that the Prince had disobligh'd him beyond any possibility of reconciliation: But Mons^r. de Turenne was not yet so well establish'd in the opinion of the Court, nor his Integrity so thorowly known, that he durst hazard it by refusing to act against their orders, thō they were contrary to his own judgment; neither durst he assume so much to his own Conduct and Experience, as afterwards he did on severall occasions.

Account of the famous Action of the barricades of the fauxbourg S^t Antoine. Ibid. p. 169. The first barricade attack'd and carry'd with great bravery by the french Guards and the Marine Regim^t. Ibid.

M. de S^t Maigrin advancing the horse with too much heat and precipitation, rashly pursues the Enemy to the market place where the Prince of Condé was. OR: MEM: P. I. p. 169.

Being therefore thus overswayd, he prepared to attack the barricades: the French Guards, and the Marine Regiment, seconded by the King's own Gens d'armes and Chevaux-legers, on the right hand of all the rest, attacked the first barricade of a narrow street which opens into the great street of the fauxbourg S^t Antoine, just where it joynes upon the market place. The success was answerable to the bravery of the undertaking, for notwithstanding that the houses and walls on both sides of the street were crowded with defendants, yet they beat the Enemy from the barricade, and drove them from before them from house to house. But this prosperous beginning was render'd ineffectuall by the heat and rash ambition of the Marquis de S^t Maigrin, who commanded the Gens d'armes and the Chevaux-legers; for he, seeing the good success of the foot whom he was to second, and desirous of his share in the honour of the action, press'd on with great precipitation through the midst of the foot, in that strait passage of the street, not having the patience to suffer them to finish their work of dislodging the Enemy from all the houses as they went along, but still pursuing those who fled even almost to the market place; he came up at last to the place where the Prince of Condé was in person; The Prince, observing the fault committed by the King's horse, and resolving not to lose his opportunity, went himself at the head of five and twenty officers and volunteers, who were next him, and vigourously charg'd them in the narrow street, whilst at the same time those of his foot, who were not yet driven out of houses next him, fir'd upon them from the windows on both sides of the street; so that the foremost of those led on by Maigrin, being thus furiously charg'd in the front, and pelted in the flanks, were in a moment either kill'd or wounded: wherupon the rest of that body of horse immediatly ran, and were not only routed themselves, but carryd along with them the foot who were in the street; and those of them who were in the houses on either side, observing what had happen'd to their fellows in the street, got out of doors as fast as they were able, every man shifting for himself by flying: The Enemys foot at the sight of this, recovering courage, pursu'd them eargerly, and regain'd not only all the street, but all the ground to the very last barricade; which was made good by Monsieur de Turenne himself, who was come thither, and without whose presence even that also had been lost.

In this unfortunat attempt, the King's Party did not only lose many officers and persons of quality, as St Maigrin, the Marquis de Nantouillet, and severall other kill'd upon the place, but many also who dyd of their wounds afterwards, amongst whom was Mons^r. de Manchini the Cardinal's nephew, a gallant youth of great hope and expectation, and Fouillou ensigne of the Queen's guards, with many others. And which was of worse consequence, the two Regim^{ts} of foot imployd in this attack were so ill handled, that they were not in a condition of doing any farther service for some hours after; and all that 1652.

P A R T
I,

The Prince of Condé at y^e head of 25 Officers and Volunteers, charges St Maigrin, and recovers all the ground the Royalists
had gain'd.
Ibid. p. 170.

Mr. de Turenne in person makes good the last barricade.
On: MEM:
P. 1. p. 171.

St Maigrin, Nantouillet, Manchini and Fouillou kill'd.
Ibid.

P A R T could be expected from them, was only to maintain the barricade L which they had wonn, and which was now their post.

1652.

The Regim^t of Turenne gain severall houses and gardens.
 OR: MEM:
 P. 1. p. 172.

At the same time when this attack began, the foot Regiment of Turenne made another upon some houses and gardens possessed by the Enemy more on the left hand ; and on their left hand again, two other Regiments of foot, Vxelle (d'Uxelles) and Carignan, now form'd into one battaillion, storm'd a guarden wall next adjoining to the great street of the fauxbourg. When the Regim^t of Turenne fell on, they had warm service, and gain'd severall gardens and houses from the Enemy ; but they, seeing what had befallen their next neighbours on the right hand, adventur'd not to make any further impression, but only maintain'd what they had taken.

A squadron of horse appointed to sustain the Regim^t of Turenne, first run, but then recovering their fright, no men after that did better.
Pbid. p. 173.

And here must not be omitted a passage, which appear'd to be very extraordinary ; There was a squadron of horse compos'd out of the Regim^{ts} of Clare and Richelieu which was order'd to second the battaillion of Turenne ; As these men were marching up behind the battaillion of foot, they receiv'd a smart volley of shott in their flank, which was powr'd on them from a neighbouring wall ; they had a considerable loss of men by it, and were put into such a disorder, that they absolutly ran ; which their Officers seeing, did their duty with great resolution, and coming up to the foremost, stop'd them ; and in a moment put them in order again, and march'd up to the post appointed : After which it was observ'd, that never men acted with more bravery then they did, and continued so to do for the remainder of the day. This particular deserves the rather to be remarked, because 'tis very seldom known, when Soldiers have been once frighten'd so as to run, that they have ever perform'd any good action the same day. The service was so hott, that no one Captain of the whole squadron escap'd from being either kill'd, or dangerously hurt. Of the Regiment of Richelieu there remain'd not one alive, saving only the Captain Lieu-

Very hott Service at this attack.
 OR: MEM:
 P. 1. p. 174.

tenant who was call'd La Loge, a very gallant man ; and he also was shott with a muskett through the body, of which he afterwards recover'd.

P A R T
I.

1652.

The Battailion of Vxelles and Carignan storme a garden wall near the barricade of the great Street. Ibid.

About the same time when these began their attack, Vxelles and Carignan began theirs also in the wall above mention'd : While they were marching up, the Lieutenant Collonels of both regiments were kill'd, which yet occasion'd no stop in the battallion ; for they went on directly to the wall, the Enemy all the while plying them with their shott as thick as haile, neither stayd they till they had placed themselves under it betwixt the holes which the Enemy had made in it. Being lodged there, a new manner of fight began, there being only the wall between the two Partys, for not being able on either side to do any great execution with their muskets, they heav'd massy stonnes against each other over the wall, shott their pistols through the holes, and thrust their swords through the cranies ; one party endeavouring to maintain possession, and the other to make them quitt it.

This unusuall way of Combat lasted long, because the Royalists wanted tooles and iron-cro's to break down the wall. The horse which were appointed to second those foot, were drawn up over against the great street, just out of reach of muskett shott, to prevent the Enemy from sallying out from the Barricade, and from falling on the foot who were imployd in attacking the wall. As for the Barricade itself, it was not thought expedient to attack it, for they judg'd it impossible to carry it, because it was so commanded by the houses of which the Enemy were possest in front of it, that it was not to be attempted without first mastering them.

And now the remaining part of the foot commanded by Mons^r. de Navailles, and consisting of the Regiments of Picardy, Plessis-Praslin, Douglas, and Bellecense, attacked another Barricade which was more down ward to the River,

M.deNavailles with the rest of the King's foot attack a Barricade, cross the Street near the garden of Rambouillet, and gain it. OR: MEM: P. 1. p: 176.

P A R T
I.

1652.

and a cross the street of that fauxbourg, which is in the way to Charenton near the garden of Ramboüillet; and after some resistance gain'd it, dislodging the Enemy from the houses round about it: When they were masters of it, they contented themselves with maintaining their possession, and thought it not expedient to press the Enemy any further, because they had found that behind this Barricade there was a large open place where the Enemy had drawn up a party of their horse, and behind that also were garden walls and houses filled with foot, so that nothing was to be undertaken rashly against such a strength. But as it had not been prudence in them to attempt farther, so on the other side the Enemy thought it not convenient to expose that body of horse to no purpose, and therefore began to draw them off behind those houses and gardens that were in their possession: Which being observ'd by Mons^r. de Clinvilliers a Mareschall de Camp who commanded the King's horse upon that post, and he mistaking that retreat for a plain flight, march'd hastily through the Barricade which he had gain'd to charge them with his horse, but the Enemy perceiving that he could not pass but with two a brest, a party of their horse weeld immediatly about, and charg'd him before he cou'd draw up in order, half his men being yet unpass'd; making use of this advantage they routed his men, and took him prisoner, severall of his Officers and Soldiers were slain, and the rest were driven headlong by the Enemy through the Barricade; having clear'd their place they retir'd on a round trot, the King's foot in the mean time playing hard upon him.

M^r. de Clinvilliers passing through the Barricade to charge the Enemy with his horse, is routed and taken prisoner.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 177.

The King's cannon being come up, are planted at the wind-mills, from whence playing down the great Street they do terrible execution.

By this time some of the cannon was come up with M^r. de la Ferté's two Regiments of foot; The foot was immediatly order'd to releve the Guards and the Marine Regim^t which had been so cruelly shatter'd, and to make good the posts which had there been taken; And the cannon (which were but six pieces) were carryd to the wind mills, which were within less then muskett-shott of the mouth of the great Street; down which passage they began to play very furiously, and did terrible execution as could be plainly seen, the Street being full of men and baggage; but it was clear'd almost in an instant, and then they began to batter the houses which commanded the passage to the Barricade: They were only of slight materialls, and such as we call paper-buildings, so that every shott went through and through; and yet they were maintain'd with so much resolution by the defendents, that the Royalists were not able to dislodge them with their great guns, For they continued firing out of the windows and through the very holes which the Cannon had bor'd.

P A R T
I.

1652.

WHILE this Service lasted in that place, peales of thick and furious shooting were heard down at the Barricade where Mons^r. de Navailles commanded. Whereupon Mons^r. de Turenne gallop'd where the noise call'd him, but before his arriuall, the engagement was at an end; thō for the time it lasted it was exceeding eager. The occasion of it, as the Duke was since inform'd by some who were then in the Service of the Princes, and ingaged in that very action, was this; Mons^r. de Beaufort having been almost all the morning in harangueing of the people of Paris, and endeavouring to perswad them to open their gates to the Prince of Condé and his troopes, when he found that he was not able to prevaile, came out of the Citty, and having been informed what hot Service there had been, and how bravely the Prince and those persons of quality who were about him had behav'd themselves (for they came not out till after S^t Maigrin was kill'd) was all on fire with emulation and resolv'd on doing something as remarkable. He therefore propos'd to Mons^r. de Nemours (with whom he had a quarrell then depending) that they shou'd endeavour to regain the Barricade gain'd by M^r. de Navailles, as an action of the greatest importance to their party. The proposition bein as

M. de Beaufort who had not been yet ingag'd, endeavours to regain the Barricade gain'd by M. de Navailles. OR: MEM: P. 1. p. 179.

M^r. de Beaufort's proposall accepted by M^r. de Nemours, and all the other persons of quality in the P^{ty} of Condé's party. Ibid.

P A R T

I.

1652.

readily embraced as it was offer'd, they put it in immediat execution, and were follow'd by all the persons of quality who were in a condition of Service, for many of the bravest amongst them had in the former part of the action been kill'd or disabled.

The Barricade is attacked with great bravery and resolution, and as vigorously defended.
Ibid. p. 180.

These two then putting themselves at the head of a good body of foot march'd on with great resolution and bravery to attack the Barricade, which was very strongly guarded; for behind it was the Regiment of Picardy, and on each hand of it, in the passage of the Enemy, was a house, in one of which was Plessis-Praslin and in the other Douglas, so that they must march betwixt those houses before they cou'd come to the Barricade; which they perform'd, notwithstanding all the shott which was made as thick as the Royalists could fire at them as they pass'd over the open place without stopping till they came up to the Barricade itself, but there they found so vigorous a resistance, that it was impossible for them to master it; they were beaten off with considerable loss, many persons of quality hurt and killed, Mons^r. de Nemours was wounded in severall places, and one of his fingers shott from his hand as it was upon the Barricade, Mons^r. de la Rochefoucault was shott in at the corner of one eye, the bullet coming out under the other, so that he was in danger of loosing both, Mons^r de Guitaud (was) shott into the body, and severall others.

M^r. de Nemours has one of his fingers shott, as he had his hand upon the Barricade, and M^r. de Rochefoucault is shott throw both the eyes.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 180.

A remarkable accident concerning M^r. de Flamarin who was kill'd at this attack.
Ibid. p. 181.

Amongst many who were kill'd was Mons^r de Flamarin, whom we cannot but mention particularly for this remarkable accident: He had been foretold by some of those cantin fellows who gott their living by fortune telling, That he shou'd be hang'd, the phrase in french is, That he should dy, la corde au col, that is with a halter about his neck; a kind of death which no gentleman ever suffers in that Country, the ordinary way of executing any of the Noblesse, or persons of quality, being by beheading. Yet this unfortunate gentleman ended his days exactly according to the prediction: for falling by a shott, and being left for dead, close by one of the two houses formerly mention'd that were before the Barricade, one of the men that were in these houses seeing him ly so near them, and observing that he was richly cloth'd, withall beleiving according to appearance that his pockets were as richly lin'd, had a great longing to strip and search him; but some of the Enemys being lodged in the neighbouring houses, and behind the walls of that open place which commanded the ground where this dying gentleman lay amongst many other bodys, for which reason they durst not venture out to rifle them; at length they be-thought themselves of an invention to draw him to them; for having gotten a rope they made a nooze at one end of it, put it over his head with their pikes, and so drag'd him into the house then just expiring; thus the prophecy was literally full-fill'd.

But to return to our relation: Mons^r. de Turenne coming to the place and finding the Enemy repuls'd, seeing also that the post was in a good condition, return'd to the wind mills where his cañon were planted at the upper head of the great street; and observing that the Enemy still maintain'd their houses before the Barricade on the left hand, as well as the garden walls on the right, commanded some of the horsemen to alight (all the foot being already employd in the attack) and to assault the houses by a back way, which one had discover'd, and which was left unguarded. This was perform'd with that extraordinary valour, that not one of the Enemies escaped who were lodged in those houses, all of them being either kill'd or taken, their number was above a hundred persons.

Just when the King's horsemen began this attack, the two Regiments of foot which had been so long against the garden wall on the right hand of the Barricade, began to get the mastery of some of those holes which the Enemy had defended

P A R T
I.

1652.

The houses before the great Barricade holding out still, M^r. de Turenne commands some horsemen to alight and assault them by a back way; they gain the houses and kill above 100 persons.
OR: MEM: P. 1. p. 183.

The garden wall in the right hand of y^e Barricade, after having held out so long, is at last master'd by the Royalists, who make here a terrible execution on the Enemy.
OR: MEM: P. 1. p. 183.

P A R T

I.

1652.

with so much obstinacy, they had now made them wider with their hands for want of other tooles ; which the Enemy perceiving, and well knowing that the intention of the Royalists was to force their passage into the garden through the gap which they were endeavouring to make, they immediatly abandon'd the whole wall, thō they had a squadron of horse to second them in the garden ; which the Royalists perceiving, plyd them so hard, that the horse following the example of the foot began to run. In that place they receiv'd a considerable losse, for there being but one outlet from the garden for their escape, and every man striving to be formost in that fearfull hurry of horse and foot, they so crowded each other, that they chock'd the breach and stuck together in a lump ; while the Royalists pouring their shott upon their backs made a terrible execution of them, and presently breaking down the wall, forced their passage into the garden : which being beheld with great amazement by their fellows who were posted at the great Barricade, and the Royalists begining to fire at them at the same time from the houses on the other side, they were seiz'd with such fear, that they drew off, and abandon'd it.

The Enemy abandon the great Barricade.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 185.

A generall attack resolved.
Ibid. 184.

The signall given and the attack begun.
Ibid. 185.

The Royalists tooke immediate possession of it, but pursued not the Enemy ; for it was then resolved to make a generall attack on all sides. In order to which all necessary preparations were making, and a breathing time given to the men, who indeed had need of it, for they had undergone intollerable toyle, and fought with great earnestness all the fore part of the day ; which, besides the heat of the action, was one of the most soultly (that) was ever felt. All things being now ready for the generall attack, and so disposed that in all probability the King's party should have gain'd an intire Victory, the signall being given, which was the firing of three cannon, the Royalists began their attack. Mons'. de la Ferté was posted on the right hand of the great street, and Monsieur de Turenne on the left, who advancing with a strong party both of horse and foot, resolved to fall on at a new place, more inclining to the left hand, where he hop'd he should not meet with such good Barricades, it being near the Bastille: But when he approached the place, and was just ready to attack it, the Bastille began to fire their cannon at the Royalists, which surpriz'd them not a litle, having flatter'd themselves with other hopes, and having had assurances from within, that Paris would only stand neuter and not permitt the Army of the Princes to save themselves within their walls. This made Mons^r. de Turenne instantly suspect what he found inmediately after to be true, which was, That they had open'd their gates to the Princes, and receiv'd their forces; for when their Barricades were attacked, they made no countenance of defending them, but only retreated in good order from their Severall posts, leaving only some few men at each of them, all the rest of their troopes being alredy drawn in to the Town; and those small partys which were left, as the Royalists aduanced upon them, drew off also, and were pursued by them to the very gate of the Town. The King's Generalls seeing how the Enemy had sav'd themselves, were of opinion that there was nothing remaining for the Army to do but to march back to their baggage, which was left behind at la Chevrette just by St Denis, and there to refresh their men.

This was accordingly perform'd, carrying with them their wounded men, which were in great numbers, as it must needs have happen'd where the seruice was so long and so very hott. There were kill'd upon the place as near as cou'd be computed about eight or nine hundred of the Royalists, amongst whom (were) many officers of note and persons of condition, as the Marquis de St Maigrin, who was a Mareschall de Camp, if not Lieutenant Generall, thō at thattime he only acted as Lieutenant of the Cheuaux-legers, three or four Lieutenant Collonels

P A R T
I.

1652.

The Bastille fire their cannon at the Royalists and Paris opens its gates to the Prince of Condé's Army, which is herely sav'd from an entire defeat.
Ibid.

The King's Army march back to la Chevrette.
OR: MEM:
P. I. p. 186.

8 or 900 of the Royalists
kill'd in this action.
Ibid.

P A R T of foot and many Captains, besides other inferiour Officers and
I. Volonteers: They had also many Officers and people of quality 1652. wounded, as Mons^r. Mancini the Cardinall's nephew, whom wee have already mention'd, who was shott through the thigh, Fouilleaux ensigne of the Queen's guards shott through the body, and Mons^r. de Mespas an old Mareschall de Camp hurt in the foot, all which besides many others dyd afterwards of their wowns; the Count d'Estrées Mareschall de Camp, Pertuixt Lieutenant of the guards to Monsieur de Turenne, Lisbourg Lieutenant Collonel to Stres (Streff) and the Cheualier de Neuville; this and divers others were likewise wounded, but they recover'd of their hurts. Monsieur de Turenne himself was very much expos'd that day, and so was consequently his R. Highness the Duke who accompanied this great Generall all along, and hazarded his person where ever he was; but thō it was his R. Highness good fortune to receive no hurt himself in this days' warm action, yet Collonel Worden one of the Grooms of his bedchamber who was obliged still to be near him, got a considerable wound.

Mr. de Turenne
 exposes himself very much.
 The Duke
 accompanys him all along.
 Coll. Worden one of y^e Duke's grooms of his bed chamber and obliged still to be near him, is wounded.
 OR: MEM.
 P. 1. p: 187.

Above 1000 men kill'd on the P^{re} of Condé's side.
Ibid. 188.

The P^{re} of Condé never so much expos'd nor so long as he was this day.
 OR: MEM.
 P. 1. p: 188.

Of the Enemy were kill'd upwards of a thousand, amongst whom were great numbers of Officers and men of quality, there being scarce one of their considerable Officers that was not either kill'd or wounded, except the Prince of Condé, the Prince of Tarante, and the Duke of Beaufort: It has been affirm'd by many who were well acquainted with the Prince of Condé, that he never perform'd the part of a Generall or a Soldier better then in that action, nor ever expos'd his person to greater hazards then that day, And truely it was his only vigour which preserv'd his Army from utter ruine in the very beginning of it. And the Prince himself has since confess'd to his R. Highness the Duke, that he was never so long expos'd to danger as he then was. And that which added the greatest lustre to the Prince's reputation was that he was attacked by

Mons^r. de Turenne, whom all men must acknowledge to have been the greatest Captain of the Age, and equall to the greatest of any former times : It been (being) most evident that in all this War, he not only perform'd the part of a great Commander, but that he sav'd the Crown of France by his Counsell as well as by his Conduct, as will yet more manifestly apper hereafter in the following Relation.

P A R T

I.

1651.

In the mean time it will be expected, that an Account should be given in what manner and by whose means the Army of the Princes was admitted into Paris, and what was the managin in the Town, while the two Armys were fighting in the fauxbourg. It has been already said, that the City had refus'd the Princes' Army leave to march through it, when they came to the porte de la Conférence, thō the Prince himself and all his freinds within had endeavour'd it to the utmost of their power : for those of the Loyall Party in the Town made use of this maine Argument, That thō they were indeed against the Cardinal, and wish'd his ruine, yet it was unworthy of the Parisians, as they were good Frenchmen, to suffer an Army, partly compos'd of Spanis troopes, and the greatest number of whose Officers were either Subjects to that King, or in his pay, to enter within their walls ; That they knew not what disorders might arise from so unwarrantable an Action, or what comotions it might cause in the people, when they beheld so unusuall a sight, as the Cross of Burgundy flying up and down their streets, which they were only accustomed to see hanging in their Churches ; That it would look as if they had already submitted to the Spanish Yoke, to see so many red Scarfes strutting in the midst of Paris, where they were never seen in that provoking number since the Rebellion of the Holy League ; In fine, that it was the intrest of Paris, as well as of all other great Cities, not to admitt an Army under whatsoever specious pretext. These and many other reasons so prevail'd, that the

How the Princes' Army came to be admitted into Paris.
Ibid. p. 189.

P A R T

I.

1652.

Mademoiselle oblige the Mareschall de l'Hopital and Provost des Marchands to give order to open the Porte S' Antoine and let in the Princes' Army.
ON: MEM:
P. 1. p. 192.
She sees herself the order executed, and the Cañon of the Bastille discharg'd.
ON: MEM:
P. 1. p. 193.

Town continued firme in the resolution of shutting their gates against the Princes' Army. But when the fight already was begun, the Prince sent Mons^r. de Beaufort thither to press them once more; since there could be no other retreat for him, and that he must infallibly be lost, if they persisted to refuse him entrance. But all that Mons^r. de Beaufort could urge was to no purpose; the Royalists who were within so vigourously opposing it. As for the Duke of Orleans he was so far from attempting to harangue the people in his behalf, that he stood ashtonish'd at the danger, and was so thoroughly frightened, that he commanded the gates of his pallace to be shutt, and his Coaches in a readiness at a back door of the gard (gardens) to carry him to Orleans, as giving all for lost at Paris: But his daughter Madmoiselle shew'd herself of a more masculine temper; she consider'd, that if the gates were not open'd to the Prince, and that with speed, both himself and his troopes must be cutt in pieces, and consequently their whole party ruin'd: She therfor went to the Hotel de Ville, where they were gather'd together, and spoke to the Magistracy of the Town, being attended to the place by a great Rabble; so that with her arguments and their clamours, which were mix'd with threatnings, she oblig'd the Mareschall de l'Hôpital and the Prevôt of the Marchands, to give order to the Captains of the Burgers who commanded at the Porte S^t Antoine, to let in the Princes' Army: She herself carryd this order to the gate and saw it executed, which when she had done, she went immediatly into the Bastille and commanded them to discharge their cañon against the King's troopes just as they were beginning their generall attack. In this manner the Prince of Condé and all his Army were preserv'd by the courage and dexterity of that Princesse.

This business of the fauxbourg was scarce over, when there happen'd a very great disorder in the Town: It was on the 4th of July two days after the attack, when a Councill was assembled at the Hotel de Ville, with an intention of procuring the Duke of Orleans to be declar'd Lieutenant Generall of France, and of uniting themselves inseparably to obtain the removall and banishment of Cardinal Mazarin out of the French Territories, of chusing the Duke of Beaufort Governour of Paris in the place of the Mareschall de l'Hôpital, and of removing le Tabure from being Prevôt des Marchands, whose room was to be supplyd by Broussel; and this Assembly, by which they hop'd to have establish'd their party, prov'd to be one of their cheif causes of their ruine, by so violent a combustion, as was likely to have been fatal to all the Members of that Councill, and to have made the Prince of Condé losse all the benefitt of what had pass'd at the fauxbourg St Antoine. Wee cannot say that he was author of so pernicious a design, which every one who has been tax'd with it has equally denyd and shifted it from himself upon some other; but whosoever was the promotter of it, this is certain, that while the Councill was thus sitting, there came a confused multitude compos'd of men of all sorts and conditions, with weapons in their hands, crying out, That they would not only have all things settled according to the direction and pleasure of the Prince of Condé, but demanded also to have instantly delivered to them such as were either Vulgare accounted, or but suspected to be friends to Cardinal Mazarin, and seeing their clamour did not prevaile they began with great violence to force the Town house; and because the Mareschall de l'Hôpital with some other resolute men endeavour'd to maintain it against them, they set fire on the gates, and shott in at the windows, so that many were slain within the house, and severall who chose rather to trust the Rabble with their lives, then to run the hazard of the flames, venturing out amongst that furious multitude, were barbarously murder'd, and the blindness of their rage was such, that they

P A R T
I.

1652.
A great commotion in Paris, wherof
the P^{er} of Condé was suspected to be the author.
Ibid. p. 194.

P A R T I. made no manner of distinction betwixt those who held for the Royall party, and those who were of their own, but dispatch'd them in a general massacre. It has been since observ'd that more of the popular faction fell, then of the Loyall. The whole weight of this commotion and all that ensued of it, fell upon the Prince of Condé ; no body looking on the Duke of Orleans, as to haue had least hand in it. And this disorder was follow'd by an accident, which thō not altogether so considerable, yet was greatly prejudiciall to their party. It was the death of the Duke of Nemours who was kill'd in duell by the Duke of Beaufort, they having for a long time born a mortall hatred to each other, thō they wer Brothers in law.

The Duke of Nemours kill'd by the Duke of Beaufort in a duell.
OR: MEM:
P. I. p. 197.

While these things pass'd about Paris, the Spaniards made good use of their opportunity ; for having taken the feild early, that Campagne they regain'd many of those places which they had lost in former years, and that without much difficulty, both in Flanders and els where, there being no Army to oppose their progress.

The Spaniards prepare to march into France with 25000 men.
Ibid. p. 197.

And it was thought that at the solicitation of the Princes, the Arch Duke prepar'd to march into France in the beginning of July with his whole Army, which consisted of five and twenty thousand men or upwards of that number. On the intimation of this news the Court of France which still continu'd at S^t Denis was exceedingly alarm'd, and enter'd into consultation what was expedient for the King to do having so small an Army. At length it was resolved that both Court and Army should march away for Lyons within two days, and it was then about the middle of July.

Upon this news it is resolved that both Court and Army should march within two days to Lyons.
Ibid.

The same evening that this resolution had been taken in Councill, Monsieur de Turenne went to S^t Denis and the Duke was with him ; they went straight to Mons^r. de Bouillons lodging, to learn from him what the result of that debate had been, before they went to Court. Mons^r. de Bouillon told the Mareschall what had been resolved concerning the Court, and the Armys march to Lyons, and added, that he thought they could not in prudence fix on any other resolution. Withall he related to him the arguments which had been us'd on that Subject; and which had determin'd the Councill on that course. They were these following, That there was no other place but Lyons where the King's person could be in safety, that being the only great Town which would receive him; That the Spanish Army was actually marching into France which the King's Army was no ways able to resist; That the Court and Army remaining where they were, shou'd be inclos'd betwixt the Spaniards and Paris; That so long as the person of the King was safe, their condition was not desperate, but if he shou'd once fall into the hands of the Spaniards, or the Princes, there was no further hope remaining for the Loyall Party; That Lyons was a place from whence they might make head against any Enemy, all the adjoining Country being intirely at the King's devotion; for which and other reasons he thought it y^e best and only advice which could be taken.

To which Mons^r. de Turenne answer'd his Brother, If this be done, we are absolutly ruin'd without any prospect of recovery; for if once the King marches as far as Lyons, he may take it for granted that all the frontier Townes, with those of Picardy, Champagne and Lorraine, and others on that side of the Country, which now hold for him, seeing themselves abandon'd by him, will make their conditions either with the Spaniard or with the Princes, after which both will be at leisure to deal with him; and who knows what thoughts such a posture of affaires will put into the heads of people, even to canton or divide the whole, at least that part of the Kingdom which they haue in their possession; and when they haue once settled all behind them, they will undoubtedly march after us, and increasing in strength as we decrease both in that and in reputation,

P A R T
I.

1652.
Mons^r. de Turenne go's to the Court at S^t Denis and the Duke
with him.
Or: MEM:
p. i. p: 198.

M. de Turenne's reasons against the journy to Lyons.
Or: MEM:
P: i. p: 199.

P A R T

I.

1652.

will never suffer us to live in quiet, but drive us perhaps as far as Italy. Besides these he gave many other convincing reasons against that resolution, and at length concluded, it was his own opinion, that the Court in stead of retiring to Lyons, shou'd go to Pontoise (it being a strong post) with the guards that ordinarily attended them; neither was there any probability that such attempts wou'd be made from the Parisians, who still seem'd to preserve a kind of reverence for their King: In the mean time he with the Army wou'd advance towards Compiègne to observe the motion of the Spaniard, and hop'd by the favour of that Town and the Rivers which were near it, to secure himself against them, and if not to frustrate their designs, at least to render them more difficult; and besides he was confident that the Spaniards who are jealous and overcautious people, seeing him advance towards them, wou'd be apt to refine upon his proceeding, and imagine he wou'd never venture it without good grounds for such a daring; that is, unless some private Treaty were on foot betwixt the Princes and the Court, which their former experience of the French genius had taught them to expect, and wou'd be no new thing if it shou'd now happen.

Cardinal
Mazarin convinced by M.
de Turenne's reasons, and the journey to Lyons is alter'd. The Court moves to Pontoise and the Army marches to Compiègne.
O^r. MEM:
P. r. p. 201.

Having convinced his Brother by these reasons, they went together to the Cardinal, and argued the design with him; who wheighing the strength of what they urg'd, on second thoughts enter'd at length into their reasons, and was brought over to their opinion. In this manner the journey to Lyons which had been fix'd to a day, was on the suddain wholly layd aside. And on the 17th of July the Court mov'd to Pontoise, and the Army march'd towards Compiègne, camping under the walls of it on the third day after they sett out. In the mean time the Spanish Army was still advancing towards them, and was as far on their way as Chaunay. Into which place the Duke d'Elbeuf had very inconsideratly put himself with seven or eight hundred horse, which he gather'd out of his government of Picardy; and order'd his affaires so very ill, that when he thought to haue march'd out upon sight of the body of the Spanish Army, he found a party of theirs had possess'd themselves of a pass at a small distance from the Town, which cutt off his retreat, so that he was forced to continue where he was, and take his fortune. In short, having no foot but only of the Burgers, and the Town it self being too weak to be maintain'd, he was driven to capitulate after two days Seige, with conditions to yeeld up the place, and his troopes to march out on foot, leaving their horses behind them to the Enemy.

After this accident, it is not certainly known for what reason, whither for that which Mons^r. de Turenne had guessed, or for some other, the Spanish Army advanced no further into the Country; After they had taken Chauny, they did not so much as put a garrison into it, nor lay Seige to any other Town in those quarters, where no opposition could haue been made, but contented themselves with staying for some time in France, and eating up the Country; only it was conjectur'd, that they thought it more their business to recover what they had lost in Flanders, then to push for any thing so far in France, looking on the Princes and their Party as strong enough to resist the King, especially with such troopes as they could send to their assistance: But if they should have made the Rebells an over match for the King's Army, then by consequence the King must have absolutly submitted to the Princes, or fallen into their hands; by which means the whole force of France being then united, they should soon have been forced to quitt their hold, and lose what so ever they had gain'd within the body of the Country, which was too far from Flanders to be succour'd. And besides they fear'd that grasping at the shaddow there, they might forfeyt the opportunity of regaining what they had lost at home.

P A R T
I.

1652.

The Duke d'Elbeuf wth 800 horse in Chauny, forced to surrender the place to the Spaniards, leaving his horses behind him.
OR. MEM.
P. I. p. 202.

P A R T
I.

1652.

The Spanish
Army returns into Flanders, leaving y^e
Duke of Lorraine on the frontiers to assist the Princes.

OR: MEM:

P. 1. p. 203.

The King's Army returns towards Paris,
The Duke still moving with it. Ibid.

The Princes' Army keeps under the walls of Paris.

OR: MEM:

P. 1. p. 203.

Cardinal Mazarin
withdraws.
Ibid. p. 204.

The Queen of France a Princesse of great firmness and constancy.
Ibid.

Whither these were their reasons can not be positively said, but certain it is, that they acted as if they were; for having devour'd the product of the Country where they lay, not long afterwards they return'd into Flanders, and recover'd many of their Towns in those Provinces, leaving the Duke of Lorraine with his own troopes on the frontiers to be ready to assist the Princes, if occasion were, with a detachment out of their own Army commanded by the Duke of Wirtemberg.

When the body of the Spanish Army was out of France, the King's Army return'd towards Paris, the Duke still moving with it, as he did during all this long, fatiguing and dangerous Campagne. All this time the Army of the Princes lay under the walls of Paris, not being strong enough to engage with the Royall Army; and besides they were apprehensive in case they should leave the Town, the Kings party which were within it and were now increasing every day, would at length prevail; the fury of the people beginning already to decline, and their eyes being somewhat open, so that in spite of their seducers they began to see how much they had been deluded, and had thoughts of returning to their duty. To which they were the more encouraged, because Cardinal Mazarin about that time withdrew out of the French Territorys; for so soon as the Court was come to Pontoise, he prepar'd for his retreat as a thing most necessary for his own concerns, and very much conducing to the King's interest: Since by his departure, the main pretence of the Rebellion was taken away, and the eye sore of the people removed out of their sight; neither by thus absenting himself, was he the farther from being restor'd in case the affaires of his Ma^{ty} went better, being assured that he might rely on the Queen's inviolable firmness to him: for not only the Cardinal but all the world was satisfied, that when she had once given her word, her constancy was never to be shaken, she being certainly a Princesse of so firme a Soul; and so unalterable in her resolution, as hardly any age has shewn her equal, none her superiour; of which she has given innumerable proofs.

P A R T

I.

1652.

Some indeed were of opinion that the Cardinal had run a great hazard of not being recall'd, if Mons^r. de Bouillon had liv'd longer; beleeving that he, who was a man so knowing and of so great capacity, having his Brother Monsieur de Turenne at the head of the King's Army, might have play'd his game so dexterously as to have made himself first Minister: But whither he or the Mareschall had any such designs can not well be determin'd. This is undoubted, that only they two in all the Court were capable of undertaking and menaging an affaire of so high a nature. However it were, the death of the Duke of Bouillon put an end both to those discourses, and to the apprehension of any such alterations.

But to returne to the affaires of the Army: After the Spaniards' returne into Fianders, Mons^r. de Turenne (as had been said) march'd back towards Paris. It was about the beginning of August, when the Army were as far on their way as Tillay, within a league of Gonesse where they continued till about the end of the same month; it being a proper post for the Mareschall, as well to observe from thence the motion of the Princes' Army which remain'd still on the other side of Paris, as to ly betwixt them and any succours which might be sent them from the Spaniards. During his residence in those quarters, he had notice that the Duke of Lorraine was once more advancing with all his forces, which were reinforced with divers of the Spanish troopes under the command of the Duke of Wirtemberg, by the way of Champagne and Brie, with an intention to joyn the Princes' Army. This intelligence caus'd Mons^r. de Turenne to march towards the Marne, and in his way having further notice of their approche, he pass'd that River at Lagny, and advanced as far as St Germain a small Village

The Duke of Lorraine enters once more into France.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 205.

P A R T about three leagues distant from that Town, and near Cressy
 I. en Brie.

1652.

The Duke of Lorraine amuses the Court with a Treaty, while he endeavours to slip by M^r.deTurenne and get to Paris, or joyne
 the Princes'
 Army.
Ibid. p. 206.

The Court deluded by M^r. de Lorraine's artifices, enjoyns
 M^r.deTurenne not to stirr from his post.
 OR: MEM:
 P: 1. p: 206.

Being come thither, he receiv'd orders from the Court not to attempt any thing upon the Duke of Lorraine, nor to stirr from that place till farther orders, unless the Duke of Lorraine should march on towards Paris from the quarters where he then lay: In which case he should use his best endeavours to hinder him from joining with the Princes. This command from Court was grounded on a Treaty which Mons^r. de Lorraine was then concluding with them, and had sent his Secretary for that purpose; promising in the mean time to keep his station without advancing any further, till either all things were adjusted or the Treaty broken off. But according to his wonted manner of proceeding, he enter'd into it only to amuse the Court, hoping by those dilatory artifices to gain the opportunity of slipping by Mons^r. de Turenne, and either to get into Paris, or to meet the Princes in his way to it, without hazarding a battell. And had not Mons^r. de Turenne trusted him less, and known him better then the Court, he had then certainly compass'd his design. For the Court being deluded by his faire pretences of an accommodation, had given leave to his Secretary at his return from Pontoise, to enjoyne Mons^r. de Turenne not to stirr from his post, and to acquaint him with the progress of the Treaty; which he had no sooner done, and passing on to his master had given him notice of it, then that Prince, quite contrary to his ingagment, began to march, hoping to pass by the King's Army and come to Villeneuve S^t Georges, before they could have intelligence of his moving, or be in a condition of hindering him. And here can not (be) ommitted a particular answer, which Mons^r. de Turenne made to that Secretary, which was, That the promises of Monsieur de Lorraine, and just nothing, were the same thing to him. In pursuance of what he had said, and to justify his own opinion of Mons^r. de Lorraine's sincerity, he resolved to march the very next day, which was the 5th of September, to Brie-Comte Robert, that he might be more in the way of opposing M. de Lorraine's designs, in case he should march as he believ'd he wou'd, and, according to his custome, break his word. Upon which occasion Mons^r. de Turenne was heard say, That tho his orders from Court were positive not to leave his post, yet being morally certain that the Duke of Lorraine intended to deceive them, and knowing that it was for his Master's intrests that he shou'd march, he thought it better to venture his head by disobeying those orders, then by following them to let Monsieur de Lorraine gaine his post and pass by him.

Accordingly he began his march next morning, and Sent his quartermasters away before him to marke out the quarters at the foremention'd place, where they mett with M^r. de Lorraine's quartermasters, who were come to the same Town on the same errand ; he being himself on his march already, and intending to lodge there that night ; The Mareschall's quartermasters immediatly return'd to bring him the news of it, and found him with the Van of the Army which had newly pass'd a défilé. Mons^r. de Turenne without loosing a moment's time, sent presently notice of it to the Mareschall de la Ferté, whose turn it was that day to have the Reer, and desir'd him withall to come and speak with him, that they might resolve betwixt themselves what was instantly to be put in execution ; And because M^r. de la Ferté came not so soon as he expected, he went back leaving his troopes drawn up where they were, and met him at the défilé : wherupon having conferred together a litle time, they alter'd their resolutions of going to Brie-Comte Robert, and resolved to march directly to Villeneuve S^t Georges, which was a post of great importance : And M^r. de Turenne, to delay no time, march'd thitherwards with his horse at a round rate, ordering his foot and Cañon to come

P A R T

I.

1652.

Mons^r. de Turenne chuses rather to venture his head by disobeying the Court's orders, then by following them to let M^r. de Lorraine gaine his point.
Or: MEM:
P. I. p. 209.

M. de Turenne and M. de Lorraine's quartermasters meet at Brie Comte Robert.
Ibid. p. 208.

M^r. de Turenne resolves with M^r. de la Ferté to march to Villeneuve S^t Georges.
Or: MEM:
P. I. p. 208.

P A R T after him with all possible expedition; and desiring M^r. de la
 I. Ferté to use the like, being very apprehensive lest the Duke 1652. of Lorraine, who knew as well as himself the advantages of that post, shou'd get there before him: for he was confident that upon the Intelligence which his quartermasters brought him, he would also change his resolution of lodging at Brie, and endeavour to possess himself of Villeneuve S^t Georges.

Neither was the Mareschall de Turenne deceived in his conjecture, for the Duke so soon as he had notice of the Royalists' march, continu'd his own to Villeneuve S^t Georges, so that both Armys march'd with all imaginable speed, to prevent each other in the first possession of that place, having the brook or River of Yerre betwixt them; And thō the Royalists us'd their utmost diligence, yet the Van of the Enemy were already in the Town before they came up to it, and Mons^r. de Lorraine thought himself so secure of that post, that he wrott a letter to the Prince of Condé, and dated it from thence to give him assurance of his being there. Which particular his R. Highness the Duke hap-pen'd afterwards to know, from the very Officer that carryd the letter, and who in his return from Paris was taken by some of M^r. de Turenne's men. The news of the Royall Army being there, was so surprising to this Messenger, that he could scarcely beleieve himself to be in their hands, till he was brought to M^r.
 de Turenne, to whom he confessed in presence of his R. Highness what is here related.

Had not the advantage of the ground been on Mons^r. de Turenne's Side, the Duke of Lorraine had undoubtedly maintain'd that post: But thō he had just gotten the start, and was enter'd into the Town with his Van, and that some of his troopes had already pass'd the Yerre, which at that place falls into the Seyne, yet M^r. de Turenne coming with his Van upon the hill, which both overlooks and commands the Town and Rivers, drove the Enemy out of the place, and possest himself

Mr. de Lorraine's Van gets before them to Villeneuve
 S^t Georges, but is driven out of that post by M^r.
 de Turenne.
 On: MEM:
 P. 1. p. 210.

of the bridge over the Yerre which is adjoining to the Town's end ; the Duke of Lorraine's Army being at the same time so near, that they fir'd with their cañon at the first squadrons of the King's horse, which appear'd on the top of the hill. So that in effect the Royalists gain'd that post, not only by the diligence of their march, but allso by the advantage which they received from the higher ground. As for the foot and cañon they came not up till the very close of the Evening.

The Enemy, seeing that the Royalists were possess'd of that post which they had intended for themselves, went and incamped about half a league from them, over against a little Castle call'd Ablon which stands on the Seyne, about half a league from the Town up the River ; and within a day or two afterwards, the Prince of Condé march'd from Paris with all his troopes, and joyn'd him there, having pass'd over both his horse and foot in two or three large boats which he found accidentally on the River.

When the Enemys two Armys wer thus in conjunction, they thought themselves secure of Victory, having thrust the King's Army into a narrow nooke, as it might be call'd, betwixt the Yerre and the Seyne, and being double their number ; for they took it for granted, that the bread which the Royalists had in their quessons being once spent, which cou'd not last them above four or five days at farthest, they shou'd not be able to provide themselves with more, so that without striking so much as a single stroke they should conclude the warr. And they had reason for this beleef, for the King's foot found nothing in the Town for their Subsistance, to help out that small proportion of their bread, the Armys having been so lately there ; And besides there was such a scarcity of forrage, that from the very first night of their coming to Town, many of their troopers were forc'd to feed their horses with vine leaves. This melancholy welcom they found at their entrance into Villeneuve S^t Georges,

P A R T
I.

1652.

Mr.deLorraine camps at Ablon.
OR: MEM:
P. I. p: 211.

Pr^e of Condé marches from Paris andjoyns
the Duke of Lorraine at Ablon. Ibid.

The two Armys being joyn'd, they block up Mr.
de Turenne and reckon to starve him in Villeneuve
S^t Georges.
Ibid.

The King's Army in great Straits at Villeneuve
S^t Georges.
OR: MEM:
P. I. p: 212.

P A R T

I.

1652.

Industry to make two bridges over the Seyne.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 213.

and had it not been for four or five great boats, which they had the good fortune to find and secure for their uses the first night of their coming thither, their ruine had been inevitable; for without them it had been impossible for them to have made their bridges over the Seyne, and consequently they could never have been able to subsist as they did during the space of a whole month: It concern'd them therefore to lose no time in making them, so that they fell immediatly to work, and in two or three days they had finish'd one of them, and made a work on the other side of the Seyne, to cover and secure both that and the other bridge which was compleated in some few days after it. And to finish both these bridges, nay one may say to begin them, there was neither mony, nor timber, nor so much as planck; but the great industry of the Officers of the Ordnance supplyd all those defects, and overcame the difficulties of the undertaking, with the help of three hundred pistoles which they were forc'd to borrow from the Gamsters, there no being so poor a sum as that in the hands of the King's Intendants of the Army, and by plucking down some houses for the timber work, together with all the gates of the Innes of which there were many in that Town, and of the other houses which had any large enough for that purpose, which serv'd in stead of plancks; with these and the like shifts both the bridges over the Seyne were finish'd; and the effect of them was, that during some time the King's Army had that side of the River free for forrage.

The Royalists
intrench themselves towards Limay to secure their post at Villeneuve.
Ibid.

Then to put themselves into a condition of maintaining the post in which they were, they began to intrench themselves on the only side where they could be attacked, which was towards Limay; for as they lay incamped, they were cover'd with a wood on their right hand, by the Town and the River of Seyne on their left, and their back was defended by the Yerre; so that they had no other work but to secure their front, which look'd towards Limay and Gros-bois, and to perform that they had no more to do, but to continue the Lines betwixt the (five) redouts, which were yet entire since the Duke of Lorraine's incampment in that place: And they work'd both at the intrenchment and the bridges at the same time.

P A R T
I.

1652.

While the Royalists were thus imployd, the Army of the Enemy decamp'd from the River's side, leaving first a garrison in Ablon, and march'd towards Brie, intending to pass the Yerre about that place, so that they might the better be able to inclose Monsieur de Turenne on every side: While they were taking this compass, the Royalists' bridges over the Seyne being now finish'd, it was thought necessary to take in the Castle of Ablon, wherein, as has been said, (the Enemy) had left some Soldiers; because it being just upon the River, gave much hindrance to the communication with Corbeil by water, from whence the King's Army had their dependance to be furnish'd with all manner of provisions.

The Enemy decamp from Ablon and pass the Yerre at Brie, in order to inclose M. de Turenne on all sides.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 214.

In order to this design, Mons^r. de Renneville was commanded out with a party of horse and foot, and two pieces of ordinance, to take that Castle; and accordingly he march'd over the bridge of Boats, where M^r. de Turenne was in person to view them as they went, and to forward the finishing of the other bridge: But before Renneville could approach the Castle, intelligence was brought to Mons^r. de Turenne at the bridge, that some Squadrons of the Enemys horse began to appear betwixt the wood and Limay; upon which he immediatly sent a contermant to Renneville, ordering him to return with his party into the Camp, and himself went up the hill to discover the Enemy at a nearer distance; beleeving from the first notice that their whole Army was marching towards him: Neither was he deceived in his conjecture; for by that time he had gain'd the length of that eminence, he saw their foot beginning to appear; and that he might be inabled to make a true judg-

P A R T
I.

1652.

Mr. de Turenne puts himself amongst the Skirmishers to discover the Enemy's intention.
The Duke accompanies him.

OR: MEM:
P. I. p. 216.

The Duke is the first that observes that the Enemy was retrenching and informs
Mr. de Turenne therof. Ibid.

The Royalists
palissade their Lines and open'd their redouts behind.
OR: MEM:
P. I. p. 217.

ment, whither or no they intended immediatly to attack him, and (or) only to post themselves where they then were, he put himself amongst the Skirmishers; all those who were about him being well mounted, amongst whom was his R. Highness the Duke, and they went so near the Enemy who gave ground in skirmishing, that they were able to make their observations: But M^r. de Turenne who saw not clearly at a distance, would not trust his own eyesight, he therefore desired the Duke to observe as exactly as he could, and inform him what the Enemy was doing; And his Royall Highness was the first person who assured him, that he saw plainly they were intrenching, which was presently confirm'd by some others of the Company: Being assur'd of this, he drew back into his Camp, not a litle satisfied that they had no intention of storming his Lines, which then were in no good condition of defence, as not being yet finish'd.

To strengthen them therfore he commanded that they should be pallissaded, which was executed in the space of six houres, Every Regiment both of horse and foot working incessantly at that part of the Line behind which they were drawn up. This being once perform'd, the Army now thought themselves moderatly secure, and their next imployment was to open those redouts behind, which they had found ready made by the Duke of Lorraine at his last being in that place; judging it more expedient to haue them open, then that they should be wholly clos'd up behind: because in case the Enemy should gaine any of them, it would be difficult to recover them if they were not open.

At the same time that the Prince of Condé came and lay before the Royall Army at Limay, the Duke of Lorraine with his Army lodg'd themselves about a league from the Royalists, up the brook betwixt them and Brie; so that they were so closely block'd up, that the Enemy thought themselves secure of them, and that in the compass of a litle time they should either starve them out, or force them upon some desperate undertaking. The Prince of Condé where he lay, which was at no greater a distance from Mons^r. de Turenne's Lines then cañon-shott, had intrenched himself very strongly ; and when that was done, his next imployment was to make a bridge of boats over the Seyne about a league from the Royall Army down y^e River, by that means to hinder all foraging on that side of the River, and to leave the Royalists no secure place of foraging, or any way of bringing of Convoys with safety from Corbeil : for the Duke of Lorraine's troopes were continually out in partys, and obstructed as much as in them lay the Royalists' communication with that Town, on the Brie side of the Seyne ; and the Prince of Condé's troopes, when their bridge was once finish'd, obstructed it on the other side. But before the Prince had compleated his bridge, Mons^r. de Turenne sent out a party of horse and foot with two pieces of cañon, and tooke the Castle of Ablon, which absolutly secur'd the communication with Corbeil by water, and he order'd such diligence in foraging, that his Army had made tollerable provision for themselves, having eaten up the whole Country within a reasonable distance from their Camp betwixt Paris and Juvisy. But when one (once) the Prince's Bridge was finish'd, they were put to hardships to secure their foragers ; And had any one of those partys miscarryd, the condition of the King's Army had been desperate, being then reduced to such extremities, that they were constrain'd to send out the greatest part of their horse and some foot to secure them ; and that which render'd it yet more difficult was that they were oblig'd to go out so far to find provisions, that their foragers could not return on the same day.

But at length the King's Generalls found an expedient which prevented the danger, and made the foraging as secure

P A R T I

1652.

The P^{er} of Condé in-trenches himself at Limay within Canon-shott of M^r. de Turenne's Lines, and makes a bridge over the Seyne to hinder the Royalists
from foraging.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 218.

M^r. de Turenne takes the Castle of Ablon which secur'd the communication with Corbeil by water.
Ibid.

Great hardships to secure the foragers of the King's Army.
Ibid. p. 219

Expedient found by the Generalls to make it more easy.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 219.

P A R T as the nature of the thing could bear. The way was this :
L Before the foragers went out, they sent partys of horse on both 1652. sides of the River towards Corbeil, to discover whither or no the Coast was clear, and at the same time others from that Town ; for they had order'd 300 horse which came from the taking of Montrond, to continue at Corbeil for that purpose.
 These came out from thence and met the foragers half way, and after they had inform'd each other of what they had seen in their scowring about the Country, return'd on both sides from whence they came, and according to the intelligence which they brought, the foragers either proceeded or were stop'd. When they went out, they forag'd beyond Corbeil passing over the River of Essoñe, which falls there into the Seyne : When they were once on the farther side of it they were secure, and had leasure quietly to gather their provisions ; where staying to rest their horses for one night, they return'd to Corbeil, and, the former precaution of double partys from Corbeil and from the Camp being us'd, the foragers came back safe, some times on one and some times on the other side of the River, according as they had observ'd that the Coast was clear, And by following this method they never had the least accident in all the Convoys of their forage ; so that it may be truly said, the whole fortune of the French Monarchy depended on each of those Convoys, for had any one of them miscarryd, the Army had been lost, and after that the ruine of the Crown must have succeeded.

But while the Royall Army continu'd to be bloock'd up in this manner, their small partys were not idle, ranging over all the Country on that side of the River which is towards Orleans, even to the gates of Paris, which was no small inconveniency and vexation to that City, interrupting all their Commerce on that side of the Country ; and on the other side of the River they were no less molested by troopes of their own Party ; So that it was not long, before they were sensible of the mischeifs which are inseparable from the neighbourood of two Armies : And this was the more greivous to them, because they had been positively assured from the P^{ce} of Condé, that within ten days after he had continu'd at Villeneuve St Georges, the warr shou'd be determin'd by the King's Army's surrendring itself for want of all manner of provisions, and that consequently they should be eas'd from the burden of so many troopes. And truly they pleas'd themselves with that vaine imagination for some time, being fed with promises from day to day, that all things were drawing to a conclusion ; But when they saw at length that they were deluded of their expectations, and that nothing happen'd of all that had been promis'd, it made them much more inclinable to the Court then they had been formerly, and inspir'd them with more becoming thoughts of returning to their duty: for they (now) began in good earnest to consider, what a folly and madness it was in them to suffer themselves to be devoured by Strangers, with no prospect of benefit accruing to their City or of advantage to the French Nation, but that they were only to be made the stalking horses of some ambitious spirits, to further them in their pernicious design of ingrossing and usurping the Supreme power ; and all this to be perform'd at their own expence. When once these reasonable thoughts were enter'd into their minds, it was no hard matter for the Loyall party in the Town to make their advantage of the good impressions, and to foment the misunderstandings which began to kindle betwixt the Parisians and the Princes. In these honest endeavours the Cardinal de Retz was never wanting to perform his part; and the divisions amongst them increasing daly, there happen'd severall great disorders in the Town, which added to the courage of the King's Party, and lessen'd the credit of those popular Boutte-feux, who till then had a great intrest with the common people:

P A R T
I.

1652.

The P^{ce} of Condé assures the Parisians that in ten days the King's Army at Villeneuve will be forced to surrender.
Ibid.

The Parisians disappointed in the hopes the P^{ce} of Condé had given them, begin to be weary of the warr and to think of returning to their duty.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p: 222.

P A R T

I.

1652.

These things refreshing the remembrance of what had past at the Hotel de Ville, quite ruin'd the reputation of the Princes, and gave the Parisians plainly to discern what they ambitiously design'd.

But to return to what past in the Army during all the time of the Blockade: there never happen'd any action of great moment, the circumspection of the Generalls being such in the Convoys of the forage, that the Enemy were never able to give them the least disturbance; and the Retrenchments withall being so strong, that no attempt durst be made upon them where they lay. Yet ther happen'd frequent Skirmishes, which were not to be avoided on either side by reason of the nearness of the Lines, and that every day some partys of the Royalists went out to forage. One day above all the rest there was a considerable Skirmish, which was occasion'd by the coming of the Duke of Orleans to see the Rebells' Army. For when he came to the Prince of Condé's quarter, many of the young men of quality who had attended him from Paris, had a desire to shew their bravery, and went off their Lines to pickeere with the King's Soldiers, who seeing them advance in such numbers, came out of their Lines to ingage them. And this was like to have produced a generall Combat even against the inclination of their Commanders; for not only the horse were pickeering on the plain, but severall of the loose foot were at the same work amongst the vinyards, which were planted on the side and all along to the top of the hill. The Royalists' Volonteers who were but few, and other Skirmishers on horseback, ingaged themselves so far, that Mons'. de Turenne was forced to send out M^r. le Marquis de Richelieu with severall small bodies of horse, about twenty men in each, to disingage them; which the Prince observing, did the like on his side, for fear his men might allso run themselves into some inconveniences. Thus either party drew off into their Lines, it being hazardous for

A considerable Skirmish occasion'd by the Duke of Orleans coming to see the Rebells' Army, which was like to produce a generall Combat.
OR: MEM:
P: I. p: 224.

horse to be long without the Retrenchments, because the Lines were so close to each other, that being furnish'd as they were with cañon, the shott which was levell'd at the horse, most commonly fell into either Camp; In this Skirmish there were severall men kill'd and wounded, as well as y^e Royalists as well as of the Enemy. Of the first was the Marquis de —, who was slaine, and a Captain of Douglas call'd Tivy was taken prisoner; who within few days after made his escape and brought to Mons^r. de Turenne the news, that the Prince of Condé was retir'd from the Army, being sick, and gone to Paris, where the leaders of the Faction were still endeavouring to keep up the hearts of their declining party, with false hopes of seeing the Royall Army perish for want of victualls and provisions. Whither their cheif heads beleev'd it or not, I cannot say, but certain it is that if they did, they tooke false measures: for the longer the Army stayd at Villeneuve S^t Georges, the better they were supplyd, being furnish'd very plentifully with all they wanted down the River from Corbeil.

During this time there happen'd one memorable Action which we cannot but relate. It was perform'd by one Seguin a Captain of horse of Beauveau's Regiment, who frequently went out on partys. This Seguin being abroad with a hundred horse, and having put himself in ambush to fall on the foragers of the Enemy, when they were come and settled at their work, broke out upon them; but in stead of charging them, having discover'd a squadron of horse which was posted at a litle distance from him on a heighth, and which he imagin'd was their only Convoy, he took a resolution of fighting them: So he march'd towards them on a round trot; but when he was just approaching them, he perceived four Squadrons more appearing, and immediatly turning to his men, told them, It was now too late to think of a retreat, and that they must instantly resolve to work out their safety with their swords; That their only way

P A R T
I.

1652.

The P^r of Condé retires from the Army sick, and go's to Paris.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p: 228.

A memorable action of one Seguin a Partisan, who with 100 horse attacks five Squadrons of the Enemy, kills 60 on the place and takes 50 prisoners.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 225.

P A R T

I.

1652.

was to divide themselves into five bodies, and each of them to charge one of the Enemys: This was done according to his orders, drawing up but two deep; and they attack'd the Enemy so vigourously that they routed them, killing sixty on the place, of which number some were Officers, and taking fifty prisoners with a Major and one or two Captains: Those whom they defeated were the old Regiment of Wirtemberg.

The Court was all this while either at Pontoise, or at S' Germain's, and maintain'd their intelligence at Paris; being very well inform'd how affaires were managed in that place, and how unsatisfied the Parisians were with the proceedings of the Princes, and the continuance of the Warr at their very gates. Seeing therfore that the inclinations of the people were now more favourable to them, and their condition receiving dayly some amendment, they sent to the two Mareschalls de Turenne and la Ferté, to know whither they thought it possible for them to bring off the Army from their post, without suffering some affront from the Enemy; and that in case they cou'd perform it, they shou'd draw off and endeavour to joine the Court, in favour of the designs and practices which they had then on foot in Paris: The Generalls having received these orders, began to provide for the departure of the Army; and in pursuite of their Instructions, order'd twelve bridges to be made over the small River, under pretence that they were for the conveniency of the foragers; and at the same time they sent directions to those troopes who were lying (near) to Corbeil, to make some redouts upon a high before that Town, under the same pretence of securing the retreat of the Foragers, in case they shou'd be attacked on that side of the Country.

The Court orders the two Mareschalls to endeavour to bring off the Army from Villeneuve S' Georges.
OR: MEM:
P. I. p. 228.

The Royall Army begins to draw off from Villeneuve S' Georges the 4th of October in the Evening, and they arrive next morning at Corbeil without the least hinderance.
OR: MEM:
P. I. p. 229.

When both these commands were executed on the 4th of October, an hourt before Sun sett, order was given to prepare for marching, and that all things shou'd be carryd with great silence. By that time it began to be dark, the baggage had orders to sett forward to Corbeil on the lower way, along by the River side ; some horse and dragoons were commanded to march at the head of them, and to draw up under the redouts by Corbeil. So soon as the baggage had past the bridges over the brook, the troopes in their order began to march ; but neither the Guards or Centrys were drawn from the Line, till the whole Army was past over the bridges, and then they came off and broke them, that the Enemy might not be able to follow them in case their retreat shou'd be discover'd : But they were so far from suspecting any thing of that nature, that they had design'd that very night to have storm'd the Regiment of Nettencour, which was posted, on the other side of the Seync, in a work which the Royalists had made to secure their two bridges over that River, in which there was also a guard of fourty horse ; and that the Enemy might carry it the more easily and hinder the King's troopes that were within it from succour, they caus'd severall great Floats of wood, of such as usually come down that River for the consumption of Paris, to be let loose and sett adrift, the weight of which if they came to bear upon the bridges, would infallibly break them : And these Floats, which came driving down the stream for the space of a league above the bridges, had the effect which the Enemy desir'd ; for just before the men who lay there intrenched had orders to draw off, the Major, who waited on Mons'. de Turenne to know when it shou'd be time for them to come over to joyne the rest of the Army, going to carry them their orders, found the bridge broken, and brought an account of it to the Generall ; who immediatly order'd them to march to Corbeil on that side of the River where they were, as not thinking it convenient to forestow his march by staying till he could pass these men and their baggage over, most of the troopes having already pass'd the other bridges. Yet these men were so for-

P A R T

I.

1652.

fortunate as not to meet any obstacle in their way, so that the next morning they joyn'd the Army at Corbeil.

A litle before day, the party that was commanded to storm that work which the Royalists had left, approached the place, and not only found that it was deserted, but that the whole Army was dislodged and gone, which was the first notice the Enemy had of their departure: They made their Commanders acquainted with it, but it was already too late for them to fall upon the Royalists' rear; And had they been sooner advertis'd of it, though they had follow'd the King's Army, in all probability they cou'd have done them litle harm: for by that time the Army had march'd a league or somewhat more, the ground was so very favourable for them, that they had no apprehension of the Enemys force. For on one hand they had the River, and the forest of Sennard on the other, so that the Emy could not fall into their flanks, and then the distance from the one to the other was not so great, but that they could easily fill the whole extent of the ground; so that they could not be outwing'd, and still the nearer they approached to Corbeil, it grew the narrower.

In this manner, without the least hindrance or molestation, the Royall Army arrived at Corbeil, the hindermost troopes thereof being enter'd before Sun rising. They rested all that day in those quarters; and not being certain whither or no the Enemy might march after them to attack them in that place, they immediatly fell to work and intrenched their Camp, thō they were to continue in it but for one night. And the next morning being the 6th, they march'd away, and went that evening as far as Chaumes with intention to pas the Marne at Meaux, and from thence to joyn the Court.

The Royall
Army march the 6th to Chaumes.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p: 231.

That first day's march to Chaumes was very long, especially considering that it was in the power of the Enemy to have fought the Royalists, if they had so resolv'd ; for which reason during the whole day the Army march'd so orderly, that in a quarter of an hour they might all haue been drawn up in battell: For that wing which was formost march'd two squadrons a front, which were the two first squadrons of each line of that wing according to the order of battell, that of the first line marching on the left hand, and the other of the second line on the right ; keeping the same distance as they were accustomed to be from one another, after the manner of the two first: The foot in like order follow'd the horse, the first line of foot marching after the first of horse, and the second after the same manner ; the Gens d'armes marching in their usuall place in time of battell betwixt the two lines of foot, and the other wing of horse follow'd the foot in the same method : so that whensoever the Enemy had come to charge them, they needed only to have faced to the left, and they had been in battell, as may be easily discern'd by the following Draught.

P A R T

I.

1652.

Order of the march of the King's Army to Chaumes.
Ibid.

* * Although a space is left in the M.S. no Plan was inserted.—EDITOR.

The Train of Artillery, with the quessons, march'd on the right hand of the foot, and the baggage on the right hand of them. In this order march'd the Royall Army during the whole day, expecting the Enemy who came not to disturbe them ; and that day being once over, they no longer beleev'd they would be attacked ; and so the following days the march was continued with more ease and conveniency, and less circumspection. Having march'd by Presle, Tournam, and Quincé, on the 1th

The Royall
Army pass the Marne near Meaux the 1th of October.
OR: MEM.
P. 1. p. 233.

P A R T I. they pass'd the Marne neer Meaux, and incamped the same night at Boretz; from whence they march'd to Mont l'Eueque, then to Courteuil, where they had the River which runs by that place to cover them.

1652.

While they made this march, the Enemy was in great perplexity and amazement that the Royalists were so unexpectedly gott clear of them, which absolutly ruin'd the Enemys credit with the Parisians; for having given them daily assurances, that they would suddently conclude the warr by famishing the King's Army, and that hope being now vanish'd, the eyes of that people were fully open'd, and they saw clearly into the rest of their delusions; and at the same time feeling the intolerable burden of the warr, and of so many Armys even at their doors, their desires were increas'd of freeing themselves at once from all their grievances by the return of their King, which good inclinations of theirs were not neglected by the Cardinal de Retz, and others of the King's Party; which now visibly increasing every day, the Prince of Condé, and Duke of Lorraine, found it was not their intrest to stay any longer with their Armys thereabouts, for they saw by experience that the longer they stayd the fewer friends they had, and that no other means was left to preserve those few they had yet remaining in that Town, then by marching their Armys away from the neighbourhood of it, and carrying the warr to a greater distance: And besides the weight of these considerations, the winter was now drawing on apace, and the Country about Paris quite devour'd, so that it would have prov'd very difficult to have made an Army subsist in those quarters: For these and perhaps some other unknown reasons, they were forced to a resolution of leaving Paris, and found there was no other expedient but to winter their Armys in Champagne and Lorraine; the Spanish Army being to joine them at Rhetel, and to assist them in taking such places in those Countries, as wou'd

The King's Party in Paris increasing daily, the P. of Condé and Duke of Lorraine resolve to march from its neighbourhood and carry the warr to a distance. Oa: MEM: P. 1. p. 233.

secure them in their quarters. As for the Duke of Orleans and his daughter Madmoiselle, it was thought necessary that they shou'd remain still at Paris, to use their intrest and endeavours to hinder that Town from receiving the King.

P A R T
I.

1652.

Those resolutions being once taken by them, they were speedily put in execution; for by that time the King's Army was come to Courteuil near Senlis, which was about the 14th of October, theirs pass'd by them on their march towards Champagne.

They march their troopes towards Champagne, passing by the King's Army at Courteuil the 14th of October.
Ibid. p. 234.

When it was known at Court that the Enemy had left Paris, they judg'd it their intrest to get into it: And Mons^r de Turenne, who had once before propos'd it to the Councill that they should march directly to that Town, went on purpose to the Court which then lay at S^t Germain, to perswad them to it a second time; Letting them see the necessity of such a resolution, that this was the most proper time to adventure it, and not to suffer the disgust which the Parisians had to the Princes, to wear off by their absence: To strengthen this advice, he made it manifest, That if the King possessed not himself of Paris, there was no possibility of procuring winter-quarters for their troopes, and consequently he cou'd have no Army in readiness against the next spring, to oppose so powerfull an Army as he shou'd then have upon his hands; for shou'd Paris refuse to admitt the King, the rest of the great places wou'd undoubtedly follow their example; To conclude, he affirm'd that all depended on the good or ill Success of that affaire. These reasons, which are but lightly touch'd here, were set forth so fully and so convincingly by M^r. de Turenne to the Councill, that the resolution of going to Paris was approv'd as absolutly necessary, and in pursuance of it the Court sett out from S^t Germain. And being now as far on their way as the bois de Boulogne (for they were obliged to go by S^t Cloud, the other bridges being broken down) they were mett by some who came out of

Mons^r. de Turenne go's on purpose to Court to perswadethem to go to Paris,
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p: 234.

Convinc'd by M^r. de Turenne's Arguments, the Court sets forth from S^t Germain to go to Paris.
Ibid. p. 235.

P A R T

I.

1652.
Some Trimmers from Paris meet the Court at bois de Boulogne, and dissuade coming to Paris.

OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 235.

All the Council of opinion, that the Court should return to St Germain's, excepting Mr. de Turenne.
Ibid.

The Queen of an undaunted courage, preferring Mr. de Turenne's opinion to that of the whole body of the Council, resolves to go on to Paris.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 236.

Paris, true trimmers, who addressed themselves to certain members of the Council, to whom they represented the hazard of their present undertaking, and how dangerous a consequence it might be, to adventure the person of the King and his only Brother in Paris; and they so fill'd their heads with these suspicions, that they went immediatly to the Queen's Coach in which the King was, to informe of it and to dissuade him from so desperate an attempt; Whereupon the Queen stop'd her Coach, and call'd for the rest of the Council and Mr. de Turenne to advise what was fitting to be done.

After they had debated the Affaire some time, they were all of opinion, That their Ma^{ties} shou'd return to St Germain's, excepting only Mons^r. de Turenne, who persisted in the former resolution, urging all the arguments which had perswaded that opinion, to continue in it, and to go through with what they had undertaken; Adding, that it would now be both prejudicial to the King's affaires, and withall dishonorable, as shewing a manifest want of resolution, to return when they were so far advanced on their way to Paris; That it would bring a Contempt on the Court, dishearten their Freinds, and encourage their Enemy's; In short, that they must expect from this timorous change in their resolution, all the ill consequences which had been formerly represented to them; That he look'd on those persons who brought this advice, either as covert Enemies to the King by endeavouring to hinder his coming into Paris, or at least as men of weak judgments, on whose opinions his Majesty ought not to rely. His arguments were so prevalent on the Queen, who was certainly a Princesse of a most undaunted courage, and consequently not easily to be frighted, that notwithstanding all the reasons which were offer'd to her by the whole body of the Council, She resolv'd on going forward; Saying, that she thought it better to expose herself and her Sons to all these dangers, on so considerable an occasion, then to ruine the honour of both by so mean an action as their return: Besides that it wou'd be the certain way to render their condition desperate, and that they must never hope to come into Paris if they lost the present opportunity.

Thus the Affaire was settled, and his Majesty at the head of his Guards march'd on, entering into the Town at the Porte S^t Honoré: So far from meeting the least opposition, that he was saluted every where as he past along, with great acclamations of joy, and follow'd by a Vast concourse of people to the Louure. The Duke of Orleans, as the King enter'd at one end of the City, went out at the other; And as for his daughter, Madmoiselle, she stayd in her lodgings at the Tuilleries, till she receiv'd a Command from his Ma^{ty} immediatly after he was in the Louure, to depart from Paris, which accordingly she obeyed.

This was no sooner done, then Mons^r. de Turenne return'd to the Army, and about the end of the month began his march after the Enemy, who had taken theirs through Champagne, and in passing had possest themselves of Château-Porcien, and Rhétel upon the Aysne, which they took without much resistance. From thence they went to S^t Menchou which was very well defended, thō forced at last to surrender on composition, for besides the ordinary garrison that was in it, there were but four Companies of the Duke's Regiment, which got into it before it was invested; for when the Enemy left Paris, the two foot Regiments of la Ferté and York, with some horse of la Ferté's troopes, were sent away in all hast, with orders to put themselves into S^t Menchou, and the places of Barois; and Monsieur de la Ferté himself went also to Nancy, to secure his government of Lorraine in the best manner he was able, suspecting that the Enemy's design would be to take up their winter-quarter in those parts, as accordingly it came to pass.

P A R T
I.

1652.

The King of France enters in at the Porte S^t Honoré at the head of his Guards without the least opposition.

Ibid.

The Duke of Orleans retires out of the Town. Ibid.

Orders sent to Madmoiselle to retire also from Paris.

Ibid.

Mr. de Turenne returns to the Army and with it marches after the Enemy.

OR: MEM:

P. I. p: 237.

The Pre of Condé takes Château-Porcien and Rhétel. Ibid.

Mr. de la Ferté marches to Nancy to secure his governm^t of Lorraine. Ibid.

P A R T
I.

1652.
The Duke marches with
M. de Turenne's Army to Champagne, they quarter at Balieux the 2^d of November. Ibid.
The Soldiers so drunk with new win, that there are not enough of them for the ordinary for the Duke and M^r. de Turenne.
Ibid.

Count Fuensaldagne joins the Princes' Army.
OR: MEM:
P. I. p. 237.

The P^r of Condé takes S^t Menehou
the 13 Nov.
Ibid. p. 238.

The Duke went along with M^r. de Turenne, who march'd his Army directly for Champagne. In their march to Epernay they quarter'd on the 2^d of Nouembre at Balieux, where they were oblig'd to stop a whole day; because the Soldiers in coming thether found so great a quantity of new win, after the Vintage in a Country which was plentifully stor'd with that liquour, that of all the foot there came not enough up to the quarter, to make the ordinary guard for the Duke and M^r. de Turenne; so that they stirr'd not till the 4th. When they got their men together, they continu'd their march to Dizi neer Epernay, where they passed the Marne on the 5th of November, to keep that River betwixt them and the Enemy, who were then about Rhetel; the Royall Army not being of sufficient strength to adventure neer them in that open Country. For besides the forces which the Prince of Condé and Duke of Lorraine had brought with them from Paris, the Count de Fuenseldagne had joyn'd them with a considerable part of the Spanish Army; it was therefore thought best to follow them at a convenient distance, still keeping some River, or some great défilé betwixt the Royall Army and them, or keeping such a distance from them, that they ran no hazard of being surpriz'd or engag'd before they were aware.

On the 6th they came to Chaype (Cheppes) which is a litle short of Vitry le François; and after they had stayd there three or four days, they pass'd the Marne and quarter'd at Vitry le Bruslé, thence came to the fauxbourg of Vitry le François on the 16th, still governing their motion according to that of the Enemy. During the time that they were about these places, the Enemy took S^t Menehou on the 15th. From that Town they licens'd the troopes of the Duke of Orleans (which were with him) to return into France, on condition they shou'd not serve during the rest of the Campagne, or any where in that side of the Country. Wherupon they went immediatly to quarters appointed for them in Picardy, and were the next year sent to serve in the Armys on the other frontiers of France. After this the Enemy went and beseiged Barleduc, in which Town Mons^r. de la Ferté had plass'd one Roussillon to command, with such a garrison as was sufficient to haue defended it a longer time then he did. And such was his folly, that he refus'd to be strengthen'd with more men; for while the Enemy was yet at S^t Menhou, M. de Turenne sent a recruit of 500 foot to S^t Dizier, with orders to march for Barleduc, in case the Governour should haue occasion for them: But his answer was, that he had men enough, and thanking Mons^r. de Turenne for his care of him, assur'd him with all, that he was well prepar'd to receive the Enemy whensoever they shou'd dare to approach him. After this, when he was ready to be invested, he sent Mons^r. de Turenne word of it, with new promises that he wou'd give a good account of the place.

It was on the 18th, when this news came to M^r. de Turenne, when he was at Vitry le François, whereupon he march'd away to releeve it with all possible expedition; and that the Enemy might have no intelligence of his approche, he repassed the Marne at Vitry, and leaving the River on his left hand, march'd up along by it, and by break of day came to S^t Dizier. At that place he made a halt to refresh his Army for some few houres; but just as he was preparing to march again, he received intelligence that both the Town and Castle were surrender'd to the Enemy; for which reason he advanced no further but quarter'd there. This uncomfortable news exceedingly surpris'd the Royalists; and they were the more sensible of it, because it disappointed the design, not only of succuring the place, but also of defeating the Enemy, at least of puting them to so hasty a retreat, that they must of necessity haue lost their baggage and their cañon; and certainly never Enterprise was better design'd, or more

P A R T
I.

1652.
Barleduc beseiged by the F^{ces} of Condé.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p. 238.

M.deTurenne
marches from Vitry le François the 18 November to releeve Barleduc.
Ibid. p. 239.

M.deTurenne is Stopp'd at S^t Dizier with the news of Barleduc's being Surrender'd.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p. 239.

M. de Turenne's great conduct in the Enterprise of releaving Barleduc.
Ibid.

P A R T judiciously conducted: for thō the Royall Army was much
I. inferiour to the Enemys in number, yet the ground was such, 1652. that the Royalists ran no hazard in marching to them; it being a woodland Country on that side of Barr, and Mons^r. de Turenne having then six thousand well disciplin'd foot, his Army having been reinforced both with horse and infantry by the occasion of severall troopes from the garrisons of Artois and Picardy and other places, which could well spare them when the Enemy was departed out of France, and consequently distant from those parts.

Description of the Enemys post before Barleduc
 where M^r. de Turenne
 propos'd to attack them.
 OR: MEM:
 P. 1: p. 240.

By the favour of these foremention'd woods and suddainness of the march, M. de Turenne might reasonably expect to haue been upon the Enemy, before they shou'd have been advertis'd of it; they cou'd haue received no considerable benefit by their intelligence: for such is the Situation of the place, and such the disadvantage of the post for those who attack the Town, against the Enemy who comes to releive it on that side, that their retrenchments are not to be maintain'd; for the woods extend in length within a league of the Town, and from the woods to the Castle lyes a spacious plaine: The Castle and the upper Town are placed upon that levell, and upon the brink of a descent which leads to the lower Town; a brooke or litle River runs at the bottome. The bottome itself is narrow and the ascent on each side steep and troublesome. So that he could haue been ingaged only by those of the Enemy who were on his side of the River, and they would haue past their time but litle at their ease between his Army and the Castle; neither could they haue been able to maintain that post betwixt the wood and the Castle, nor in their drawing off cou'd they haue kept their order; so that in all probability he shou'd have pressed them till they had tumbled upon one another: And this M^r. de Turenne undertook, when it was beleev'd that the Enemys whole Army was together in a body, thō in all liklyhood the — shou'd haue found a much easier task of it; because the Count Fuensaldagne was already march'd away from their Army, having drawn along with him the greatest part of his forces, as not beleevving Mons^r. de Turenne to be so strong as he was, and imagining that those troopes which the Prince of Condé and Duke of Lorraine had with them, were sufficient to take in all the Barois, and there to make good their winter quarters.

P A R T
I.

1652.
The indiscretion of the Governour of Barleduc occasions the loss of the Town.
OR: MEM:
P. 1: p. 241.

Thus by the rashness and indiscretion of Mons^r. de Roussillon who commanded in Barleduc, what M^r. de Turenne had so well design'd was render'd ineffectuall. And certainly never any man playd a more inconsiderate part then that addle headed Governour; for thō he had sent word to M. de Turenne that he expected to be invested, and saw the Enemy marching towards him, yet he was so stupidly negligent as to suffer the four best Companies of his garrison to be surprised in the lower Town, which was defended with a wall sufficiently strong and incompass'd with a wett ditch, so that it might haue been maintain'd with ease till a breach had been made: But the Enemy having master'd it the first night they camé, yet thought it not convenient to make their attack upon that side, but the next day rais'd a battery upon the plaine against the Castle; and their guns no sooner playd, that the Governour sent out to parley before any thing like a breach was made in the wall, agreeing to march out the next morning. At the taking of this Town the Duke of Lorraine lost M^r Fouge (Fauge) a Lieutenant Generall, and the best Officer in his Army; he was kill'd the neight after they had taken the lower Town, and procur'd his own death by strange caprice of folly: for being at supper with the Prince of Condé and severall others, in one of the next houses to the upper Town, and making a debauch, he grew so drunk, that he ran out in a foolish bravery at a back door with a napekin on his head, to be discern'd the

The best officer of the Duke of Lorraine's Army kill'd by his own folly.
Ibid.

P A R T

I.

1652.

The sudden surrender of Barleduc breaking
M. de Turenne's measures, is the occasion also of the loss of Ligny, Voy, and Com-mercy.
On: MEM.
P. 1. p. 242.

The Duke of Longueville brings a recruit to M. de Turenne from Normandy. Ibid.

better in the night, and to provoke the Enemy to shoot at him. The Cheualier de Guise and the Prince of Condé himself ran out after him to bring him back ; but before they could hale him in, he receiv'd a shott which kill'd him.

The sudden surrender of this Town not only broke the measures for releeving it and defeating the Enemy, but had a worse consequence, for it gave time to the Enemy to make themselves masters of Ligny, Voy, and Commercy, because M^r. de Turenne being ignorant of M^r. de Fuensaldagne's departure durst not come too near them, for which reason he stayd two or three days at S^t Dizier ; they in the mean time taking in the places abovemention'd, which were but slightly man'd with inconsiderable garrisons, and made litle or no defence.

From S^t Dizier the Royall Army advanced after the Enemy, and came to Stinville, where there came up to them a considerable recruit out of Normandy composed of the Duke of Longueville's Regiment of horse, which consisted of three hundred, and that of his foot which were about twelve hundred, with them came also the Earle of Bristol's Regiment of horse and Company of ordinance ; and thō they were all but new rais'd souldiers, excepting the company of ordinance, so that no great service cou'd be expected from them, yet their number did good, because they gave reputation. At this Town of Stinville, Mons^r. de Turenne had the first intelligence that the Count of Fuensaldagne was gone from the Prince's Army with his troopes ; and upon this notice which was given on the 25th, he march'd the next day to give battell to the Prince of Condé and the Duke of Lorraine, or in case they avoided it, to drive them out of those quarters, where they had propos'd to themselves to winter : and indeed they were So secure of it in their own opinion, that they had issu'd out their orders accordingly, but it appear'd by the event that they had taken wrong measures ; for upon M. de Turenne's advancing to them the next day, they were so far from being able to compass their designs, that they durst not stand, but found that it was their safest course to march away with all possible expedition, passing the Maze near Voy, in which place the Prince of Condé was, when he had notice of Mons^r. de Turenne's advancing towards him : After which leaving the River on their left hand, they made what hast they could towards Luxembourg, and M^r. de Turenne follow'd them so close, that for the most part he came about noon to the place where they had quarter'd the night before, and from whence they had march'd the same morning. After this manner he pursu'd them, till he came to S^t Michel on the 30th on the forenoon, where finding it was to no purpose to follow them any further, they being so near the shelter of their own Country that they were out of danger, he gave over following them ; his thoughts being intent only on finding out means to refresh his Army, especially the foot, which were exceedingly harrass'd with the great and painfull marches they had taken, and were now starving for want of bread : for the Enemy as they march'd before them had eaten up the Country, and the questions were quite empty, it being actually impossible for the Commissary of the Victualls to provide bread for them.

Upon the Army's arrivall at S^t Michel, M^r. de Turenne sent into the Town that they shou'd bring out some bread for the releif of the foot ; but they making a difficulting of obeying him, and pretending they could not furnish so great a quantity in one day, he found there was no other way of preserving those distressed soldiers but by quartering them all upon the Town ; for which reason he march'd into it with the foot, Gendarmes and cannon, quartering the horse in the neighbouring Villages. The Army's stay in this was very short, however it serv'd to refresh the soldiers ; for so soon as the Mareschall la Ferté, in whose Government it was, had notice of their being there, he came in great hast from Nancy, which is about ten or twelve

P A R T
I.

1652.
The P^{re} of Condé marches away with all expedition.
OR: MEM:
P: 1: p: 243.

M^r. de Turenne pursues him close till he came to S^t Michel on the 30th November. Ibid.

M^r. de Turenne obliged for preservation of his wearyed Soldiers, to quarter them upon the Town of S^t Michel.
OR: MEM:
P: 1. p. 243.
Mareschall de la Ferté so offended at this quarter-ing, that in a long time after he cou'd not be reconcil'd to M. de Turenne.
Ibid. p. 244.

P A R T I.
 1652. leagues distant from S^t Michel, to desire Mons^r. de Turenne to leave the Town, being very much offended at his quartering there; in so much that he was (not) throwly reconcil'd to him in a long time afterwards, which prov'd exceedingly prejudiciall to the King's Service, as by the sequell will be seen. Upon his summons the next day after his arrivall which was the 2^d of December, the Army drew out; but M^r. de la Ferté was so much enraged by seeing that some of the men had been bolder then became them in their quarters, taking more then meat and drink, that as they were marching out, he himself attended by his guards fell upon such of them as stragled or were loytering behind, hacking and hewing them as if they had been Enemys. In so much that coming near the quarters of the Gendarmes who were not yet march'd out, nor wholly drawn together, one of the Earle of Bristol's troope whose name was Manwaring, seeing how furiously he dealt his blows, and not knowing the person of the Mareschall, took him and his guards to be the Enemy, and in that opinion made up to him, and sett his pistoll to his brest which fortunatly for both miss'd firing. Thus the Mareschall escap'd from being kill'd, and the horseman was knock'd down and wounded by the guards in six or seven places, of which he afterwards recover'd. And C. Berkley, who was then Cornett to the same Company of Gendarmes, miss'd but narrowly of the same usage; for hearing the noise which was made by the Mareschall and his Guards, and taking it for granted, as Manwaring had done before him, that the Enemy was in the Town, he went up to the corner of the street along which they were coming, with his pistoll in his hand, and at their approach discovering the Mareschall, made but one motion of puting up his pistoll and taking off his hatt; by which means he escap'd better cheap then his Trooper, because he was known to him.

M. de la Ferté escapes narrowly being kill'd by one of the Earle of Bristol's troopers.
OR: MEM:
P: 1. p: 244.

The Army quarter'd that night at a Village call'd Villotte,

P A R T
I.

1652.
The King's Army besiege Ligny.
OR: MEM:
P: 1. p: 245.

and the next day march'd to Trouville which lyes betwixt Barr and Ligny: And that evening M. de Turenne sent a party of horse and foot with cañon and all things necessary to attack Ligny. They immediatly fell to work, and without more ceremony made a battery within less then half muskett shott of the Town, a trench on each hand of the battery to secure the foot, and behind that an epaulement or blind for the horse, cañon proof, about muskett shott from the place: All this was perfected before Sun-rise the next morning, and then the battery began to play: at evening somewhat before the Sun went down, a large assaultable breach was made: The only difficulty which remain'd was to get over the ditch which was wett, and somewhat deep, and withall so brode that the ruines of the wall had not fill'd it up; but by the help of plancks and ladders and long poles which the Soldiers carryd along with them when they storm'd it, they passed the ditch without much difficulty, and came up to the breach, where the Enemy making but a faint resistance immediatly abandon'd it, and retire into the Castle which was a place of greater Strength.

These things being thus executed, the next day M. de Turenne march'd with his Troopes to the Suburbs of Barleduc, Mons^r. de la Ferté continuing with his at Ligny against the Castle, and the Duke going with Monsieur de Turenne to Bar; where the very first night of their approach, they began to raise a battery against the lower Town, which was perform'd with exceeding ease under the shelter of some houses which were almost upon the edge of the ditch, there being but a narrow way betwixt them and it. By morning their guns began to play, and though they were but few, and very small for battering pieces, two of them being twelve pounders, one eight, and the other two but Six; yet all of them being home bor'd and well fortified, they serv'd sufficiently for the work; for they gave them their double charge of poudre, and Mons^r. de Champ-

M.deTurenne
besieges Barleduc.
OR: MEM:
P: 1. p. 246.

M. de Ferté continues the Seige of the Castle of Lagny, and the Duke go's with M. de Turenne to Bar. Ibid.

P A R T
I.

1652.
A breach made in the lower Town of Barleduc and M^r. de Tott with the regim^t of Picard y appointed to storme it.
Ibid.

M. du Tott
(the only Officer whom his R. H. ever saw drunk in the French Army) going on further then he ought in the assault, is shott dead.
OR: MEM:
P: I. p: 247.

fort lieutenant of the ordnance, played them so warmly, that by Sun-set they had open'd a faire breach; The Regiment of Picardy as being eldest was to storme it, and Mons^r. de Tott the eldest and indeed the only Lieutenant Generall then serving in that Army was to lead them on. The place where they had made the breach was adjoining to the gate, on the right hand of the entry into the Town, and had no considerable flanke, but one of the round towers of the gate. That place was chosen for the battery, because at any other they must haue been at the trouble to haue fill'd the ditch, as well as to haue* been a breach (to have made a greater breach elsewhere) which would haue taken up more time then they were willing to spare before they storm'd the place; but here they had the convenience of passing the ditch over the bridge of the Town, and of leaping downward where the draw-bridge was drawn up, from whence they went under covert of the wall to mount the breach, which was not far distant. All things being thus prepar'd for the assault, M^r. de Turenne caus'd the battery to give two or three rounds upon the Tower, or Gate house, which was the only considerable flanker that commanded the breach; that by shattering it, the men might haue the easier work, after which he gave the word to Mons^r. du Tott for the assault, which indeed he obeyd; but in stead of ordering the Commanded men to fall on first, and staying himself with the body, he (who was the only officer whom his R. Highness ever saw drunk in the French Army during all the time he continued in it) having drunk more then ever Comander ought to do, went on with the Sergeant; and, as he step'd out of a litle door which was in the false gate, which is just at the entrance of the bridge before the passage to the

* This, with some few other omissions, have been corrected by a reference to the Extract from these Memoirs, as far as related to the Wars of M^r. Turenne, which King James sent to the Cardinal de Bouillon. — EDITOR.

The lower Town of Barleduc taken by assault.
On: MEM:
P: 1: p. 247.

drawbridge, was shott dead: But that misfortune stop'd not the men, who all pass'd throw the narrow gate one by one, and so went forward to the breach by the way already described; and thō the Enemy made a very brave defence, so that the cannon could not drive them from the Gate-house, yet M. de Turenne's Soldiers enter'd throw the breach, and not only Master'd it, but drove the Enemy from the Barricades which they had made behind it, and the streets, forcing them backward into the upper Town.

There happen'd an accident to the Governour was name was Despillar, which very much facilitated the taking of the lower Town. It seems that seeing it so late, he thought he would not be storm'd that evening and for that reason was remaining in the upper Town, when the noise of the attack summoning him to his duty, he came down at the head of two hundred men to reinforce those whom he had left to maintain the breach; But in riding down, his horse fell with him, and so bruis'd his leg that he was forced to be carryd back into the upper Town. Had not this misfortune arrived to him, it was beleev'd the place had not (been) carryd so easily; The beseigers receiv'd no considerable loss of men in this attack, for besides M^r. Tu Tott no man of quality was kill'd, excepting only the Marquis d'Angeau a Volunteer. Of the wounded there was Mons^r. Poliac the first Captain of Picardy, who commanded that Regiment the Major Officers being absent, and another Captain of the same Regiment called Godonviller. The first was shott into the shoulder, and the latter into the belly, of which both recover'd.

Having thus master'd the lower Town, the forces were employd against the upper Town and the Castle. The day on which the lower Town was taken, the Cardinal Mazarin came to the Army, and brought severall troopes along with him to reinforce it; The recruits had been drawn together from divers

Cardinal
Mazarin
comes to the Army before Barleduc.
Ibid. p: 248.

P A R T places, and were commanded by the Duke d'Elbeuf, and the
I. Mareschall d'Aumont. The Cardinal was present when the 1652. lower Town was taken, and thō when the King's troopes were Masters of it they well knew nothing could be done on the upper Town that way, yet they were obliged to take it, that the foot might be lodged in it, the season of the year being past for camping, and there happening at that time a very hard frost; so that they could never haue carried on the Seige without quartering in the lower Town, where the Soldiers found not only shelter for themselves, but Cellars well stor'd with wine and Granaries with corne, which was a wellcome refreshment to them in that hard and bitter season. As for the horse they were conveniently quarter'd at the adjacent Villages, as near to the Town as they could be lodged.

The P^{er} of Condé endeavours to relieve Bar.
On: MEM:
P. 1: p. 249.

The two Mareschalls leaving the Duc d'Elbeuf and M^{ar} d'Aumont to continue the Seige, go to meet the Prince of Condé.
Ibid.

But this Wether hinder'd not the Prince of Condé, who was rather encourag'd by it to endeavour the releif of the place; of whose march the Royalists being timely advertis'd, it was resolved by the Cardinal and the Generalls, that Mons^r. de Turenne and the Mareschall de la Ferté should take the greatest of the horse, and betwixt the number of two or three thousand foot, with six feild pieces, and march towards the Enemy to meet them on the way, leaving the Duke d'Elbeuf and the Mareschall d'Aumont with the remainder of the foot, and some few horse to continue the Seige. The Duke went along (with) M^r. de Turenne. As for the Cardinal he went along also, but did not quarter at the same Village with the Army, but in some one behind them. Having then intelligence that the Enemy was coming by the way of Vaubecourt a bourg, about five leagues from Barleduc, the Army march'd towards them, Monsieur de Turenne having the Van, and advanced as far as Condit intending to quarter in that place, which is but a league and a half short of Vaubecourt; where just as the formost troopes were come into their quarter, they had notice by a party of theirs which came into them, and brought prisoners along with them, that the Prince of Condé was newly march'd into Vaubecourt, intending to quarter there that night, and having no intelligence of the Royalists being so near him.

Monsieur Turenne sent immediatly to the Mareschall de la Ferté to give him notice of this, and withall to signify his opinion; which was, That they ought presently to march and fall upon the Prince of Condé, whom they should certainly find in great disorder, the quarter being plentifully stor'd with wine and all manner of provision, which would render it more difficult for their Commander to draw his men together, and cause them afterwards to stand to their armes, and get to horse; for their surprise would be so great to find the King's Army there, whom they imagin'd to be so far from them, that in all probability it would secure the Royalists an easy victory: But the Mareschall de la Ferté instead of consenting to this proposition, came himself to Monsieur de Turenne, and told him, He thought it no ways proper for them to attempt any thing of so great concernment, without the participation of the Cardinal who was so near; and therefore advis'd that he shou'd first be made acquainted with it, and his directions receiv'd, before they undertook the Enterprize. Mons^r. de Turenne, thō very unwillingly, was constrain'd to yeeld to this opinion; upon which they dispatch'd a Messenger to inform the Cardinal by word of mouth, of the great advantage which was given as it were into their hands; who no sooner heard of it, but he return'd the bearer in all hast to give his approbation: But thō the Cardinal was only distant about a league or two at most, yet before his approbation could be had, the opportunity was overslip'd; for just as the Army was setting forward, another party of the Royalists brought word, that the Prince of Condé already was dislodg'd, as they beleev'd, because the Bourg was all on fire, and the horse guard which they had seen on the other side of it was drawn off.

P A R T

I.

1652.

M.deTurenne proposes to march and fall upon the P^{ce} of Condé at Vaubecourt, where undoubtedly they had surprised him.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 250.

M. de la Ferté opposes the proposall, underpretence that the Cardinal ought first to be advis'd, but in effect out of spleen to M. de Turenne.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 250.

By staying to haue the Cardinal's approbation, they lose the opportunity of defeating the P^{ce} of Condé, who never escap'd a defeat more narrowly.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 251.

PART

I.

1652.

On the Armys advancing a litle further, they perceiv'd the first part of this intelligence to be true, by the rising flames which were easily discern'd by night, and they were inform'd by another small party that the Prince was march'd away with extraordinary hast; wherupon the King's troopes drew back into their quarters, not thinking it expedient to go further from Barleduc then they were. The next day they were inform'd by some inhabitants of Vaubecourt, that the occasion of the fire which was seen in their Bourg proceeded from the Prince of Condé, who having notice of the Royalists' coming, commanded his Trumpetts immediatly to sound to horse; and seeing his men not over hasty to leave their quarters which were so well provided, caus'd some houses to be fir'd at each corner of the Bourg, therby to constraine his men to come forth, and make ready for their march.

Tis most certain that the Prince never escap'd a defeat more narrowly then this; and he took such warning by it, that he thought it not convenient for him to stay any longer in those parts, Seeing the Royalists were so strong as to continue two Seiges with half of their Army, and come out with the other to meet him in the way. He therefore march'd out of the Country, and left the King's Army in quiet to finish their design of reducing those and other places in the Dukedom of Bar. And he had reason to think himself oblig'd to M^r. de la Ferté for escaping as he did, for had not he oppos'd the Counsell of the Mareschall de Turenne, the Prince had certainly been surprised. Neither did Mons^r. de la Ferté want either judgment or Souldiership to discern the advantage, but his spleen was such against M^r. de Turenne for having lodg'd in S^t Michel, that he regarded not what prejudice he did to his Masters service, if he could hinder the other from performing so considerable an action, and from the honour which he shou'd obtain by doing it. Vndoubtedly it was for this, and no other reason that he propos'd the

The Per of Condé marches out of the Country.
OR: MEM:
P. 1: p. 252.

sending to the Cardinal, that at least if the Cardinal came not himself, it might be sayd that the Mareschall de Turenne was order'd by him to undertake it. And 'tis very credible, that had any other man but himself committed such a fault which was visible to all the world, he had payd deerly for his mismanagement; but he was so considerable by his commands and dependencies, that the Cardinal never took the least notice of it.

The Royall Army continued at Condit till the 11th, and then having notice that the Prince was gone quite away, M. de la Ferté with the greatest part of the foot and some of the horse return'd to Bar, and M^r. de Turenne with the rest went and quarter'd at Contrisson, (Contrusson) and the Villages about it, as Revigny aux Vaches and other places which were not distant from above four leagues from Bar, where they had covert for themselves, and forage for their horses, and were in a readiness for any service requir'd from them. As for the Cardinal, he was quarter'd at a Village call'd Faine (Fains) a league on this side of the Town, where he continued during all the Seige, which lasted not long after the Prince of Condé was retreated; yet they suffered two breaches to be made before they thought of surrender. The first of which being in such a place as in all appearance was assaultable, yet prov'd otherwise upon the King's troopes storming of it; for when the men had mounted it, they found the depth too dangerous for leaping, it being a full pike's length from top to bottom by reason of the hollownes of the ground which was not discernable from without; so that the Soldiers were forced to retire, and came not off without some loss. Wherupon a new battery was rais'd against the Castle, where when they had made a considerable breach, the Enemy began to capitulate, and were finally constrain'd to surrender both the upper Town and the Castle, and to yeeld them-

P A R T

I.

1652.

M. de la Ferté returns to the Seige of Bar, and M. de Turenne quarters with the horse in the adjacent Villages.
OR. MEM.
P. 2. p. 252.

The Cardinal quarters at Faine.
Ibid.

After two breaches made, the upper Town and Castle of Barleduc surrender'd about the middle of December.
OR. MEM.
P. 1. p. 253.

P A R T

I.

1652.

A Remarque of the Duke's at this Seige.
Ibid.

selves prisoners of warr, which was done about the midst of the month.

And here we cannot forbear to mention a remarke which the Duke made upon this occasion, That the accident which made the first of the above mention'd breaches useless, and the place unasailable, may teach a Governour who defends a Town to do that by art which here was done by nature: for if a wall be but reasonably strong and has a sound foundation, the Governour may haue time to dig a pitt behind the place where the Enemy begins to batter, so as to render the breach as fruitless to the Assailants, as the first of these prov'd unprofitable to the Royalists.

An Irish Regiment of foot made prisoners of warr at the Seige of Bar, offer their service to the Duke, and are incorporated in his Regiment and sent to Ligny. Ibid.

In this Town of Barleduc amongst the other troopes which were left in it by M. de Lorraine, there was an Irish Regiment of foot, who seeing themselves prisoners of warr, and like to continue long in that condition, their Collonel dying the same day on which the Town was deliver'd up, and Lieutenant Collonel having made his escape, sent to offer their service to the Duke, in case his R. Highness could obtain their liberty from the Cardinal; which being easily granted by him, that Regiment consisting in ten Companies with all their Officers were incorporated in the Duke's, and sent to Ligny, before which place the others were.

M. de la Ferté presses the Castle of Ligny.
On: MEM:
P. 1. p. 254.

And now that Bar was taken, the Mareschall de la Ferté's men were likewise order'd to go thither and hasten the taking of the Castle, where no considerable attempt had yet been made while the other Seige continued; Then the Mareschall began to batter the Castle, but before the breach was made assailable, he could not perfect it for want of cannon bullets, which gave opportunity to the Defendents to fortify the top of it with a very strong pallisade: This being observ'd by the Mareschall, he fasten'd a Miner on to the same place, which was easily fix'd

in the ruins of the Wall, so that in a litle space of time, the Mine was made, charg'd and filled, and in a condition to be fired. Whereupon the Mareschall commanded the Regiment of York and Douglas to prepare for the attack at the springing of the mine; and order'd his own Regiment whose turn it was to go on, to be in a readiness to second them: All things being prepar'd in this manner; fire was given to the Mine; and in the midst of the smoke before it could be discern'd what effect the Mine had produced, the Count d'Estrées, who commanded in the attack, order'd it instantly to be made. Accordingly they fell on, passing over the ditch which was very brode upon the yee (ice); But when they came to the breach they perceived the Mine had fail'd their expectation: for in stead of inlarging the breach, it had only carryd away the outward part of the Wall as far as where the Enemy had plac'd their pallisade, so that there was no possibility of mounting to it. Upon this miscarriage of the Mine, there was a necessity of making a retreat, which while they were performing (the) yce broke under them, and most of them fell into the (ditch); which second accident gave more leasure to the Enemy to do more execution on them. Thus for want of a litle patience to see what effect the Mine had wrought, the Regiment of York lost four Captains, some Lieutenants and Enseigns, and about a hundred men slain outright; and the Regim^t of Douglas two Captains and neer fifty private Soldiers, besides many Officers and Soldiers hurt. That night the Miner was once more set on work, and the next day being the twenty second of December, they in the Castle began to parly, capitulating for the same conditions which those of Bar had received before them.

These two places being thus surrendered, the Cardinal was still desirous that the Army shou'd go forward and take S^t Menehou; and in order to that design having left those places, which they had newly master'd, well garrison'd, and the breaches

The Regim^t of York and Douglas lose a great many officers and Soldiers by the miscarriage of a Mine, in the last attack of the Castle of Ligny.

OR: MEM:
P. I. p. 255.

The Castle of Ligny capitulates the 22 of December.
Ibid.

P A R T

I.

1652.

In the march of the Royall Army to Sommieure, all the horsemen are forced to dismount and many Soldiers perish for cold, severall of which the Duke himself saw frozen to death 28 Xber.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p: 255.

as well repair'd as the shortness of the time, and the Season of the year permitted, the troopes march'd away from Contrusson to Doucet on the 27th, and the next day came to Sommyeur, where the continu'd till the 30th. During this whole march all the Army was quarter'd in Villages, the severity of the winter not suffering them to incamp ; for the Wether at that time was so excessiue cold, that there was no possibility either for men or horse to be abroad. The day they came to Sommyeur which was the 28th, the frost was so very sharp, that all the horsemen were forced to dismount and march on foot, leading their horses, to keep warmth in their bodies by their motion ; and about thirty or forty soldiers the same day miserably perish'd throw the extreimity of cold ; for so soon as any of them who were not warmly cloth'd, grew weary, and sat down for ease, the frost pierced them, and they were never able to raise again, severall of which poor people the Duke himself saw frozen to death, and more had been, if the care of their Officers had not prevented it: For they, seeing the poor creatures almost ready to sink, caus'd them to be taken up and carryd on horseback to the next quarter, where by giving them strong waters and other comfortable remedies, they sav'd many of them. That which made the troopes the more sensible of this hardship, was that there was not the least shelter, for they were then marching over the large and open plaines of Champagne, which levell Country with a peircing north East wind blowing directly in their faces augmented the inclemency of the Wether ; And indeed the whole Army suffered so extreacmly by that days march, that it was one of the causes they did not attack S^t Meneshou: For on occasion of this cruell Wether Mons^r. de Turenne went to the Cardinal, and once more represented to him the difficulties of laying Seige to such a Town in so hard a season; That the troopes could not be there furnish'd with those conveniences, which they found at Bar and Lagny, neither covert for their foot, nor forage for their horse in the neighbouring Villages, here being no lower Town to be taken without making Trenches, nor Suburbs for the shelter of the men; That this was a place, which would require a formall Seige, both for its strength and the great number of its defendents, and then the Country round about it, which was lately devour'd by the Army of the Enemy when they took it, could supply no forage for the horses, So that in stead of taking turne of fortune, and making a happy end of the Campagne, they should hazard the ruine of the Army and be forced to raise the Seige dishonorably.

These Considerations were so strong and so manifestly true, that they convinced the Cardinal, who suffer'd himself to be perswaded by them to lay aside the thought of taking in S^t Menehou: So that the Army march'd on towards Rhetel by Menecour (Miocour) and Grivy, and on the first of January, 1653, quarter'd at Attigny, which is scituate on the River Aisne, about three or four leagues above Rhetel, where the next (day) they pass'd the River and lodg'd that night at Saux aux Bois. But finding that Rhetel would prove too hard a work for them to undertake at that time of the year as well as S^t Menehou, for the same reasons they pass'd by that place also, and went to attack Château-Porcien, a place about two leagues below Rhetel upon the same River, having there the same conveniences of attacking it, as they had before at Barleduc; being certain to Master the Town the first night, where there was room sufficient to quarter the greatest part of their foot, at least, as many as was necessary to carry on the Seige, the Castle only being tenable.

This being so resolved, M^r. de Turenne (whom the Duke allways accompan'd) quarter'd with most of his horse, and some few foot, at Soin (Son) (where they arriv'd on the 6th of January) and the neighbouring Villages, a league and a half from Château-Porcien, as the more proper place for hindering

The Cardinal perswaded by M. de Turenne's reasons, lays aside the design of besieging
S^t Menehou.
Or: MEM:
P. 1: p. 257.
The Army marcheth towards Rhetel,
1. January,
1653.

During this Seige the Duke is quarter'd with
M. de Turenne at Soin, to hinder succours.

P A R T

I.

1653.
The Seige is carryd on by M. d'Elbeuf and M. d'Aumont.
Ibid.

Very hard duty in the out quarters, where the Duke was during the Seige. Ibid.

The Prince Condé himself approaches to try if he could relevee the Town.

OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 257.

any succours from being put into that Town: The Care of advancing the Seige was repos'd on Monsieur d'Elbeuf and M. d'Aumont. The Mareshall de la Ferté quartering at * * * * * with his horse, for the same purpose that Monsieur de Turenne lay at Soin, and the Cardinal lodging at Balhan.

Wee shall not relate the particulars of this Seige where the Duke was not constantly present, only what pass'd in the out quarters where his Royall Highness was, which were upon hard duty during all the time that the Seige continu'd; which happen'd from the approche of somme troopes of the Enemy and of the Prince Condé himself, who came to try if he could possibly relevee it. Therefore Mons^r.de Turenne to prevent being surpris'd in his quarters, and to keep himself in a readiness to hinder the Prince from passing by him and putting succours into the Town by night, order'd all the horse that were quarter'd in the Villages about Soin, to march thither every evening, and continue there all night, returning after Sun rise to their own quarters: The same method was duly observ'd by all the Mareshall de la Ferté's horse which were distributed in the Villages about him; And on this hard duty the troopes continu'd during the Seige, which lasted not long. For the be-seigers being possessed as they were of the Town, it was no hard matter to fasten the Miner to the Castle, and so as it was charg'd, and ready to spring, the Governour who was call'd Dubuisson capitulated to yeld in four days, if during that time he was not releev'd.

The Enemy having notice of this Treaty came as far as Chaumont to try if it were practicable to succour it; and before the Terme was quite expir'd, on the very last day of it, the

* * * The same blank occurs in King James' condensed and less confidential Narrative of these Wars, which was drawn up for the Cardinal de Bouillon. — EDITOR.

P A R T
I.

1653.

Royalists verily beleev'd it would have come to an engagement, their partys bringing them word that the Enemy was advancing towards them : Upon which intelligence they were drawn up in battell in the plain above the Castle, just in the passage of the Enemy, if they should endeavour to relevee the place. Thus the Royall Army stood expecting them till noon and then they had the news of their return : Within an hour afterwards the Castle was deliver'd up according to the agreement, upon the ordinary Articles of being conveyd to their next garrison with their armes and baggage ; it being not worth the labour to haue had them prisoners of warr like those of Barleduc and Ligny, considering the sharpnes of the Season, which yet continued in extreimity, and that the Royall Army both horse and foot had endur'd so much that they were glad to possess the Castle on any termes. The foot especially were reduced to cruell hardships, the Country being wholly ruin'd, and no possibility of furnishing them regularly with bread, the Commissary of Victuals having none, and no stores of Corne were in any of the neighbouring Towns ; so that many of the Soldiers were forced to eat horse flesh, and all sorts of unwholsome miserable food for the bare sustenance of life. Amongst the rest they were driven to feed on the Stalks of Cabbages, which they call'd the Cardinal's bread.

Château-Porcien deliver'd up to the King's Army.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 258.

The Soldiers in the King's Army forced to eat horse flesh and Stalks of Cabbage, which they call'd the Cardinal's bread.
Ibid. p. 259.

Château-Porcien being thus taken, not only the Soldiers, but even the Officers themselves had hopes of going immediatly into winter-quarters, and in that beleif they march'd away on the 13th January and, passing the Aisne, quarter'd that night at Poilcours and the adjoining Villages. From thence they continued their march as far as Proüilly which lyes betwixt Rheims and Fismes, very neer the Veste: There they quarter'd two or three days, but in stead of going forward to winter-quarters, the Cardinal order'd them to march back over the Aisne, which they pass'd on the 20th at Pont-à-Vere, to retake

The Army in their way to winter-quarters are ordered by the Cardinal to march back again and retake Vervins.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 259.

P A R T Vervins a Town of considerable strength, which was only
I. incompass'd with a wall, and had been master'd and gar-1653. rison'd by the Spaniards in the foregoing summer. Thō this place was incapable of maintaining a Seige against an Army, yet it was a good quarter, and would haue given much trouble to the neighbouring Countries; for which reason the Cardinal was desirous that the King's troopes should not end the Campagne before they had master'd it. Never was march more grudgingly undertaken by the common Souldiers, or even by the Officers, who wer all of them worn out and sinking under the fatigue of this long Service. And indeed it prov'd very uncomfortable march to them, for the frost (being) newly broken, the ways were deep and almost impassable for baggage throughout that mountainous and deep claye Country, which lyes betwixt Pont-à-Vere and Laon; and thō after they had pass'd thus far, they march'd in a more open and plainer Country, yet the ways continued deep and rotten. In this march the Army lost the greatest part of their baggage and many horses, meerely by the badnes of the rodes, no Enemy being neer to trouble them; and on the 25th they came to Vaupe distant about a league from Vervins.

A very uneasy march for an Army sinking under the fatigue of So long a Campagne.
Ibid. p. 260.

The Duke viewing Vervins with
 M. de Turenne and going near to make his observations, is like to be made prisoner by a party of the Enemy who fir'd at him.
 OR: MEM:
 P. 1: p. 260.

At this place the Duke escap'd narrowly from being taken by the Enemy; for as he rode a long with Monsieur de Turenne to view the Town, his R. Highness and another Gentleman going somewhat near, the better to make their observations, were mett by a small party of horse belonging to Vervins, which they mistook for their own Souldiers, and were within pistoll shott of them before they were sensible of their errour;
 and had not the Enemy then fir'd at them, they had undoubtedly ridd in amongst them, and it would haue been very hard for them to gett off.

They begin to attack Vervins the 26. Jan^r.
Ibid.

The next day about a thousand foot, and two hundred horse, were commanded out of the severall quarters to begin the attack of the Town, the garrison of which consisted in six hundred foot and three hundred horse commanded by Mons^r. de Bassecourt, Collonell, and a very brave Gentleman. The first night the Souldiers lodg'd themselves under the Shelter of some out-houses and gardens close by the Town wall, and the next night made a battery; which the Enemy seeing, began to Capitulat, and march'd out on the 28th of January with their armes and bagge.

P A R T
L 1653.

The Town is surrender'd the 28th.
OR: MEM:
P. 1: p. 260.

The Army receiv'd litle or no loss at this short Seige, yet tho it cost so litle time, the Souldiers repin'd sufficiently against the Cardinal, for not sending them directly from Château-Porcien into winter-quarters; in so much that when the Enemy from the walls of Vervins, according to the usuall custome, began to raile at him, the Souldiers in stead of replying in his defence, only Said, Amen, to all their curses, that word serving for a burden to every imprecation of the Spaniards.

M.deTurenne
after having taken possession of Vervins, march'd back his Army to Laon, where all the troopes are sent to their severall winter-quarters.
OR: MEM:
P. 1: p. 261.

The 28th January in the morning M^r. de Turenne went and saw Bassecourt march out with his Souldiers, and having taken possession of the place, he march'd back with his Army to Fessy sur Saare, and from thence to Laon, where all the troopes were sent into their severall winter-quarters; And the Duke, the Cardinal, and all the Generalls and persons of quality went for Paris, where they arrived on the 3^d of February.

The Duke the Cardinal and all the Generalls return to Paris
the 3^d of febr:
Ibid.

In this manner ended that long Campagne, (during) which Monsieur de Turenne severall times by his conduct and Counsell preserved the Monarchy of France, to his immortall fame and glory.

The Duke
returning from his first and long Campagne, meets at Paris his Brother the Duke of Glocester and his Cosen
the P^r Rupert.

When his R. Highness arrived at Paris, he had the Satisfaction not only of paying his duty to the Queen his Mother, but also of meeting there his Brother the Duke of Glocester, and his Cosen Prince Rupert. The first of them, after a long detention in the hands of his bloody Enemies, who had murder'd his

P A R T Father, was at last lett loos by them, not out of any principle of
I. humanity, but meerly to save the charges of maintaining him 1653. any longer ; And the other who was given over for lost, after having escap'd a thousand dangers at Sea for the espace of four years, happen'd also to come thither at the same time. But of all this which occur'd whilst his Royall Highness remain'd at Paris, he makes no mention in his Memoires ; for it seems, that his thoughts where then so full of the Warr, that he reckon'd the time lost and not worth the remembring which was not imployd in the feild.

THE SECOND PART.

IN this year, 1653, his Royall Highness made his Second Campagne, in the company and under the conduct of Monsieur de Turenne, the greatest Captain of this and perhaps of any age, who was not a little delighted in having so illustrious a person for his Schollar in the discipline of warr. Of this Campagne his R. Highness gives the following Account in the Memoires written in his own hand.

P A R T
II.

1653.

THE CAMPAGNE of this year began but late on either side, which could not be otherwise considering how long it was before the last ended. Yet thō wee went last out of the feild, and many of our troopes had taken up their winter-quarters in Poitou, Anjou, la Marche, and other remote Provinces, Our Army was notwithstanding in Champagne by the latter end of June; with so much dilligence, that wee beseiged Rhétel before the Spanish Army was gott together out of their winter-quarters. This place was of great consequence, being situated upon the River Aisne, and being an inlet into Champagne, of which it is a member; so that partys from thence might make incursions almost to the gates of Paris, and raise contributions even in its neighbourhood. It was taken about nine months before by the Prince of Condé, and put into the hands of the Spaniards upon his conjunction with them.

The Duke's
Second Campagne
under M. de Turenne.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 1.

The French
beseiged Rhétel.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 1.

It seems a little strange that a place of this consequence, and which in all probability would be the first attempt of the French

P A R T
II.

1653.

to retake, should be no better provided with sufficient numbers of men for its defence; for thō the Marquis of Persan a very good officer was Governour of it, yet Mons^r. de Turenne without staying to make a Line of Circumvalation, storm'd the outworks the first night, and carryd them without any extraordinary loss of men. One cheif reason why the outworks were so easily gain'd was, that thō they had a good ditch and were high enough, yet being only of earth, and having no palissades, but upon the parapett, the French were the more encouraged to venture on them; for when the Soldiers had once got up to them, their advantage was equall to that of the Enemys within, so that the greatest number must consequently carry it.

This Success did so hearten our men, and discourage theirs, that the Town itself whose best strength consisted in the outworks, was quickly forced to capitulate; for wee brought our battery so near by the advantage of the outworks, that wee made in a short time two sufficient breaches, at each attack one, in the wall which was none of the strongest. This oblig'd the beseiged to parly on the 8th of July, and the next day to surrender the Town upon termes of marching away with their armes and baggage to their nearest garrison. The Articles being perform'd, our Army stayd a day or two to repair the breaches; and having provided the place with all things necessary, and left in it a sufficient garrison, wee march'd away towards Guise, having been inform'd that the Enemy had appointed their generall Rendezvous near that place.

But in our march thither, when wee lay incamped by a Village call'd Noircour, Intelligence came from the Governour of Rocroy, that part of their Army, which was marching to the Rendezvous, was quarter'd in severall Villages about Chimay, Trelon, and Glajon, on the other side of the great woods of the forest of Ardennes, which were extended down that way; upon which information, our Generalls resolv'd to march with all their

Rhetel sur-render'd up to the French the 9th of July.
Or: MEM:
P. 2. p. 6.

The French march from Noircour in hopes to surprise the Enemy, but are disappointed.
Ibid. p. 8.

troopes and some few feild pieces, leaving only five or six hundred men to guard the baggage, and to pass these large woods in hopes of surprising the Enemy in their quarters before they could haue notice of our march. It happen'd to be Mons^r. de Turenne's turn to lead the Van, who us'd all possible expedition, but after having pass'd by a certain Abbey call'd Bussilly, and got with the Van as far as Anort, (Nost) which is almost on the farthest side of the woods, wee had intelligence by a small party which brought in some prisoners, that they had been advertis'd of our coming ; so that seeing our design to be discover'd, wee march'd back by the same way wee came, and joyn'd our baggage on the 14th where wee had left it at Noircour, after wee had been three days abroad in this expedition ; and from thence we march'd to Haris on the 17th, and so to S. Algis, where the King of France, and Cardinal Mazarin came to us.

On the 25th wee went and camp'd at Ribemont, and in the mean time the Spanish Army consisting at least of thirty thousand men, assembled on the frontiers near l'arbre de Guise, and with proportionable train of Artillery and provisions of Victualls, began their march to enter France ; of which the King being informed, it was debated in Councill before him and the Cardinal what was fittest for him to do, having so strong an Enemy to encounter, and our Army in the whole not amounting to above six thousand foot, and being scarce ten thousand horse. Some were of opinion that all our foot, excepting only a thousand commanded musketteers, should be cast into the frontier Towns, with some few horse to accompany them ; and that with this small proportion of Infantry and the body of our horse, wee should keep near the Enemy's Army to incommode and harass them, as much as wee were able, by falling on their foragers and cutting off their Convoy's, in order to hinder them from attacking any of our Towns.

Others were of opinion that wee should not separate our

The Spanish Army on the frontiers 30000 strong.
OR: MEM:
P: 2: p. 10.

The French being not above 16000 men, it is debated in Councill before the King and Card^l Mazarin what is fittest to be done in this conjuncture.
Ibid. p. 11.

The opinions were divided.
OR: MEM:
P: 2: p. 11.

P A R T

II.

1653.

Army, but endeavour with the whole body of it to defend the passages of the Rivers in case they should advance into the Country, thinking it to be of dangerous consequence (since Bourdeaux still held out) if wee should permitt them a free inrode towards Paris, which was so lately reduced to the King's obedience.

M.deTurenne refutes the two former opinions and gives his own, with the reasons therof.
Ibid. p. 12.

But Monsieur de Turenne was of a quite different opinion from the two former; For, said he, should wee divide our Army, and put most of our foot and some horse into the Garrisons, wee should leave ourselves so inconsiderable, that the Enemy would easily drive the remaining small body of our forces into what part of the Country they should please; after which they would haue their choice of beseiging any of our Towns, by falling back upon them, and haue leisure enough to entrench themselves before wee could joyn together our Separated forces: besides which they would then be so far advanced in their work, that it would not be adviseable for us to sitt down before any of their places, for before wee could haue made any considerable progress in a Seige, they would haue taken a Town, and been upon us; So that wee should be sure, according to that method, to haue lost one of our places, without Mastering one of theirs, thō of less importance. On the other side, thō wee kept our whole Army in a body, and lay behind our Rivers, with an intention of hindering the Enemys from passing over and advancing into our Country, wee should faile of what wee proposed to ourselves by that undertaking; for knowing them to outnumber us very much in foot, it would be very difficult for us to maintain any pass against them; and besides it would not only be a very great discouragement to our Soldiers to be forced from their posts, but the consequence would also be very dangerous from the effects it might haue at Paris and in the Countries: So that considering the whole matter, he was of opinion, That wee should keep our Army intire and with it observe the motion of the Enemys, keeping as closs to them as conveniently wee could, either behind or on one side of them, without exposing ourselves so far as to be forced to an Ingagement when wee found it not for our advantage; by observing which method he hoped to (be) able to hinder them from beseiging any place of consequence, in doing of which they must be obliged to separate their Army, which they would hardly adventure to do, whilst wee were attending them so near, that before they could haue intrenched themselves and made their bridges of communication, wee should haue the opportunity of falling on which part of them wee pleas'd; And besides he beleev'd not, that they would advance farr into the Country, seeing that if they did, wee should be able to hinder any Convoys from coming to them, without which they could not possibly subsist, or continue long in the heart of the French Dominions.

P A R T

II.

1653.

These and other reasons offered by Mons^r. de Turenne prevail'd upon the Cardinal, and consequently upon the King and Councill; so that orders being given, and measures accordingly taken for carrying on the Campagne, the Court retired from the Army.

The opinion of M. de Turenne prevails, and his Counsell is followed.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 16.

In the mean time the Enemy having drawn all their forces into a body, began their march into the French Dominions betwixt the Rivers of Somme and Oyse; and incamped at Fonsomme and Fervaques, from whence they marched onwards on the first of August, and pass'd within sight of us the same day, continuing their march towards Ham, having the Somme on their right hand, and camp'd about S^t Simon and Clastres, where they imployd a whole day in passing the défilés: In the mean time upon their approche, wee put ourselves on battell, and seeing they came not to us, but continued their march, wee march'd the same day down along the River by which wee lay to a Village call'd Chery-Maiot, not farr from la Fere;

The Spaniards march into the French Dominions August 1st.
Ibid.

The two Armys in Sight of one another.
Ibid.

The French put themSelves in battell.
Ibid. p. 17.

P A R T

II.

1653.

where wee imployd all the next day in making bridges for our foot, and passages for our horse, intending to pass that River in case the Enemy pursued their march any further into the Country, of which wee had notice the next morning by our partys: But yet Monsieur de Turenne, unwilling to expose himself by marching over till he were more certain of the way they took, went over himself at break of day with about a thousand horse, and finding that the intelligence which his partys had brought him was altogether true, he sent back his orders for the Army to come over to him, which being perform'd wee march'd down the River, and camp'd on the third of August at Fargnier, having the woods to cover us from the Enemy, which were of as great security to us as a River; and receiving intelligence that they were advanced as far as Roye, which they took and plunder'd (it being only defended by the Townsmen, who thō they had no troopes amongst them yet suffer'd batteries to be rais'd which playd upon them before they would surrender) wee came on the 5th to Noyon, and hearing there that Roye was taken, wee advanced on the 9th to Magny; which thō on the other side of the woods was yet so fast a Country, that wee were in no manner of danger, and besides it was not our design to keep too far distance from the Enemy.

The Spaniards take Roye and plunder it.
Or: MEM:
P. 2. p. 18.

From thence Mons^r. de Schomberg was sent with the Gendarmes, which consisted of about two hundred and fifty horse and a hundred foot, to cast himself into Corbie; and at the same time about three hundred foot were sent into Peroñe, which were the only troopes wee ever put into any place from the Army, and having notice that they were drawing down towards the Somme, not far from Corbie, wee posted ourselves at Epperville closs by Ham on the 10th of August.

Wee were no sooner arriv'd there, but wee received intelligence that the Count of Megen, with about three thousand men, was to march out of Cambray the next day, to convoy great store of provisions and all things necessary for a Seige, with great numbers of Pioneers, and all sorts of ammunition, and that he was to march with them to the River of Somme betwixt Peronne and Corbie, where, after they had mett him, new measures were to be taken: On this advertisement wee took our march passing over the Somme at Ham, and setting out a litle before Sun sett, with an intention to fall on that Convoy, which wee hop'd to find on the plaine about Bapaume; And to make the greater Expedition, wee march'd away with all our horse, leaving only some few behind, to come along with the foot, artillery and baggage, which had order to follow with all imaginable diligence. Being come to Peronne by break of day, with our horse, wee took out from thence all the foot which had been sent thither from the Army, and all the garrison could spare beside, and continued our march towards Bapaume: Being come within two or three leagues of that place, wee halted to refresh our horses, and sent our partys towards Cambray, to give us notice of the motion of the Convoy: By noon they brought us intelligence, that the Enemy had begun their march out of Cambray, but being advertiz'd of our coming were return'd into the Town: having received this information, and withall, that the Enemy's Army was come to the Somme near Bray, wee march'd back and met our foot, Artillery and baggage on the 11th that night at Manancourt, a Village which ly's at the head of a litle brook, that runs from thence by Mont S^t Quentin and so into the Somme, not far from Peronne.

There wee camp'd that night, and having notice the next morning, that the Enemy was making bridges over the River where they lay, it was thought expedient for us to retire, the same day, a litle back to Allayne another Village on the same brook, near Mont S^t Quentin; having notwithstanding resolved in case they should pass the Somme, that wee should post ourselves some what above Manancourt, in a place which both

P A R T
II.

1653.

The French endeavour to Surprise a Convoy of the Enemy's, but are discover'd.
OR: MEM:
P: 2. p. 10.

The French campe at Manancourt
the 11th August.
OR: MEM:
P: 2. p. 22.

P A R T II.
 1653. our Mareshalls had view'd and determin'd there to draw up our Army in battell, upon the first notice wee should haue of their approche to us. But thō this was resolved by both our Generalls together, it was alter'd by one, without staying to hear from the other, on the next morning being the 13th: For M^r. de Turenne according to his usuall custome going out of his quarters by Sun rise, with some few in his Company, first went to visite our horse guard, which was on the other side of the brook; And from thence seeing nothing, nor hearing any news of any of our partys, which he had sent out the night before to bring him notice of the Enemys motion, he went to Peronne to send partys along the Somme, on the other side, to try if they cou'd discover any thing of the Spaniards' march; Not beleeving it possible that they cou'd be coming to us, but that either from Bapaume or by some of our own partys wee should haue been advertized: Yet it happen'd otherwise, for the Enemy march'd with so much diligence, that their Van was past Bapaume before break of day; so that neither our partys which were driven in there, nor any from the Town cou'd give us notice, the Spaniards being gotten betwixt us and them; and the first intelligence wee had of them was by M^r. de la Ferté's horse guards, which were at the head of the litle brook: And he took the allarm so hott, that in stead of marching up to possess the ground, which was resolved on the day before, he having the left wing and being nearest it, march'd back towards Peronne, passing through our right wing; which following the orders they had received the day before, was beginning to march towards the fore appointed place where they were to be drawn up in battell.

The Spaniards coming up unexpectedly to the french Army, Surprise them.
 OR: MEM:
 P. 2: p. 24.

M.de la Ferté takes the allarme and marches back to Mont S^t Quentin with the left wing.
Ibid.

M.deTurenne returning from Peronne, finds the Army in disorder and is forced to joyn his troopes with M^r. de la Ferté's.
 OR: MEM:
 P. 2: p. 25:

In this disorder wee were when Mareshall de Turenne came back from Peronne, and finding that already M. de la Ferté with the left wing was beginning to draw up on Mont S^t Quentin, he went to his own troopes, which were to compose the right wing and joyn'd them with the left ; it being then too late to possess ourSelves of the former ground, because the Enemys Van was already very near it.

P A R T
II.

1653.

There he resolv'd to expect the Enemy, who came on with great joy, as knowing the advantage they had over us, both in numbers and by getting us into a plaine feild, where wee could neither retreat from them, nor avoid fighting, if they pleas'd to ingage us ; And indeed I beleeve that if wee had not chang'd our ground wee should certainly haue been beaten : for, besides that they were much Superiour to us in number, as wee were then drawn up, the ground was such, that wee shou'd not haue been able to haue done any thing ; because thō our order of battell was very good according to the new method, and that our second Line was placed at a convenient distance behind the first, and a reserve of twelve Squadrons of horse, with two battailons of foot behind that again, and our left wing placed upon Mont S^t Quentin, yet our right was in evident danger of being routed, for our utmost Squadron on that hand reached within pistoll shott to the bottome of a litle hill, to which the Enemy were marching, and from thence they could haue gall'd us in the flanck, and playd upon us both with their cannon and Musketeers, before they came down to charg us : so that, as I sayd, wee had manifestly been beaten, without being able to haue fought, it being then too late to haue chang'd our posture : And indeed not only M. de Turenne, but all of us who were on the right wing plainly saw it ; neither can I say that ever in my life I perceiv'd so much confusion, and such signs of being beaten, as were visible in the face of the Soldiers. Monsieur de Turenne no sooner had observ'd it, but he gallop'd away to M^r. de la Ferté on the left wing to give him notice ; and withall to assure him, That if wee continued in that posture wee should infallibly be routed ; that therfore he was resolved to march up the hill, towards the Enemy, seeing wee could not be

The right wing of the French in evident danger of being routed, if M^r. de Turenne had not provided against it by changing the ground. Ibid. p. 26.

P A R T

II.

1653.

in a more disadvantageous position than now wee were; neither was there any other way remaining to encourage our Soldiers: Having told him this, and desired him to follow us, he return'd speedily to our wing, and march'd up the hill immediatly at our head.

He was no sooner arriv'd there with the first Squadrons, but he sent Mons^r. de Varennes (an old experienced Officer) who had been Captain of his guards in all his German warrs, and in whom he had great confidence, to go before and view the ground over which wee were to pass: Wee had not march'd above a mile, when he came back to his Generall, and let him know, that if he would come along with him, he would shew him such a post as he was sure would be of great advantage, and that it was not farr distant. M^r. de Turenne accordingly went before to observe it, and found it to his great satisfaction such a one as would wholly secure us from the Enemy: for in our right hand wee had the brook, which comes from Roiset, and afterwards falls into the Somme a litle above Peronne; and on our left a hill so inaccessible and steep, that neither horse nor man cou'd climb it; and the distance betwixt both was no more, then that twenty or thirty Squadrons cou'd possibly be drawn up in it. Before us there was a litle Valley, and on that part of it which lay nearest to the brook was a Ravine or small Gully, which wou'd haue been very difficult for any to haue pass'd, and horse especially.

The French being now advantageously posted, they expect the Enemy with cheerfulness.

OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 29.

This was the post where wee drew up, and where wee were no sooner posted, but the whole countenance of the Army was changed, and our men had their accustom'd cheerfulness in their faces, so that I am confident, had the Enemy attack'd us in that place, wee shou'd haue beaten them: For thō their numbers almost doubled ours, yet our troopes being very good, and well posted, weehad a great advantage; And that wee might make it yet more secure for us and more difficult for them, when they shou'd endeavour to approche us, wee immediatly fell on making five Redans, open behind, and each of them capable of containing an hundred musketteers; between which wee placed our cañon which were about thirty, so that the Enemy must haue endured the fire of all these, before he cou'd so much as see our troopes which stood behind, and then received a charge either of horse or foot, which was in our choice: After all this, the ground was so very narrow, that the Army under Mons^r. de Turenne's command (being the right wing and half the foot) was constraint to be drawn up in four or five lines, behind each other. As for M^r. de la Ferté, he drew up with his troopes, which consisted of the left wing and the other half of the foot, all along the top of the Steep hill I haue already mention'd, which cover'd our left hand and fronted that way. So that in case wee had been attacked by the front, he cou'd easily haue drawn his men to haue seconded us of the right wing.

It was, as I remember, betwixt two and three of the clock in the afternoon when wee drew up with our first Squadron in this post, when wee saw the whole Spanish Army march in battell to us, and coming about the end of the wood directly in our faces. This wood ran from within muskett shott of our Redans, all along upon the very height and browes of the steep hill which wee had on our left hand, which also happen'd to straighten the ground by which they were to approche us: In this manner they came on, thinking to haue fallen on us immediatly; but being come within a mile and a half of us, or near that distance, they made a halt, wherupon most of their foot went down to the River to quench their thirst, being sufficiently tir'd with their long march, and almost chock'd for want of water, having met with none since they

The whole Spanish Army march up in battell against them. Aug: 13. Or: MEM: P. 2. p. 19.

P A R T parted from the Somme, till they arrived at this place ; So that
II. it was absolutly necessary for their Officers to give way, that 1653. they should drink and refresh themselves.

The Prince of Condé, as I haue been since inform'd, would haue fallen upon us that evening, the 13th of August, but the Count de Fuenseldagne oppos'd it, representing to him the weariness of their men, especially their foot, who after so tedious a march through a dry Country, and in so hott a Season, were not reasonably to be put on further duty till the next morning ; besides which, it would be very difficult and almost impracticable to draw them from the River-side that evening; that so small a delay could not prejudice the Enterprize because they had us in their power, so that wee could not possibly get from them ; but in the mean time their Soldiers would recover their Spirits and Strength by a good night's rest, and then they had the day before them : As for us, at so short a warning wee could not do much for the further securing of ourselves ; but that they might haue the remainder of the evening to view the posture in which wee lay, and to observe the ground over which they were to pass to us.

These arguments so prevail'd with the Prince, that the thought of doing any thing farther that day was layd aside ; and they camped in battaill where they lay. Next morning when he and the rest of their Generall Officers had view'd and consider'd the ground, finding the great advantages wee had by reason of our post, they gave over the intention of attacking us in that place ; and so the two Armys continued in presence of each other, during three or four days : in all which time there happen'd no considerable action, but almost perpetuall skirmishes. Yet there fell out one thing, which thō of no great concernment might deserve to be mention'd.

The two Armys remain three days in presence of each other.
 On: MEM:
 P: 2. p: 31.
 Frequent Skirmishes
 happen'd.
Ibid.

A remarkable action of one Bellechassaigne
Ibid.

There was a Lieutenant of horse in the Regiment Royall whose name was Bellechassaigne, a great goer out on partys, who was desirous to try if he could take some considerable Officer from the very Camp of the Enemy; having this in his head, he askt leave of Mons^r. de Turenne to go out with a small party, which being granted him, he chose about fifteen good men to follow him, and with them put himself into the wood which I haue mention'd, which reach'd from our Redans to the Enemy's Camp. Being there he order'd his Soldiers to disperse themselves, and, under covert of the wood and favour of the night, one by one to get into the Camp, where they were to rejoyne again about midnight, at such a place as was a very remarkable (one) in their Camp, and was seen from ours; where being met, they should receiue Instructions what to do: having given them this order, they all separated from each other, got safely amongst the Enemies, and assembled at the time and place appointed; from thence they went in a body to the Tent of one of the Prince of Condé's Major Generalls, or Marshalls de Camp. This Officer's name was Mons^r. de Ravenel, whom they intended to take out of his bed, and carry away with them; his Tent standing most conveniently for their business, and having no guard before it, which was the reason why they chose him out; all those of a Superiour quality having foot guards at the entrance of their Tents. Some of them therfore alighting from their horses went directly in, and had already seiz'd on two or three of his Servants without noise; when just as they were going to haue taken him, one of the prisoners slipp'd out of their hands, and gave the alarm, which forced Bellechassaigne to leave Ravenel and make what hast he could possibly to Save himself, which he did and brought along with him a horse or two, and as many of those whom he had first secur'd. He might haue kill'd Ravenel himself, but in those Countries they make not Warr so brutally, for I never knew any unhuman act committed either by French or Spaniards all the time I serv'd amongst them.

P A R T

II.

1653.
The Spaniards decamp the 16 Aug:
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 33.

The Duke
and M^r. de Castelnau are sent by M. de Turenne to follow the Enemy and view their Camp.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p: 33.

M. de Beaujeu is sent to secure Guise.
OR: MEM.
P. 2. p. 34.

But to proceed: After the Enemy had stayd three or four days facing us, on the 16th of August about break of day wee heard them sound to horse and beat the march for the foot; and by that time it was break of day, wee saw them begin to march: Vpon which wee stood immediatly to our armes, and Mons^r. de Turenne himself with two Squadrons of our horse guards went up towards their Camp, the better to observe which way they bent their march, that therby he might make some kind of conjecture what place they intended to beseige. When he was come about half way distance betwixt our Camp and theirs, he left behind him one of the Squadrons and advanced with the other, yet somewhat farther and then stayd with it; sending me, with Mons^r. de Castelnau and about twelve more, all Officers or Volonteers who were excellently hors'd, to go on as far as conveniently wee cou'd, with order not to engage, but to come off in case wee should be push'd. Accordingly wee went up into the very Camp of the Enemys, and as far as the hutts of the foot, when the Reer of their Cavalry were not yet gotten out of the Camp. There wee made a stand and had a perfect view of their whole Army, after which wee went within pistoll shott of their last Squadrons, not offering to disturb them, nor they us: Thus when wee had satisfyd ourselves with looking, and saw plainly they bent towards S^t Quentin, wee return'd to M^r. de Turenne, who straight going back to his own Camp, dispatch'd away M^r. de Beaujeu one of our Lieutenant Generalls, with twelve hundred horse and six hundred foot, to cast himself either into Guise, which place he beleev'd the Enemy intended to beseige, or into any other place before which they should offer to ly down. And Beaujeu made such expedition, that he got into Guise just as their first horse appear'd to invest that Town: which when the Enemy perceived, and withall the great diligence which our whole Army had us'd for the same intent, they layd aside the thoughts of that Enterprise:

and after having stayd some few days in that neighbourhood, march'd back, and incamped at Caulaincourt, within a league of the Abbey of Vermand, upon the same brook, about two leagues from S^t Quentin, it being so far on the way from thence to Peronne.

P A R T
II.

1653.
The Spaniards incamped at Caulaincourt.
Ibid.

As for our Army, so soon as M^r. de Beaujeu was detach'd, wee march'd also, causing our baggage to pass the River before us through Peronne, which was the only Pass therabouts. When they were gott over, wee began to march through the Town with the whole Army; when wee saw the Enemy at such a distance from us, that there was no farther danger of their marching back to fall upon our Reer, before wee cou'd get on the other side of the River. And thō that Town be very long, and that there is one bridge only over the Somme; yet by that time it grew dark, M^r. de Turenne with the Van got as far as Golancourt, which is within a league wide of Ham. 'Tis true the Reer cam not up till the next morning, but however it had the same effect with the Enemy as if they had been there in a body, for their partys who saw us cross the River gave them an account of our being there; So that as I observ'd, not only the march of Beaujeu, but also our diligence, hinder'd the Enemy from beseiging Guise: And, as I remember, M^r. de Turenne answer'd some about him, who were representing to him that it was impossible for half our Army to come up that night, considering the length of his intended march and the expedition he used in marching, That what they objected was very true; notwithstanding which if he could but reach his quarter with the Van that night it would produce the Same effect, as if the whole Army were in presence; because that wee being cover'd by the Somme, their partys could give no other account of us, but by the fires which they observed; and seeing them in great numbers they would return with a false intelligence, that wee were advanced so far. And certainly

M.deTurenne
by his diligent march prevents the beseiging of Guisc.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 35.

P A R T not only in this particular, but generally in all others, never
 II. did any Generall take better measures in his marches, or 1653. guess'd more probably at the designs of the Enemy then he.

The French quarter at Golancourt to observe the Enemys
 motions,
Ibid. p. 36.

The next morning when the troopes were all come up, and that he was advertis'd from Guise that the Spaniards were at a loss, having miss'd their purpose, wee thought it expedient to continue where wee were without advancing any farther, as being well warn'd by our late Escape; So that the Enemy coming to Caulincourt, wee remained at Colancourt to observe their motions.

M. de Castelnaud is sent to attack a Convoy of the Enemys
 foragers.
 OR: MEM:
 P: 2: p. 36.

While wee lay in that quarter M^r. de Turenne having notice from our partys, the Enemys foragers were accusom'd to pass the brook behind which they lay and come up towards Ham, having with them only a small Convoy, orderd M^r. de Castelnau to take a thousand horse, and to try his fortune on them, in case they came abroad to forage next day: In the evening the ten Squadrons were commanded out, and as soon as it was dark M^r. de Castelnau march'd with them to Ham; where having drawn them up, in stead of passing through the Town, as he ought to have done while the darknes continu'd, he stayd on the outside till break of day; then going through the Town himself, he sent out two partys, to see if those foragers were abroad, leaving still his body on the other side of Ham; and when at last his partys had brought him intelligence that the Enemys were at forage, he sent for all his horse to come over to him, which indeed they did, but by that time wee had travers'd the length of the Town, and were beginning to march towards the Enemy, wee saw they were almost all gone back into their Camp, having taken the alarm at the partys which were sent out to discover them, So that wee tooke not above twenty or thirty at most of all their men, thō wee detach'd some after them, who glean'd up to the number I have mention'd.

Thus what Mr. de Turenne had so well design'd, was wholly frustrated by the unskillfulness of him who commanded us : for thō he was perfectly stout, and was besides a good foot Officer, who understood very well how to carry on a breach, yet he was very ignorant in commanding horse, which he not only shew'd on this occasion, but by what he did afterwards ; so that many men were of opinion, that what he knew was rather gain'd from the experience of a long practice amongst the foot, than by any natural talent beyond other men : But the whole management of this Action was only a chaine of the greatest faults in conduct ; for after that which he had already committed, in stead of returning back immediatly into our Camp (which was his duty (when) he had fayl'd of his Enterprise) he march'd on directly towards that of the Enemy, over a bare plaine, till wee came within half a league of it, and there halted, staying there I am certain above an hour, which was the greatest madness imaginable ; for by it wee were expos'd, and that unavoidably, to be routed in case they had come out upon us, as in reason they ought to have done, and there was scarcely an Officer, or even privat Soldier there, who did not plainly see it and apprehend the consequence : for the Enemy could see at least a league and a half behind us, the Country being very bare and open, and that wee had none to second us, and cou'd count our numbers to a man ; and althō they were to pass the brook, behind which they lay, yet that was so just under the command of their whole Camp, that wee cou'd not have hinder'd their coming to us. Having stood thus, as long a time as I have mention'd, looking on them to no manner of purpose, he drew us off, and then left an ambuscade for the Enemy of about a hundred horse in a small Village, as wee march'd away, which was as foolish as all the rest ; for the Enemy were too cautious to permitt any of their men to pass the brook afterwards.

P A R T
II.

1653.
Great faults comitted by M. de Castelnau in the conduct of this affaire.
Ibid. p: 37.

P A R T

II.

1653.

In the mean time Mons^r. de Turenne being concern'd for us, because wee had Stayd out so long, and fearing wee might be prest in coming off, came himself from the Camp with four or five Squadrons of horse, and three or four hundred foot, passing over the River through the Town and advancing a litle way from thence; placing his men So, that they might make a retreat for us, in case wee had been pushed or forced to a hasty retreat. He had not long been there when to his great comfort he saw us coming back, and not in that manner which he apprehended.

The Spaniards
decamp from Caulincourt,

1st Sep.

OR: MEM:

P. 2: p. 39.

They besiege Rocroy. Ibid.

After this wee continu'd in the same quarters till the first of September, and then the Enemy first decamping from Caulincourt, began their march towards Rocroy in order to beseige it. Into which place it was impossible for us to cast any man, thō wee knew the garrison was weak, and that we had notice of the Enemies march that way. For the Enemy when they went from Caulincourt, immediatly sent off a considerable body of horse to invest it, and to hinder any succours from being put into it; and the Situation of the Town is such, that standing in a litle plain environ'd with woods, whoever is first posted there can easily forbid any passage to it. Therefore thō wee endeavour'd to reinforce that place, wee were never able to effect it.

The French
march to Mousson and besiege it the 10 Sep:

OR: MEM:

P. 2: p. 39.

So soon as wee had information of their march that way, wee began ours, and passing the Oyse by la Fere continued in our march straight to Mousson, Leaving Laon on our right hand, and quarter'd at Espe; from thence to Condé sur Aysne, which is not far from Château-Porcien, and so to la Chesne, and to Remilly which is within a league or two of Mousson: And the next day being the 10th of September wee passed the River below that place, and took up our severall quarters, M^r. de Turenne below the Town and M^r. de la Ferté above it. M^r. de Turenne's horse were upon one Line stretching from the neighbourhood of the River to the top of the hill, somewhat more then cañon shott from the Town ; As for himself, he with his foot and Gendarmes, camp'd in a litle Valley about half cañon shott from the place ; and finding yet another valley, which was narrower, and somewhat nearer the Town, he there quarter'd the Regiment of York, and that of Guyenne : and the same night, without farther delay, fell to opening the Trenches from the place where these two Regiments were quarter'd. At this time also Monsieur de la Ferté began his approches, but quarter'd not so near, himself or his Soldiers, as wee had done. But before I proceed further, it will be necessary for me to give a short description of the place.

P A R T
II.

1653.

Mousson stands upon the Meuse, about midway betwixt Stenay and Sedan ; over the River it has a bridge which was cover'd by a hornwork : The Town is fortifyd with a good old wall, well flanck'd with round towers, some of which especially one towards the hill was very large ; it had also a very good dry ditch with a strong pallisade in the midst of it and in most parts of it. The out parts of the ditch are faced with stone, which is no small strengthning to a place ; and because that side of the Town which is farthest from the River is somewhat commanded by a hill at the foot of which it stands, they had made an Envelope of an half bastion, and three or four whole bastions to cover it : And on both sides down to the River, severall half moons with other outworks. As for the garrison of Mousson, it consisted as near as I can guess in fifteen hundred foot and betwixt two and three hundred horse ; the Governour was call'd Wolfe, an old German Collonell. That which occasion'd this garrison to be made So strong, was, that the Enemy when they design'd to beseige Rocroy, had sent away the Count de Briol with a body of men, with which he was order'd to secure this place, Stenay, Clermont, and S^t Menehou ; not doubting but wee should sit down before one of them, so soon as they began

Description of Mousson.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 40.

P A R T with Rocroy. Briol upon our marching that way, Satisfied
 II. himself with putting into Mousson so many men as made up 1653. the number I haue mention'd, keeping the rest in reserve, to provide for the other places, which belong'd to the Prince of Condé whose officer he was.

Relation of the Seige of MOUSSON.
 OR: MEM:
 P. 2: p. 41.

Having given this account of the place and the strength within it, I proceed to the Relation of the Seige. The first night of our being before the Town, as I sayd, wee began our approches, and carryd them on a considerable way: Wee also rais'd a battery of five or six guns, which was perform'd with litle loss by the Regiment of Picardy the first of the old Regiments, it being the custome of the French Army that the first Regiment has allways the honour to break ground first in all Seiges, how many soever are made in the Campagne. The next night the Regiments of La Feuillade and Guyenne had the guard of the Trenches, and made a very good advance without any considerable loss. At the same time a Regiment of foot, which was quarter'd in some houses near the bridge, had orders to storne the horn-work before it, which they perform'd and carryd it with litle or no loss, the Enemy not thinking convenient to dispute it, but drawing off into the Town as our men advanced. The third night the Regiment of Turenne took their turn, and carryd on the Trench so near, that the next night the Regiments of York and Palteau brought it to the very edge of the ditch belonging to the outworks; and the same night fasten'd a Miner in the face of the half bastion of the Envelope I haue already mention'd, having broken the pallisades which were in the ditch, to make his passage thither. He continued working till the afternoon; about the beginning of which he call'd out to our Soldiers which were in the head of the Trench, That he wanted drink and candles, and till he were supplyd with them he must cease from working: Upon which a Sergeant of York was order'd to carry him what he wanted, and that his passage might be more secure, all the men in the Trench were commanded to stand to their Armes, and those who were at the head of it, to give a Voly, when the Sergeant was ready to take his run to the Miner; and they and the rest to continue firing till they were sure he was in safety: This was accordingly perform'd, and he pass'd through the ditch to the Miner without having one shott made at him.

That night the Regiment of Picardy had again the guard of the Trenches; and the next day as I was going to the head of the approches, accompanyd by Mons^r. d'Humieres, Mons^r. de Crequi and somme others, while wee stayd a litle time in the first battery a great shott came from the Town, which pass'd through three barrells of powder, without firing them, which had it done, all who were in the battery had inevitably been blown up: But the danger came so suddainly and was so soon over, that none of us had time to be concern'd for it.

The Duke in danger of being blown up.
OR: MEM:
P: 2. p. 42.

The next day came up a battallion of the Regiment of Guardes, consisting of above six hundred men in ten Companies, and commanded by Mons^r. de Vautourneu; and according to their privilege had the guard of the Trenches the same night, relieving the Regiment of Picardy: And when Mons^r. de Castelnau, the only Lieu^t Generall then in the Army, came according to his usuall custom into the Trenches, to command there, they absolutely refus'd obedience to him, pretending they were not to obey any man but the Generall himself: of which Mons^r. de Turenne being inform'd, he went thether to accommodate the business, but finding Vautourneu very obstinat and positue in that point, he desir'd M^r. de Castelnau to retire into his tent, and repose himself that night, because he had taken so much paines and so litle rest the night before; adding, That he himself would do his office for him, and watch in the Trenches: Castelnau obeyd and went away, and Mons^r. de Turenne did, as he had Sayd,

The Regim^t of Guardes refuses to obey any man but the Generall himself.
OR: MEM:
P: 2. p. 44.

P A R T
II.

1653.
The Dispute is decided by an order from the Court.
Ibid.

there being indeed a necessity incumbent on him So to do, for avoiding any farther dispute in that matter which he was also unwilling to decide: But he immediatly dispatched a Messenger to Court, to informe them of it, who sent a positive order to the Guardes, That they should obey the Lieu^t Generall. This command came back before it was their turn to mount the Trenches the second time, after which the dispute was no more revived. But yet it prov'd of advantage to the service, for the Guardes thought themselves obliged in honour to make a very great advance that night; which they perform'd, being both encouraged by the presence of the Generall and by the prudence of his directions; for they did not only make a blind all along the bottom of the ditch of the Envelope, by the help of the pallisado's which were in it, which went directly upon the great Tower, but also made a lodgement along from the place where the ditch of the Envelope joyn'd with that of the Town to a half moon, which was on our right hand and which also was abandon'd by the Enemy, from whence wee design'd to get down into the Town ditch and there to lodge our Miner.

Thus far wee had advanced very speedily, but when wee came to make our descent into the ditch of the Town, wee found more difficulty then were expected; for the next night endeavouring to continue at the same rate wee had begun, by making a lodgement against the pallisado's which were in the midst of the ditch, thō wee carryd on that work with great vigour, yet when it was almost perfected, the Enemy beat our men out of it, by throwing down great store of hand granades, fireworkes, and fire it self, so that it was impossible to continue longer there, and make good our undertaking: yet (we) were not discouraged by the unsuccessfulness of this first attempt, but for two nights following very obstinately pursued the design of lodging ourselves, but all to no purpose: for thō wee finish'd our work, yet the Enemy burnt us out, by throwing down

The French
make a lodgement in the ditch of the Town, but are beat out again.
Or: MEM:
P: 2. p: 45.

upon us such vast quantities of fireworks, and combustible matter, that they ruin'd our work.

This made us cast about to go on some other way with more security ; and therefore the next day, wee endeavour'd to make our descent into the ditch, by cutting a trench from the top of it, where wee lodged, and so sloping along the side : but wee also fail'd of effecting this ; for, besides that the Enemy had a low flanck, in which was only one small piece of ordnance, which lay so much under our battery that wee could not bear upon it, or dismount it, and that when wee descended into the ditch, it playd leuell on us, wee also found (when wee had got down half way) the wall I formerly mention'd, which of itself would haue stopt us ; thō the great gun had not gaul'd us from the flanker. So soon as it was day that single peice destroyd all the blinds wee had been making ; After which wee were constrain'd to haue recours to the old method of sinking a well, out of the lodgement wee had in the ditch of the half moon, and so that way to go in to the bottom of the ditch : Wee fell in hand with it as fast as possibly wee cou'd, and also endeavour'd to fasten our Miner to the Town-wall by the means of Madriers, which are planckes nine inches thick at least, cover'd with tinn or raw hides, or both, the better to resiste the force of fire ; Those they carryd, and set up against the wall under which the Miner fell to work ; having barrells fill'd with earth on each side of him for his security from the small shott of the flanker, as the Madriers were to preserve him from the hand granado's, stones, and fire, which they threw incessantly upon him with great violence, thō without effect : So that they were convinced that unless they cou'd invent some other means of dislodging him, he would soon haue gott so far into the Wall, that there would be no farther hope for them ; finding also that thō it was a dry ditch, wee had made so great lodgements all along the edge of it, that they could

P A R T
II.

1653.

They attempt the descent into the ditch by another method, which proves as ineffectuall as the former.

OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 45.

Recours is had at last to the old method of sinking a well.
Ibid. p. 46.

The Miner is fasten'd to the Town wall by the means of madriers.
Ibid.

P A R T
II.

1653.
A Bomb hung down by a chaine and firing closs by the Madriers destroys them, and the Miner is burnt in his hole.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 47.

do nothing by a sally, they invented another way that was more secure, which was by hanging a bomb or great granado down by a chaine and closs to the side of the Madriers, which firing blew them all away, and then they threw over so much combustibile matter, as burnt the Miner in his hole. The Miner at the other attacke had no better success, for Mons^r. de la Ferté having the same desire to make a quick dispatch, fasten'd a Miner to the body of the place before he had made a lodgment under the Wall, so that the Enemy having found him, immediatly smother'd him with smoke, he being already so far enter'd that the fire cou'd not reach him, but as I sayd, the smoke stifled him.

Perpetuall Raines during the whole Seige.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 47.

During the time of this whole Seige, wee were much troubled and hindered by perpetuall raines and stormes so violent, that they very often blew away our blinds, and wash'd down some parts of our Trenches which for the most part were fill'd with water, the Sky being seldom clear for above three hours together: and that which makes me remember this the more particularly, was, that one morning very early, going down with some others to the approches, when wee came into the ditch of the Envelope, which went straight upon the great Tower, and was our only way to the lodgement, where wee were working att the well I have already mention'd, wee kept closs to the pallissado, where the blind should have been, and thō nothing but the very beginning of it was left standing, all the rest being blown down, yet all of us were so busily imployd in piking out our way (the ditch being full of dirt and water) that not one single man tooke notice that the blind was ruin'd, and consequently wee in open view, till wee were gotten half our way, and then, one of the company who observ'd it first, propos'd that wee shou'd return; to which I well remember I would not consent, urging, That since wee were now so far onward, the danger was equall in going forward or in returning: so wee

The Duke
going down to the approches is in eminent danger, but rejects the proposall of returning back; his Starr saves him.
Ibid. p. 48.

continu'd going on to the head of the attacke as wee first intended; but in all the way while wee were thus exposed, there was not one shott made at us, at which wee wonder'd; but afterwards when the Town was surrender'd, the Governour inform'd us of the reason, That he himself happening to be upon the wall at that very time, and knowing me by my Starr, had forbid his men to fire upon the Company, which is a respect very usuall beyond Sea. But he had not the same consideration for those afterwards, who were commanded to repair the blind; for I hauing given notice to the Officer who was in the Trenches, of its condition, he gave order to haue it mended, and severall of those who were employd in that work were slayn, and others hurt.

P A R T
II.

1653.

About the same time, when wee began to sink our Well in the ditch of the half moon, wee also lodged a Miner at the foot of the great Tower, under shelter of the Madriers, who had better fortune then the former, and work'd into the wall; when he was gott within as far as he design'd, but had not yet begun to make his chambers, he sent out word to Mr. de Turenne, that he heard the Enemy at work in a Countermine, and that as near as he could guess, they would be upon him in some few hours, long before he could finish his undertaking; Upon which, he gave immediat orders to put some barrells of powder in the hole he had already made, and then to stop it as firmly as they could, intending by this only to ruine the Enemies Countermine and Miners, well knowing it could not bring down the Tower: his orders were speedily put in execution, and because the powder must needs blow backwards, he withdrew his men from such parts of the approches as were neighbouring to it, or in danger of any hurt from it, and himself and severall others went and stood in the first battery, which was distant from the Tower about half muskett Shott; under this shelter he expected the effect: when fire was given, it produced all that wee design'd,

A Miner lodged at the foot of the great Tower.
Or: MEM:
P. 2: p. 48.

A Countermine of the beseiged is discover'd, and blew up.
Ibid. p: 49.

P A R T
II.

1653.

The Countermine being destroyed
M^r. de Turenne sends back the Miner into his hole.
OR: MEM.
P. 2. p. 49.

for it only enlarged the hole which our Miner had made, and as wee learn'd afterwards kill'd those of the Enemy, throwing to a far distance severall great stones with a much violence as if they had been shott out of a cañon, some of which hitt the battery behind which wee stood, and others wee saw fly much farther. So soon as the blow was over, Mons^r. de Turenne, having seen what it perform'd, sent back the Miner into the hole, which was now widen'd, and sent along with him a Sergeant, and six men to guard him who might easily be lodged in it, with all Security from the Shott of the Enemy.

The Well is open'd.
Ibid. p. 50:

This which concern'd the firing of the Mine pass'd all in the day time; when it was night wee thought it convenient to open the Well which wee had sunk, and which was now as low as the bottom of the Town ditch, for it would haue taken a longer time, then we cou'd spare, to go all the way under ground as far as to the wall, and being already sunck so low were secur'd both from great and small shott, and had nothing farther to apprehende in our opinions but hand granado's, fire works, and fire it self: But wee had no sooner open'd it, then the Enemy discovering it, by the light of the fires which they had made, roull'd from off the walls a Bomb, or Mortar-Granado, by the means of two strong pieces of timber fasten'd together; the Bomb lighted full into the mouth of the Well, and kill'd four or five of our men who were working within it, and withall, so terribly shook the lodgment just above it, where M^r. de Turenne, myself, some Officers, and many volunteers were then standing, that wee all beleev'd at that moment it would haue been shatter'd to peices: yet it stood; but it was above a quarter of an hour before any could go down to work again by reason of the smoke and dust; And then, thō the Enemy continually plyd that place with hand-granado's, fire, and fire works, and now and then a Bomb (none of which last happen'd to be So justly directed as the first) yet wee carryd on our Trench as

A Bomb from the Town lighting in the mouth of the Well, is like to shake the lodgment above it to peices, where the Duke and
M^r. de Turenne
were.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 50.

The Trench is carryd on with great difficulty to the palli-sades in the middle of the ditch. Ibid.

far as the palisado's which were in the midst of the ditch ; but by reason of that storme of fire works which the Enemy without ceasing powr'd upon us, wee were obliged to cover it again with planks, fascines and earth upon them, for the security of our men. When wee were advanced as far as the palisado's, wee were forced again to drive under ground, the Enemy still heaving over vast quantities of wood and combustible matter, and wee being then so very near the wall, that it was impossible to go forward any other way.

Advancing in this manner wee fasten'd our Miner at length to the body of the place ; wee lost that night a considerable number of our men. La Feuillade had his head broken with a hand-granado, M^r. d'Humieres had likewise a blow on the side of his, with a small shott, which first came through the lodgment, and then after glancing from his head, pass'd through the leg of a pioneer, and lastly strook the toe of my boot, without doing me any harm. M^r. de Turenne continu'd on the place all night, with out whose presence I am confident the work had not been done.

The Miner
fasten'd at length to the body of the place.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 51.

The Duke in danger of a bullet which Struck only the toe of his boot. Ibid.

At the same time M^r. de la Ferté was so far advanced in his attacke, that his Mine was ready to spring next day, it was accordingly sprung after dinner: M. de Turenne with severall of his Officers and Volonteers went to see what effect it would produce, but went not down into those Trenches, his coming being only out of curiosity. The Mine was made in the angle of a Tower and the wall, and was so order'd as to blow up not only the Angle, but also that part of the Tower and Wall which was nearest to it: when it was fired and the smoke gone off, wee saw it had only done its intended work upon the Wall, and very angle, but that the Tower was yet standing; only there was a great crack quite through it: but immediatly after the firing of the six guns upon the edge of the ditch, all together, that part of the Tower came also down to our great satisfaction.

P A R T
II.

1653.

I haue been told by some who were then in the battery with Mons^r. de la Ferté, when this happen'd, that when he perceiv'd that part of the Tower next the Angle came not down with the other, he was in great rage against the Cheualier de Clerville, an Engeneer, who had the care of carryng on the Mine, threatning him furiously for his negligence and ignorance: At which the poor man much frighten'd, and fearing som severe usage from the Mareshall, but withall observing that the part which was yet standing shook, desir'd that the six guns which were in the battery might all be levell'd at that part of the Tower and fir'd at it all together, which he said would probably bring it down: This being immediatly done had its desired effect, and he escap'd a cudgelling.

The breach that was made by it was very faire, so that our men the same night made a lodgment on it, which being perform'd and our two Mines on the other side of the Town in readiness to spring, the Governour thought it now high time to begin a Treaty for the surrendring up of the place; and the next morning beat a parlee, at the same time sending out Officers to treat. The articles were soon adjusted, which were, that he should march out next day with armes and baggage, and be conveyd as far as Montmedy a neighbouring garrison of the Spaniards.

Thus wee master'd the Town of Mousson in the space of seventeen days from the opening of the Trenches, without the loss of many men, or of any considerable Officer, or Volunteer of quality, excepting the Vidame de Laon, a nephew of Mons^r. de Turenne, and second Son to the Count de Roussy, who was shott dead in the Trenches, as one evening he was going down to the head of them betwixt M^r. d'Humieres, and M^r. de

Mousson is surrender'd the 27th of Sept.
O^r: MEM:
P. 2: p: 52.

Schomberg. The greatest loss wee had was in our horses, of which very many dyd by reason of the ill weather and clay ground on which they were camp'd.

But here I think it will not be amiss if I make a short digression to give account of some of their methods in France for the carrying on a Seige, and of the extraordinary care and pains which the Generall Officers usually take on such occasions, to which I chiefly attribute their speedy taking in of Townes: They trust to no body but themselves to view, and make their observations; M^r. de Turenne went in person to view all the ground about Mousson, taking with him M^r. de Castelnau, when, as in another Army, I have seen the Generalls trust a Sergent de bataille or some inferior Officer to do it, so that they were wholly guided, and in a manner govern'd by their (the) eyes and advice of other men: but Mons^r. de Turenne made use of his own judgment, where he thought it most proper to break ground, and which way to run the Trenches; when night came, he himself was present at the opening of them, and continued there allmost till break of day: Besides it was his constant method, during this whole Seige to go into the Trenches both morning and evening, In the morning to see if the work was well perform'd, at evening to resolve what would be the work that night, having in his company the Lieu^t Gen^l: and some of the cheif Officers who that night were to command in the Trenches, to instruct them himself what he expected to be done. Again after supper he went to see them begin their work, and would continue with them more or less, as he found it necessary for the carrying on of the present design.

While he was once in the Trenches, during this Seige, I remember an odd accident, which happen'd when I was present and which I will relate, thō besides my present purpose: A Captain of the Regiment of Guyenne, being newly come to the Army, and that Regiment being then on duty on the Trenches,

P A R T
II.

1653

An account of the methods of carrying on Seiges in France.
OR. MEM.
P. 2: p. 53.

OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 54.

P A R T he approach'd Mons'. de Turenne to salute him ; It happen'd, II. that, at the same time he was bowing down his head, a small shott 1653. from the Town struck him in the skull, and layd him dead at the Generall's feet : at which unhappy chance, some who were present made this unseasonable raillery, That if the Captain had been better bred, he had escap'd the bullet, which only hitt him there, for not bowing low enough to his Generall.

But to proceed : the Commander in cheif, is not only thus diligent, but all the inferiour Officers are obliged to be as carefull in their severall stations : particularly in all the time of this present Seige, in our side of the attack wee had not so much as one single Ingeneer, nor did I ever observe them to be made use of at any other place, but only as overseers of the work, most of the Officers understanding very well how to carry on a Trench, and to make a lodgement. As for the Mines, they haue a Captain of Miners who has a care of carrying them on, when the Generall has resolved where they shall be.

And not only from my own observations, but by what I haue learn'd from others who haue had more experience and seen more seruice then myself, I find and am settled in my opinion, That no Generall ought wholly to confide in any Ingeneer for the carrying on of a Trench, it being not reasonable to beleeeve, that one who is to be allways there, will hazard or expose himself as far as Officers, who are to take their turns, and who are push'd on by emulation of each other to make dispatch, and carry on the seruice with all diligence : And besides it gives more opportunity to Officers to understand that work, then otherwise they would haue ; which appears most plainly by the Army of the Hollanders, for there, where all was resolv'd on by their Generall upon consultation with the Ingeneers and the overseers, few Officers ever arrived at any knowledge in carrying on the Trenches, their imployment being only to guard them, and the workmen, and command their Soldiers to fire, they not being answerable for the advancing of the work : so that unless an Officer were naturally industrious to learn and applyd himself to it, he receiv'd but small improvement. But what I haue said concerning the carrying on of their approches in Holland, I confess I haue not spoken of my own knowledge, but only from hear-say of persons, whose judgment and integrity I suppose I may reasonably trust: yet this I can affirm, that I haue known very few of whatsoever Nation who were much the better for what they had learn'd in that Country ; thō I haue known many good Officers who haue serv'd there, yet they gain'd their experience els where.

At this Seige was made no line of Circumvallation ; for besides that wee were affraid in case wee had gone about it, so much time would haue been taken up, that the Enemy would haue compass'd their business, and gain'd Rocroy, before wee could haue taken Mousson (and then our Lines would haue signified litle to us) the Situation of the place was such by reason of the River Chiers, which cover'd us on the Luxembourg side, and then runs into the Meuse betwixt us and Sedan, that it was in stead of a line to us to hinder smaller succours from being put into the Town ; wee having small advanced guards upon all the passes of that River, so that nothing could come that way without being discover'd, and that time enough to be prevented. On the other side the Enemy was so thorowly imployd at their Seige of Rocroy, that they could not think of endeavouring to releve Mousson.

On the same day when the Town was surrender'd, which was the 27th of September, wee march'd to Amblemont in our way towards Rocroy with intention to try what could be done in order to the releif of it ; but when wee were come as far as Varnicour, wee heard of its being deliver'd up.

After these two Seiges, there happen'd litle of Action betwixt either Armys during the remainder of the Campagne ; for

P A R T

II.

1653.

besides that the Season of the year was too far spent to undertake any considerable Seige, the Spanish Army had suffer'd much more at Rocroy, then wee at Mousson, and their numbers were so diminish'd, that out of that consideration, and our keeping so closs to them, therby to prevent our frustating any new undertaking, they durst attempt no more that year; but imployd their time in marches and countermarches, on the other side of the Somme, eating up all the forage of their fronteers, as wee did on this side of the same River in observing all their motions.

The Seige of S^t Menchou.
On: MEM:
P. 2. p: 56.

But while wee thus continued to hold them in play on that Side of the Country, the Court having got together some troopes, besides the guards of horse and foot, which are constantly attending on it, and some which were detach'd to them from the Army, undertook the Seige of S^t Menchou, which at first was carryd on by three Lieut^t Gen^{ls}; Mons^r. de Navaille commanding the troopes belonging to the Court, M^r. de Castelnau those which were sent from Mons^r. de Turenne, and Mons^r. d'Vxelles such as had been spar'd out of Mons^r. de la Ferté's troopes. And thō two of these three above nam'd were as able Officers for all Sorts of duty as any others in the Kingdom of France, and thō M^r. de Castelnau thō not so proper for feil Service understood the business of a Seige as well as any man, yet these three being all in equall command, manag'd the main affaire so ill, and went so slowly on with it, that the Cardinal was forced to send the Mareshall de Plessis-Praslin to take the supreme command upon him, after which the Seige advanced with more Success.

Some days after the begining of this Seige, M. de la Ferté with the greatest part of his horse came and quarter'd about to hinder any releif from coming into the place, because the Duke of Lorraine was marching down that way with his Army. In the mean time M. de Turenne was quarter'd with his forces behind the Somme betwixt Roye and Corbie; from which place seeing litle probability of action there, I ask'd leave of M^r. de Turenne to go to the Seige of S^t Menehou; and being obliged to take Châlons sur Marne in my way thither, at which place the Court then resided, I was stayd so long on one pretence or other in that Town, some times for want of Convoy, another while, upon the news of the King's removal within a day or two, so that they could not spare any; that notwithstanding my continuall pressing to be gone, the Town of S^t Menehou sent out to treat of a surrender the same day I waited on the King of France to the Castle of Ham, which is within two leagues of S^t Menehou: so that I miss'd the seeing of that Seige, and went the next day with his Ma^{ty} to view the approaches, and the breach which had been made in the body of the place, before they came to Articles of Capitulation.

Thus ends the Relation given of this Campagne by his Royall Highness, who upon the removall of the French Court, return'd likewise to Paris where he arrived the beginning of X^{ber}, and there spent the ensuing winter: towards the end of which, the King his Brother took his resolution of leaving France by reason of the Treaty of Amity then on foot between that Crown and Oliver Cromwell newly made Protector; For Cardinal Mazarin thought it at that time necessary for the preservation of the French Monarchy, to keep fair with that Vsurper. The Duke attended his Brother on his way towards Germany as far as Chantilly, where they took leave of each other, in hopes of a more happy meeting thereafter.

P A R T

II.

1653.

The Duke is disappointed in his desire to see the Seige of S^t Menehou.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 57.

P A R T
II.

1654.

The Duke's Third Campagne
in France.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 59.

The Seige of Arras.

The Spaniards
sitt down before it the 3^d of July.
Ibid.

Chev. Crequi, S^t Lieu and d'Equancourt sent from the French Army with succours to the Town, they force their passage.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 59.

OF the CAMPAGNE here ensuing his Royall Highness gives the following account in his Memoires.

THIS YEAR the French Army under the Command of Mons^r. de Turenne, and the Mareshall de la Ferté, was not assembled soon enough to prevent the Spaniards from beseiging Arras. On the third of July they satt down before it, with an Army consisting of thirty thousand men well furnish'd with all things necessary for so great an Enterprize. One thing which induced them to undertake that Seige, was their being advertis'd of the weaknes of the Garrison, which was not So strong as it ought to haue been, thō not so weak as to oblige the Governour to quit any of his outworkes which were very great. Our Generalls being sensible of this defect, sent away about a thousand horse in three bodies, one commanded by the Chevalier of Crequi, another by Mons^r. de S^t Lieu, and the third by the Baron of Equancourt. S^t Lieu got into the Town with about two hundred horse, the first or second night after the Town was invested, through the Prince Condé's quarter; The Baron d'Equancourt two nights after him with three hundred horse through the Lorraine's quarter, and the Chevalier de Crequi forced his passage into the Town some days after both, through the Spanish quarter before the Line was finish'd. This was all the succour could be spar'd from the French Army. As for foot, wee durst not venture to send any, it being so plaine a Country about the Town, that they might haue been easily discover'd and defeated when once the Enemy had taken up their quarters before the Place.

P A R T
II.

1654.

Stenay beseiged by
the French, is one of the reasons why
the Spaniards beseiged Arras.
Ibid. p. 60.

Another reason why they lay down before Arras was, that wee had beseiged Stenay; which place they hop'd would haue endur'd so long, and taken up so many Troopes, that they might have compass'd their design before wee could haue ended our Seige, or at least as soon; and that, during this, our Army would not be of strength enough to undertake any thing upon them, which indeed was not ill conjectur'd: for wee were (so) very weak that wee stirr'd not from about Peronne to approche their Lines till about the 16th of July, when wee heard they were near finish'd, for fear of ingaging ourselves so near a great Army, in a Country so bare and open.

The Duke
joyns the Army by Peronne, and serves in quality of L^t Gen^l under
M. de Turenne.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 60.

The French
Army march towards Arras, the 16 of July.
Ibid.

I joyn'd the Army by Peronne before they march'd, being to Serve that year in quality of one of the Lieutenant Generalls, under Mons^r de Turenne, and tooke my day according to the date of my Commission as the youngest who serv'd in that Army. About the 16th, as I haue sayd, wee began our march towards Arras, and camp'd at a Village call'd Sains, near Sauchy-Cauchy which lys betwixt Cambray and Arras about five leagues distant from the last of these places; The next day wee continued our march to Mouchy-le-Preux, M^r de Turenne taking that compass about the Country to cover himself by some brookes, that in case the Enemy should draw out upon him, he might be able to avoide fighting, And he was so cautious the day before he came to Mouchy-le-Preux, that when he arrived at a brooke which was half a league short of the foremention'd place, he there drew up his Army in battell, and afterwards pass'd over himself with some horse and dragoons to view the ground where he intended to incampe, and gave not orders for the Army to come over to him till the evening, but stayd upon the place to see if the Enemy had any intentions of drawing out against him; resolving that in case they should that day

P A R T
II.

1654.

The French camp at Mouchy-le-Preux,
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 61.

haue attempted any thing, our Army should not haue gone over: When evening came, and the Enemy appear'd not, wee pass'd the brooke, but it was then so late that nothing could be attempted by them in all lykelyhood for that night.

Our Troopes no sooner were camp'd, but they fell to work about our Line, every Regiment both of horse and foot labouring at it on that part which lay before them; and this they perform'd with So much diligence, that next day they were in some tollerable posture of defence; but when once it was finish'd wee thought ourselves absolutely secure, it being a very advantageous post, and not of too great a front, for the Army wee had then; The brooke which I haue already mention'd covering our left wing, as the Scarpe did our right: so that if the Enemy had drawn out to engage us there, when we first put ourselves in battell in that post of Mouchy-le-Preux, or before our Lines were finish'd, wee should haue had faire play for it, notwithstanding they were so much stronger, because they could not outfront us, nor fall into our flankes; And wee had so good an opinion of our own courage, as never to be unwilling to venture an Engagement with them where they could not outwing us.

I haue heard since when I was in Flanders and elsewhere, many taxing the Spaniards for not coming out against us the first day of our being in that post, or as wee came to possess ourselves thereof; and some report that the Prince of Condé propos'd it to the Spaniards: But I can not affirme this, neither will I take upon me to censure them for not doing it, because I haue not heard their reasons for this omission, though they may be easily conjectur'd. But whither they had it under their consideration or not, wee took our precautions in coming thither, as if wee believ'd they would make some attempt on us; and, being once posted, wee lost no time to intrench ourselves: for certainly that post of Mouchy was very strong,

Description of the post of Mouchy.
OR: MEM:
P. 1. p. 62.

because that not only both our flankes were cover'd, as I haue already said, but also our Line ran along upon a heighth from Mouchy which was in the midst, and both overlook'd and commanded on either side down to the brooke and River of Scarpe; So that had the Enemy advanced upon us in the day time, our cañon, which for the most part were planted on that height of Mouchy, would haue gall'd them terribly, after which wee had still the advantage of the ground.

P A R T
II.

1654.

Monsieur de Turenne's own quarter was at this place of Mouchy, having with him the greatest number of his foot, his horse were incamp'd on two Lines, which reached to the brooke, together with the rest of his foot; Mons^r de la Ferté had his quarter at the right hand of all our Line down by the side of the River Scarpe, at a Village called Peule, One part of his foot were incamped by him, the other part at Mouchy, and his horse also upon two Lines betwixt Mouchy and his quarter: Our reserue was in its proper place just behind M^r de Turenne's quarter, which was in the midst. Thus our Incampment was in order of battell, only wee had some foot at each extremity of our Lines, and in the midst of our wings of horse, that our Line might be the better defended.

The order of the Incampment.
Ibid. p. 63.

When wee were thus posted, and our Line finish'd, wee sent out considerable partys of horse, almost every night, to hinder any Convoys from coming into the Enemie's Camp; and notwithstanding that they sate down before Arras as well appointed with all things necessary, as was usuall for Armys at that time, yet so great a body of men as they were within their Lines was of necessity to haue some communication with their own Country; and whether it was, that they were really in want of powder, or that it was only out of precaution, from almost the first days of our being in their neighbourhood, they sent out partys of horse to supply them with it, which went to Douay, Cambray, and other places of theirs, and some of their

The French sent out every night considerable partys of horse to intercept Convoys.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 65.

P A R T

II.

1654.

Garrisons sent to them, each trooper carrying a bag of fifty pound weight of powder behind his horse: These partys they kept continually going, scarcely intermitting any night, and thō wee had partys very often abroad to intercept them, it was never our fortune to surprise any of them, the Country being so very open, that unless by accident they should fall into the midst of our partys, they could not be intercepted: Yet wee seldom sent out less then a thousand or twelve hundred horse under the command of some Lieutenant Generall, who march'd out of the Camp in the evening. They who were sent abroad out (of) Mons^r de Turenne's Army, posting themselves betwixt the Camp and Bapaume in some Valley or other place where they could not be easily discover'd, till they came out against the Enemy, having small outguards round about them to give notice of any thing that pass'd and, besides them, Centry's every way that they might not be surpriz'd; and M^r de la Ferté did the like on his Side, his party's advancing betwixt the Camp and Lens.

A Convoy of the Enemy's powder Carriers blown up by an odd accident.

On: MEM:
P: 2: p. 65.

But though neither ours, nor his could meet with any of these powder-carriers, yet by an accident hapening amongst themselves, one of their Convoyes chanced to miscarry; For one night as wee were with M^r de Turenne, visiting the guards, wee perceived a great blaze of fire, quick and violent like that of the blowing up of gunpowder; and it seem'd to us, as if it had been at the quarter of Mons^r de la Ferté: But as (we) went down that way to inquire of it, our Sentinels who were upon the heighth of Mouchy, inform'd us, that they had likewise seen it, and that it was not where wee had imagined, but on the plaine farr beyond those quarters towards Lens, which caus'd us to wonder the more what it might be. The next morning wee were fully Satisfied concerning it, that an entire Regiment of horse, consisting of Six score, going from Douay to the Enemy's Camp, all of them Officers as well as Souldiers having behind them a bagg of powder, besides about fourscore horses laden with hand grenades, which were led by Countrymen on foot, had been all blown up, but by what accident, none of those who were brought prisoners into the Camp could tell. Indeed it was a very dismall object, to behold a great number of poor men, who were brought into our Camp with their faces disfigur'd and their bodies burnt by powder, so that few of them recover'd, their Companions having been all kill'd outright. These prisoners were brought in by some of our partys who were out on that side of the Country, who seeing the flash at a great distance, rode up to the place to gaine a more clear knowledge of the matter; they also brought along with them some few scorch'd horses, and a paire of kittle drums which belong'd to that Regiment, and all the men who had any life remaining in them. I happen'd since, when I was in Flanders, to talke with a Lieutenant of horse who was the only man that could give an account, how that accident befell them; for seeing his face had been burnt, I casually ask'd him how he came by that misfortune? He answer'd me, that it was by the blowing up of powder at such a time near Arras; and upon my examining him concerning the particulars of it, he told me, That happening to be in the Rear of the whole Regiment, he saw one of the Troopers with a pipe of tobacco lighted in his mouth; wherupon he rode up to him, and taking it gently from him, threw it away after which he beat him with his sword: The Soldier being drunke, pull'd out his pistol, and presented it to his breast; upon which the Lieutenant threw himself from his horse apprehending what might happen, and the Trooper at the same instant firing at him, it lighted on the bag behind the s^d Lieutenant's horse, which taking fire, blew it up, and so, from one successiuely to the other who was next, it spied through the whole Regiment: he being on the ground

P A R T
II.

1654.

P A R T

II.

1654.

A party of the Spaniards beat a French party commanded by the Marq. de Richelieu.
OR: MRM:
P. 2. p: 67.

In another recountre of partys M^r. de Beaujeu a French Lieut.
Gen^l is kill'd.
Ibid.

escap'd best cheape, having only his face, his hands, and some parts of his bod scorched.

This accident was So very remarkable, that I could not but mention it, especially because it was the only party of the Enemy which miscarryd, or which indeed wee mett with excepting twice; one which was rencountred by the Marquess de Richelieu commanded by the Comte de Lorge, but there the advantage was not on our side, for the Comte resolutely forc'd his way through the Marquess's men, beat them, and took three or four of his Captains, loosing only twelve horses laden with powder, and getting safe with the rest into the Lines of their own Camp. The other was yet of worse consequence to us, by the considerable loss wee Sustain'd in the person of Mons^r.de Beaujeu, the Lieu^t Gen^l who commanded our party: he being sent out by M^r. de Turenne with a body of eight hunderd horse, and having notice of a Convoy which was to come into the Enemy's Lines by the way of . . . * immediatly taking that way about break of day he mett a party of the Enemy commanded by M^r. Druot (Droot) a Colonell coming from the Enemies Camp; the numbers of both sides were in a manner equall, but the Enemy had no advertisement of our being there; yet it so happen'd that most of our men were at that time dismounted from their horses, expecting intelligence of the Supposed party which came the other way, which made it easy for Droots men to overrun as they did the two first Squadrons, before they could mount; And as for Beaujeu, his misfortune was such, that as he was going to put the next Squadron in order, he was slayn, and that body also beaten: So that if the Regiment of Beauuau

* The same space is left in the abridged Narrative of Marshall Turenne's Campaigns, which James the Second sent to Cardinal de Bouillon. — EDITOR.

(Beauveau) had not made a stand, and put a stop to the Violence of the Enemy, by beating their first Squadron which had done all this execution, our whole party had been absolutely defeated. But this advantage gave leasure to the rest of our men to put themselves in order, and to receive a charge from the Enemy, which was not very vigourous, Droot having been hurt in the former by the Regiment de Beauveau; so that there was no great mischeif done at that bout on either side, they only disordering each other: wherupon the Enemy, not knowing the certain number of our men, and fearing they might be stronger then indeed they were, judg'd it convenient for them to march away, and our Soldiers having lost their Commander were enough content to escape as they did, and thought not of following them; so that in this action, it might be said that both were beaten: As for the number of the Slayn and prisoners on either side, it was very inconsiderable excepting the loss of our Lieu^t. Generall.

For my own particular I was once a broad in my turn, with about a thousand horse, and being posted in a litle Valley with my party, my Centryes being out every side, a party of the Enemy consisting of an hundrd horse coming from their Camp to go for Cambray, surprised a Corporall and two Centryes, just as he was about to releive them; who being ask'd by those who had made them prisoners, what our numbers were? The Corporall answer'd, About a hunderd, and that most of us were dismounted, feeding our horses: which they beleeving came furiously down upon us at a great gallop their trumpett sounding the charge before them; but when they were with in pistoll-shott of us, perceiving their mistake, and that in stead of a small party, and those off their horses, they were to deal with severall Squadrons all on horseback, they retired faster then they had come on: Which I observing, was a moment in doubt what I should do, imagining at first they would never haue

The Duke
go's out in his turn with a party of 1000 horse.
OR: MEM:
P: 2. p. 68.

P A R T

II.

1654.

The Duke pursues a party of the Enemy, but could not overtake them.
Oa: MEM:
P. 2: p. 69.
He takes another party of the Enemy of a 100 horse
all prisoners.
Ibid.

advanced with so much fury, if they had not been well seconded; but immediatly weighing with how much precipitation they ran off, I concluded their number to be no more then what I saw, wherupon I order'd the Squadron upon the head of which I was, to disband after them, myself with the rest riding softly after: but they made such hast, that our Soldiers could not overtake them; yet they escap'd not, for they fell into the hands of another party of ours, which took them every man. The same morning also, another party of theirs was taken by me; for as I was marching back towards the Camp, a small detachment of mine brought me word, that they had discover'd about a hunderd horse of the Enemy, putting themselves in ambuscade a litle before day in a neighbouring Village: upon which intelligence I march'd with my whole party as near the Village as I could, without being seen by them, sending a small number of my men to draw them out of their ambuscade; with order, that when the Enemy came out to charge them, they shou'd retire to the main body. This they perform'd so dexterously, that the Enemy were close upon us before they perceived us, So that none of them escap'd from being taken.

While these things pass'd without the Camps, the Enemy before Arras having finished their Line on the 14th August open'd their Trenches the same night, following the Seige with all manner of diligence, and pressing the Town so very hard, that thō Mons^r. de Mondejeu who was Governour, perform'd all the parts of an expert Commander, and was assisted by Mons^r. de S^t Lieu, the Cheualier de Crequi and the Baron d'Equancourt, with all imaginable gallantry; yet the Spaniard gain'd ground upon him every day, and by the * of August had made themselves masters of the corne de Guiche, and not only of the outward but of the inward also, as may be seen by the plan of it; continuing to push on their work with vigour, notwithstanding the resistance which they found. This obliged the Governour to send out severall Messengers to our Generalls, some of which came safely into our Camp to inform us of the condition of the place.

One of these Messengers having swallow'd the Note he brought, wrapt up in lead (that in case he had been taken and searched it might not haue been found about him) and coming at a time when the Generalls were very impatient to hear from the Town, the Messenger was not able to voyd the paper in above 24 houres, though severall purges were given him to bring it out of his body: This gave them great anxiety, and particularly Mons^r de la Ferté cryd out with a great passion, Il faut éventrer le coquin! "the rascall must haue his belly ript up," since he will not voyd it: This put the fellow into such a fright, that being then just at the door of the Tente, the peice of lead came immediatly from him; and by the account it brought, made us defer attacking the Lines of the Enemy before the Stenay troopes were come up to us, the Town not being so prest as wee had reason to beleeeve it was by some letters wee had intercepted from the Enemy's Camp to some in Flanders, wherein they confidently affirm'd they should be masters of the Town by St^t Laurence's day at furthest; which with the news wee had from the Army before Stenay, that the Seige there did not advance so fast as wee expected, and so no likelihood of having those troopes before that day, had made our Generalls resolve not to stay for them, and forthwith to attacke the Lines, ordering every Squadron of horse and battalion of foot to provide themselves with such a number of fascines and hurdles within two days. The reason of this provision was, because the Enemy had made without the utmost ditch of their Line, about six rowes of holes, of a foot and a

P A R T
II.

1654.

The Governour sends Severall Messages to inform of the condition of the place.

Ibid.

remarkable Story of one of those Messengers.

Ibid.

P A R T
II.

1654.

half, or two foot diameter, and three foot in depth, that our horse might not be able to pass to the edge of the out ditch, and with the help of these hurdles wee hop'd to get over them : But, as I haue already Said, those apprehensions were all blown over by the Note which the Messenger had brought them, and by the good news which arriv'd the next day from before Stenay, which imported that it would soon be taken ; They thought it reasonable therefore to attend the coming of those troopes, and in the mean time wee continued our preparations for attacking the Lines when it should be judg'd fitt.

After the taking of Stenay Mr. d'Hocquincourt joyns the two Marshalls Turenne and la Ferté, with the troopes y^t cam from that Seige.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 71.

About the of August wee had notice from Mr. d'Hocquincourt, to whom the Court had newly given the Command of the troopes that had been before Stenay (for it was not he but Mr. Faber Governour of Sedan who had commanded them before when they took Stenay) that he was within days march of us, and desir'd to know whither he should come up and joine us, or incampe at some other place ; to which they return'd this answer, That Mons^r de Turenne wou'd meet him with fifteen squadrons of horse at and that if Mr. d'Hocquincourt would come thither before and bring with him all his horse, they too would go together, and view a post upon the brook (de Crinchon) near Riuiere ; where they beleev'd would be found a convenient place for him to campe, and where by intrenching himself a litle, he might be secure from any attempt which the Enemy could make on him.

M.deTurenne and Mr. d'Hocquincourt meet to view a post for the latter to camp in.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 72.

Accordingly Mons^r. de Turenne and the other, mett at the place appointed on the 17th of August : But instead of going as they had resolv'd, to view that post, having immediatly received notice of a great Convoy coming to the Enemy from S^t Omer and Aire, by the way of S^t Paul, under the command of M^r de Boutteville, they march'd away on the instant with their horse, and left word for M^r. d'Hocquincourt's foot, cañon, and baggage which was then about Bapaume, to make what expedition they could after them to St Paul ; taking their way by Buquoy, and so along by the woods, to cover them as much as they could possibly, because they had no horse to guard them. In the mean time wee with the Cavalry were come as far as St Paul, where wee had intelligence that the Convoy having had notice of our coming that way, was return'd to Ayre, for which reason wee went no farther after them : But finding the enemy had possessed themselves of that Town, and had left four or five hunderd dismounted troopes in it for its defence, it was thought fitt by our two Generalls to stay where wee were till our foot came up, and then to attack it, it being a very considerable post which had been of great service to the Enemy ; for most of their Convoys had come Safely to them by that way, and it was their usuall resting place betwixt their garrisons on that side of the Country and their Camp, so that it was necessary for us to take it from them. It cost us litle time and labour, for as soon as our foot and cannon were come up which was on the 18th when our Batterys were made, they capitulated, and, as I remember, were made prisoners of warr.

They march to intercept a Convoy of the Enemy. Ibid.

This being perform'd, the next day wee marched back towards the Lines and quarter'd at Aubigny, where, coming early to our quarters, Mons^r. de Turenne according to his custome took with him a Squadron or two of horse and went on towards the Enemies Lines ; and when he was come near an old Roman Camp, which was call'd by the Country-men Coesars's Camp, where the Scarpe and a litle brook joyne together, he found the Enemy had there an advanced guard of horse, which upon our coming towards them retir'd to the other side of the brook ; by which means Mons^r de Turenne had the leisure to view that post which was not distant from the Line of the Enemy above twice cannon shott.

And he found it so proper for his turn, that he propos'd it to Mons^r d' Hocquincourt, as a much securer and better post

P A R T
II.

1654.

Missing y^e Convoy they attack St.
Paul, and take the 500 men y^t were in it prisoners of warr.

Ibid.

M^r. de Turenne views Coesar's Camp and proposes it to M^r. d' Hoc-quincourt.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 73.

P A R T

II.

1654.

to all intents, then that of Riuiere : Wherupon the next day being the 20th wee march'd thether, and to render it yet more secure, Mons^r. d'Hocquincourt ordered his men to make a Line from the River to the brook ; and finding that the Enemy had put five hunderd men into the Abbey of Mount S^t Eloy, which was but just on the other side of the River, he resolved to attack it the next day notwithstanding its neighbourhood to the Enemies Lines ; that by possessing it he might the better keep them in.

To secure this post, Hocquincourt attacks the Abbey of Mount S^t Eloy.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 73.

Being thus resolved, the next morning early he pass'd the River, which is there but very small, and drew up all those troopes in battell betwixt the Abbey and the Line, excepting such of the foot as were commanded to attack the place : At first the Enemy made shew as if they intended to mentain the Outwall, but upon the advancing of our foot they quitted it, and retir'd into the Abbey it self which had a good old wall about it, flancked with round Towers. So soon as wee were masters of the Outwall, wee made Embraseurs through it for our cañon, and began to batter the wall of the Abbey ; But finding that our cañon could not do much at so great a distance, wee rais'd a slight battery, which was indeed no more then a blind within the Outwall, and brought thether our great guns, where in four hours they began to make a breach, and while the cañon perform'd their part, the foot did theirs also : for having got by the shelter of some walks, and litle garden-walls within pistoll-shott of the foot of the main-wall, they fasten'd a Miner to it by the help of Madriers, and just as the Miner was ready to go on with those who were to carry the plancks to secure him, our foot which were cover'd by the garden-walls drew out from behind them, and stood firing as fast as they were able, for half a quarter of an hour together, at the Enemys loop-holes, that the Miner might lodge himself with more safety ; which being done they drew back behind the walls again. They were the French and Suisse Guards who perform'd this, and notwithstanding they approached so very near, and were seen from head to foot when they drew out, yet they lost very few men in the Action. At the same time the Regiment de la Marine found the means of lodging themselves, by the favour of a little banck close to the Tower which wee were battering: so that those within the Abbey thought it was now high time for them to capitulate, which they did, yeelding up the Abbey and themselves prisoners of warr.

This being done, Monsieur d'Hocquincourt drew back over the brook to Coesar's Camp, and Mons^r. de Turenne march'd away from thence, with his fifteen Squadrons of horse and two Troopes of Dragoons, to his own Camp. In his way thether he resolved to take a view of the Enemies Line on that Side, and in order to it, march'd down from Mont St Eloy, straight upon them, till he came within half cañon shott of them, and so keeping still the same distance from their Line, continued his march round that part of it which was on that side of the River Scarpe, till he had fully view'd it. During all this time the cannon shott from the Line playd hard upon us, and not without doing execution, there being not any of the Squadrons that escap'd without the loss of two or three men at least, and many of them lost more, besides horses, which caus'd some of the old horse Officers to murmur that they should be expos'd in that manner, as they then thought, to no purpose, And this was the only time while I serv'd in the French Army, that I ever knew Mons^r. de Turenne blam'd for hazarding his men unnecessarily. But the same Officers acknowledge they were in the wrong for thus taxing their Generall, after wee had forced those Lines which wee came then to obserue; for then the reason was evident why he expos'd not only his men, but his own person to that danger, it being at that very time, that he chose the place where he resolved to attack the Line. And indeed had he not gone so near with his whole body, the Enemy's horse guards

P A R T
II.

1654.

The Abbey of Mont St Eloy surrender'd up to the French.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 75.
M. d'Hocquincourt draws back to Coesar's Camp, and M^r. de Turenne returns to his own Camp.
In his way he views the Enemies Lines, together with the Duke.
Ibid.

They are very much expos'd.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 75.

This the only time the Duke ever heard M. de Turenne blam'd for hazarding unnecessarily his men.
Ibid. p. 76.

The reason why he expos'd himself in this manner and the great utility thereof.
Ibid.

P A R T

II.

1654.

would not haue retired as they did within their Line; and then he could not haue view'd it so exactly, for wee approached so near with some few loose horse, that Mr. Jermyn's (Lord Germain) horse was kill'd under him with a small shott from the Line, which peirced him through and gave his master a terrible blow on the leg afterwards.

Thus Mons^r. de Turenne by passing so near them, had the opportunity of viewing most exactly the strength of each quarter of the Enemy, all their troopes standing to their armes as wee marched along by them. He observed the quarter of Don Fernando de Solis to be the weakest, not only in men, but in the fortification of it; for which reason he resolv'd to make his strongest impression there. Some of our Officers as wee were marching down towards the Lines from Mont S^t Eloy, were bold enough to represent to Mons^r. de Turenne, the extreme hazard which he ran by going so near the Enemy in so open a Country, who (where) they could tell every man wee had, and therby knowing our force, might draw out and defeat us without any danger to themselves; which he freely acknowledg'd they might do, and that were it on the Prince Condé's side as it was on the Spaniards, he would not haue made the Venture: but having serv'd amongst the Spaniards, he well knew their methods of proceeding, And he was certain, that upon our first approche towards their Lines, Don Fernando de Solis would not dare to do any thing of himself, without sending first to the Count of Fuensaldagne who was Governador de las Armas; and the Count would either go himself or send to advertise the Archduke of it: after which they would send to the Prince of Condé, whose quarter was quite on the other side, and give him notice, at the same time desiring him to come to the Archduke's quarter where they were, to haue a Junto to consider what must be done on that occasion; And while this consultation which must pass through so many formes was making, wee should haue

M.deTurenne
foretells exactly what y^e Spaniards' proceedings would be, upon his approaching their Lines.
O^r: MEM:
P. 2. p. 77.

leisure to view their Lines, and afterwards to pass by them without running any other hazard then that of their cañon from their Lines. It happen'd just as he had foretold it would, and all those very Formalities were actually observ'd by the Spaniards, as the Prince of Condé himself told me afterwards in Flanders; but by that time they had resolved at their Junto to fall upon us, wee were wholly out of their danger and gotten in to our Camp.

Monsieur de Turenne having taken this view, it was now time for us to put some thing in execution in order to relevee the Town; for by a letter from the Governour, our Generalls had notice that he had very litle powder left, so that unless he were speedily succour'd he must be forced to capitulate. This hasten'd our resolution of attacking their Lines; which had never been attempted but by the means of Mons^r. de Turenne, who consider'd nothing but the public good, and the carrying of the King's Service; most of the other Generall Officers having by-ends and interests of their own, which made them declare openly against the taking of such a resolution, and oppose it with all the arguments they could invent. For M^r. de la Ferté, he was unwilling to run the hazard of losing so many of his Soldiers, as in all probability must be kill'd in the attempt; for being of so much consideration at Court by reason of his troopes, he was unwilling they should be lessen'd. Mons^r. d'Hocquincourt was Governour of Peroñe, which if Arras was once taken, would then more fronteer then it was before, and a considerable part of the contributions belonging to that place, would fall to him: The same reason prevail'd with M^r. de Navailles Governour of Bapaume, and with Mons^r. de Bar Governour of Dourlans, both of the Lieutenant Generalls; and most of the rest, excepting only myself and the Count de Broglio looking on it as a desperate peice of service, gave their opinions against the attack; for by weaving the attempt they

The Governour of Arras presses for speedy Succour.
OK: MEM:
P. 2: p. 78.
The relief of Arras had never been attempted but by the means of M^r. Turenne.
Ibid.

The other Generall Officers oppose the undertaking for their own by-ends. Ibid.

Most of all the L^d. Gen^{ls} excepting the Duke and y^e Counte de Broglio gave their opinions against the attack of the Lines.
Ibid. p. 79.

P A R T

II.

1654.

secur'd their persons, and if the attempt were made and succeeded not, they might be able to say, it was undertaken contrary to their judgment: And this is not sayd as my bare conjecture, but was very apparent; for Mons^r. d'Hocquincourt and his Officers propos'd to make a tentative, as they call'd it, or an offer, without pushing for the Saving of our honours, judging it impossible to effect the Enterprize. M. de la Ferté even after it was resolved on, a day or two before the attack, sent his Trumpett to Mons^r. de Turenne, hoping by the Relation he should give, to fright him from attempting it, which appear'd by the manner of his coming; for he came in to Mons^r. de Turenne's Tent as he sat at Supper with severall Officers, and told him, he was sent by his Master to give him an account of what he had seen in the Enemies Lines, he being newly come from thence, and adding, that he was bound in conscience to give him a true relation of it. He then told him, That they had made their Lines extraordinarily strong, having enlarged their ditch and rais'd their Line; that their out ditch was very difficult to pass, and that without it there were severall ranks of holes, with stakes betwixt every hole, and that their Lines were well furnish'd with Souldiers to defend them. Upon this Mons^r. de Turenne grew angry, and commanded him to be gone, telling him withall, That were it not for the respect he bore his Master, he would haue layd him by the heels for talking in that manner: For indeed this discourse being made in a publick place, might haue been of ill consequence to discourage all who heard it, had they not guessed he had been order'd by Mons^r. de la Ferté to give this tragicall account.

M. de Turenne's reasons against the proposall of making only a faint attempt.
OR: MEM:
P: 2: p. 81.

But Mons^r. de Turenne's judgment was too well settled, to give way of his artifices, So that in stead of suffering his own reason to be shaken by them, he made the falsness of their arguments appear. As for the tentative, he convinced those who upheld it, that they (were) under a manifest mistake, for in stead of saving their reputation it would haue a quite contrary effect; because by making a faint (feint) attempt, without pursuing it, every one would see they intended nothing more, so that they should haue the disrepute of Sacrifising two or three hundred men to no purpose: And then as to the probability of our succez in attacking the Line, he said, Wee should fall on with no less then fifteen battallions upon one front, that some of these would find none to oppose them or at worst only some scatter'd men; That those who found no form'd body to make resistance, would doubtless fix themselves on the Line where they fell on, and that consequently all the rest of our foot coming to that place, if they could not force their way where they attack'd, must by being masters of the fire, beat off the Enemy and make an entrance for the horse; That by attacking them in the night, one quarter durst not come to the assistance of the other, for that by reason of the false attacks, each fearing for himself, would not dare to forsake his Station, and help his Neighbour till break of day, and before that time wee should haue forced our passage through their Lines; That what he most apprehended was some disorder or accident in our march thether, for he was very confident, that were wee once ready drawn up, where wee intended our attack, wee should be able to force our way: And to strengthen these his reasons, the Court was absolutely for the attempt, so that infine it was resolv'd on, notwithstanding all the trickes and reluctance of those who oppos'd it.

he Shews a probability of Success according to the method propos'd to attack the Lines.
OR: MEM:
P: 2. p. 82.

The Court being absolutely for the attempt, it is at last resolv'd on.
Ibid. p: 83.

The time appointed was the Eve of S^t Lewis his day, being the night of the 24th of August; and thō none in the Army besides the three Generalls knew the certain time, yet the whole Army had orders to prepare for it, and to provide themselves of fascines and hurdles and all other necessities for such an undertaking; neither were they obliged only to make these

All the preparations made, and publick prayers order'd at the head of each Battalion and Squadron.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 83.

P A R T

II.

1654.

M.deTurenne instructs the Officers how to behave.
Ibid. p. 84.

preparations, but those which were full as necessary, which were publick prayers at the head of each Battalion and Squadron for severall days before, and as many as could, confessed, and received the blessed Sacrament: So that I am confident no Army ever show'd more markes of true deuotion then ours at that time. And now that the night for the attack drew near, Mons^r. de Turenne did on all occasions discourse with the Officers concerning the maniere of it, and what resistance wee were like to find, instructing them how to behave themselves according to the Severall occasions which might arise, and accidents which might happen: But above all things he recommended to them the care of keeping their Men in perfect order when they were once with in the Lines, and to be very cautious that they advanced not too fast, after they were gotten in; for then was the criticall time of care and discipline, there being more danger of being beaten out, then there was hazard in entring, for it was to be expected that all the forces of the other quarters would come powring in upon us: and that wee shou'd not think of going straight forward to the Town, but shou'd march along the Line and clear that before us, and beat the Enemy before wee thought of marching to our freinds. These kind of discourses he had every day with his Officers, as occasion was presented, in common talk, and more especially with the Generall Officers. And I am apt to beleeeve that from this manner of conversation, historians haue made speeches for many Generalls who never made any to their Armys when they were upon the point of giving battell; for such ordinary discourses as I haue mentioned, appear to me to be much more usefull then set formall speeches, which can not be heard but by very few, in an open field, where they are commonly feign'd by writers to haue been spoken: whereas by familiar conversation with Several Officers, the Generall do's not only instruct them much better, and at more leisure, but is ready at the same time to answer any of their objections, and to clear any doubt which may arise. I know not whither any of the two other Generalls did the same, but I am a witness that it was done by Monsieur de Turenne.

And now all things being fully prepar'd for the attack, all the men of quality at Court, who were of age to draw a sword, came from thence into our Army to have their share both of the honour and the danger of so great an undertaking. And some of them happening to dine with Mons^r. de Turenne, and myself, at the Marquess d'Humieres his tent, about two days before the attack, after dinner had a desire to see the Enemy's Lines. Mons^r. de Turenne therefore gott on horseback with all those who had din'd together, and went out of our Line towards one of our out horse-guards. Just as wee came out wee saw a small party of ours pursuing a party of the Enemies, which had fallen on our foragers, who were then returning to our Camp. Mons^r. de Turenne observing this, commanded us who were with him, to try if wee could get betwixt them and their Line, and cutt off their way, at the same time ordering the horse guards to second us. But thō wee were well hors'd, they got to their guard before wee could joine them, and upon our advancing up towards them, they drew into their Line, and left some few foot, which were making fascines in a little wood which was about half cannon shott from their Line, to our mercy ; and these wee made prisoners : And here Mons^r. de Turenne took this opportunity of Viewing that part of their Lines, which he had not seen before.

But he continu'd not long there, for they plyd us very hard with their cañon, and wee saw them getting in horse back as fast as they could, So that it was evident they would come out upon us, it being the P^{ce} of Condé's quarter : Therefore wee drew off and went towards a Castle call'd Neuville S. Vât which was not above a league distant, in which wee had foot,

P A R T
II.

1654.

All the men of quality at Court came to the Army to have a share in the action.
Or: MEM:
P. 2. p. 85.
M.deTurenne with the Duke and severall other persons of quality, get on horseback to view the Lines.
Or: MEM:
P. 2. p. 86.

The Duke with some others order'd to pursue a party of the Enemy. Ibid.

They pursue the party into their Lines and take some foot prisoners. Ibid.

P A R T
II.

1654.

and as wee were descending from the high ground on which wee were, wee saw about a league from us the Convoy of our foragers, consisting of twelve Squadrons of horse commanded by Mons^r. de l'Islebonne, a Lieu^t Gen^l, marching home to our Camp.

The Enemy's horse draw out and the P^{ce} of Condé himself at the head of them.
Ox: MEM:
P. 2. p. 87.
M. de Turenne orders M. de l'Islebonne to come up to him with all speed. Ibid.

At the same time Seeing the Enemy's horse beginning to draw out of their Lines, Mons^r. de Turenne alter'd his course a litle, and march'd towards Mons^r. de l'Islebonne, sending before and ordering him to come up to us with all speed: Having hopes that in case the Enemy should follow us, wee should be able to do somewhat on them. By this time our number was increased, so that besides the Squadron of guards, which was with us, wee were about sixty or seventy officers and volunteers: But they Enemy follow'd us no further then the top of the hill which was within cañon shott of their Lines, and thether came the P^{ce} of Condé himself with about fourteen Squadrons of horse. When Mons^r. de Turenne saw they follow'd us no farther, he sent word again to Mons^r. l'Islebonne that he should continue on his march to our Camp; and sent back the Squadron of the guards to their post, himself going with the Officers towards the Castle I haue already mention'd.

The Enemy not pursuing, he countermands M. de l'Islebonne. Ibid.

But he had not gone farr, when some few scatter'd men came from the heighth, where the P^{ce} of Condé was in person, and endeavour'd to gain the top of another rising ground up which wee were marching, to discover what strength there was behind us; which being observ'd by Mons^r. de Turenne, he was not willing they should get above us, and by that means discern that wee had none to second us, and for that reason commanded out half a score volunteers to hinder their design; of which number were M^r. Jermyn, Mr. Charles Berkley, Briscara, Trigomar, and others, whose names I do not now remember. At the same time wee drew up in a body upon the top of the hill, and faced towards the Enemy : But our young Volonteers were not Satisfied with performing only what was order'd them, but followed these loose men farther then in reason they ought to haue done, that is, even to (the) bottome, which was betwixt us and the Enemys bodys of horse ; which the P^{ce} of Condé seeing, commanded one of his Squadrons of horse, namely the Regiment d'Estrées with the Duke of Wirtemberg at their head, to come down at full speed upon our young men, and endeavour to cutt off the way of their return. This obliged Mons^r. de Turenne to order us with our small body to meet and charge them, thereby, to disengage our friends ; And then again he sent for Mons^r. de l'Islebonne and the Squadron of guards to Second us.

It was all wee could do to save our Volonteers, but in preserving them wee ingaged ourselves by charging the Duke of Wirtemberg, and thoug our body was not neer so strong as his, wee routed him, and pursued him down into a litle meadow, which lay in the bottom ; from thence wee follow'd him up a litle balk, where his men turn'd upon us, and gave us a volley of their Carabins, which gave a litle Stop to us by their knocking down severall of our men and horses. This being observed by the Enemy renew'd their courage, and they charg'd down upon us the Second time with so much vigour, that they forced us back, press'd upon us, and made us begin to turn our backs. But at the same time the Squadron of guards, who as they were going to their post had seen the beginning of the skirmish, came into our releif, and just as they came up to us, myself and Mons^r. de Joyeuse turn'd and put ourselves at their head, leading them up to charge the Enemy in the flanck : but at the instand when wee were puting this in execution, the whole Squadron ran and left us two ingaged, non staying with us but two or three of our Servants.

P A R T II.

1654.
Some Volonteers of M. de Turenne's, pursuing farther then they ought, are in danger to be cutt off.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 88.

The Duke and others order'd to charge the Enemy and disengage the Volonteers.
Ibid.

Tho fewer in number they charge y^e Duke of Wirtemberg and route him, but are afterwards forced back. Ibid.

The Duke and M. de Joyeuse put themselves at the head of a Squadron of the guards, and lead them to charge, but the whole Squadron running, leave them expos'd to the Enemy with 2 or 3 Servants only.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 89.

P A R T

II.

1654.

The Duke and
M. de Joyeuse endeavouring to Save M. d'Arcy, escape themselves with much ado.
On: MEM:
P. 2: p. 89.

M. de Joyeuse receives here a shott, of which he dyd afterwards.
Ibid.

Almost at the same point of time Mons^r. d' Arcy a gentleman of quality had his horse kill'd under him, and wee endeavour'd to get him off; I call'd to him to get off, but he seeing a loose horse which had lost his rider, would needs catch him, and stayd so long in endeavouring it, that though I and Mons^r. de Joyeuse did all wee could to lay hold of him and gett him off, wee were not able to performe it: and indeed wee endeavour'd it So long, and ingaged ourselves so far, that wee were both in danger of being taken, and had much ado to escape ourselves. As for Mons^r. de Joyeuse he had the misfortune to receive a shott through the Arme, of which afterwards he dy'd, but I got off without any harme. M^r. Jermyn was like to haue been taken in endeavouring to save one Beauregard, whose horse being also kill'd, he help'd him up behind him, but the horse would not carry double, and bounding threw him off; Ther-upon Jermyn advis'd him to lay hold on his stirrup, by which means he brought him a litle way from the Enemy, till at length being press'd by them, he was forced to quit him, and then Beauregard was made prisoner. M^r. Berkley help'd to get off Mons^r. de Castelneau, whose horse was shott in five places, so that he was hardly able to bear him from the Enemy; which Berkley seeing, dismounted, and lent the other his own horse, after which he gott upon another on which (one of) Mons^r. de Castelneau's pages was mounted, and with much difficulty escaped.

The Enemy had the chase of us for almost a mile, and had pursued us farther, had not Mons^r. de l'Islebonne with his twelve Squadrons come to our relief; but seeing him they retir'd time enough for their own safety, without being oblidg'd to run for it. Besides d'Arcy and Beauregard, there were some others taken, and almost all the pages who were there with their Master's cloakes. Very few were kill'd and not many hurt;

yet it vex'd Mons^r. de Turenne to haue received that litle affront in person, and made him desirous to haue some kind of revenge, and he hop'd to haue had it that very night ; for having receiv'd intelligence that the Enemy were accusom'd to come out of their Lines and forage in the night, he resolved to fall upon them.

And to that purpose so soon as it was dark, he march'd out of his Camp in person with all his horse then in his Camp with him, which were about fourty Squadrons, and took along with him three or four Lieut Generalls, amongst whom he divided them, himself marching at the head of all : But whither the intelligence were false, or that they, having notice of our design, were gone off before wee could reach the place where wee were inform'd they us'd to forage when wee came thether wee found no body ; so that having miss'd of our expectations, Mons^r. de Turenne made the Van of that which was the Rear, and march'd back, as he thought, towards his Camp. The night happen'd to be exceeding dark, and our guides mistaking their way, in stead of leading us to our Camp brought us to the Lines of the Enemy.

It was the Prince of Condé's quarter which they mistook for ours ; and upon the Centry's asking who went there? they were answer'd Turenne ; he repeated the question, and demanded farther if it was not Lorraine they meant? but they answer'd again that it was Turenne, upon which he fir'd at them ; Then some of our men who continued still in their error, cryd out to him not to fire, for M^r. de Turenne was there in person : This obliged the Enemy to fire some few small shott at us, and one great gun, which absolutely undeceived us, but withall put us into the greatest disorder imaginable, causing such a panique fear in our common men, that I am confident, if that moment fourty horse had come out upon us, wee had been defeated. The cheif, or rather the only cause of the first

M.deTurenne marches out in the night time with 40 Squadrons, thinking to surprise y^e Enemy's foragers ; the Duke with him.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 90.

The Guides mistaking the way, M. de Turenne in stead of being led back to his own Camp, is brought to the Enemy's Lines.
Ibid.

The Army is in great disorder by this mistake.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 91.

P A R T
II.

1654.

The Duke hereby expos'd to bring off – the Reer, tho it was not his turn. Ibid.

All things provided for the attack of the Lines.

The Quarter to be attack'd resolv'd upon.
Or: MEM:
P. 2: p. 93.

The time appointed the 25th August Eve of S^t
Lewis' day.
Ibid.
Order of y^e march. Ibid.

disorder was the darkness of the night, our Squadrons being thereby obliged to march so close to one another, for fear of loosing the File, that upon the sudden stop which was made by the first Squadron when the Centry fir'd, those behind came shouldring one upon another and broke their order; But upon their firing afterwards from the Line, the foremost giving a litle back and altering their course immediatly to wheel about towards their own Camp, the confusion was so great, that of ten Squadrons which ought to haue been behind mine, there was not one at our marching back, So that I happen'd to haue the Reer in coming off; but the hurry was soon over, for wee all gott safe into our Lines, as also those Squadrons which had lost their way.

This happen'd, as I said, about a day or two before wee attack'd the Lines, And now our fascines and hurdles and other necessarys for such an attempt, being fully provided, our Generalls resolv'd to attack the quarter of Don Fernando Solis with their whole forces, as being the weakest in all respects, and farthest distant from the Prince of Condé: This quarter began on the north side of the River above the Town, and joyn'd to that of the Count of Fuensaldagne. To favour this undertaking, three false attacks were order'd to be made on the other parts of the Line; the time appointed, an houre before day on the 25th of August.

In performance of this resolution, Mons^r. de Turenne and Mons^r. de la Ferté with their two Armys began with the Van of their troopes to pass over the Scarpe out of Mons^r. de la Ferté's quarters, about Sun sett. It was Mons^r. de Turenne's turn that day to lead, and they had a great march to come to the place appointed for the attack; but it was so well order'd that there happen'd no confusion in the way, there being very many bridges over the Scarpe made, and such care taken, that no ill accident arrived to them in their march. Every man knew his own business. The first line of the foot pass'd over the bridge, which was on the left hand of all the others, and nearest to the Enemies Line. On the next bridge to that on the right hand of them, the horse pass'd over which were to second them. On the third, the Reserve of horse and foot : On the next to it, the Train of Artillery, with all that belong to it ; so that with only facing to the left wee were in battalia, and in a readiness to falle on ; every battalion having their Pioneers, and commanded men, ready at the head of them, and each Trooper carrying two fascines a horseback before him, to deliver to the Foot when they should haue occasion for them. As for our baggage it was order'd to be in a readiness, but not to stirr out of the Camp till it was broad day-light, because no guard was left with it ; but afterwards to come to us as they could.

This was the order of our march, which was perform'd with such conduct and exactness, that wee came just at the houre appointed, to the place where wee were to meet M. d'Hocquincourt with his troopes. In all this way wee halted but once, and that but for a very litle time, without hauing given the least allarme to the Enemy in the march ; though for the greatest part of the way, had not our musketeers observ'd their orders very carefully in hiding their matches, the Enemy from their Lines must needs haue discover'd them. I remember that once that night, out of curiosity to see how they observ'd their orders, I went without our Foot at a litle distance from them, and could not so much as perceive one lighted match.

And here it will not be amiss to mention our order of battell, and how our Generall Officers were disposed, but I shall only be very particular in those who belong'd to Mons^r. de Turenne: He divided his eight Lieu^t Generalls equally betwixt the horse and foot, four to each. To the first Line of foot compos'd of five battalions he appointed three, The Count de Broglio great care in hiding their matches.

The Soldiers'
OR: MEM.
P. 2. p. 94.

Order of Battell with the Severall posts of the Gen^l Officers.
OR: MEM.
P. 2. p. 94.

P A R T
II.

1654.

The Duke's post at the head of the left wing of M. de Turenne's
horse.
Ibid. p. 95.

commanded Picardy and the Suisse which were the two right hand battalions ; Mons^r. de Castelnau those of Plessis and Turenne which were on the left hand, and M. du Passage that of la Feuillade which was in the midst. To command the horse which seconded these, consisting of about twenty-four Squadrons, he appointed also three : M^r. de Barr had the charge of those on the right hand behind M^r. de Broglio, Myself on the left hand behind Mons^r. de Castelnau, and Mons^r. d'Eclinvillers in the midst. The reserve of foot consisting of three battalions was commanded by Mons^r. de Roncherolles, and that of horse by Mons^r. de l'Islebonne who had under him eight Squadrons : This was Mons^r. de Turenne's order of battell for that occasion.

M. de la Ferté draws up on the left hand of M^r. de Turenne, and M^r. d'Hocquincourt on his right.
Ibid.

Monsieur de la Ferté who drew up on his left hand, had one only line of foot consisting of six battalions, two lines of horse behind them, and a reserve of horse ; Mons^r. d'Hocquincourt who was placed on the right hand, had first four battalions of foot, then a line of horse, and behind them a second line of foot of four battalions more, with some horse on their wings, and a small reserve of horse not exceeding three or four Squadrons. Wee also had three false attacks ; the first, of Mons^r. de Turenne's troopes compos'd of two battalions of foot, being York and Dillon, and six Squadrons of horse, all commanded by Mons^r. de Tracy who had orders to get as neer as he cou'd without being discover'd to the Prince of Condé's quarters ; but not to fall on, till he heard the attack begun on the other side by us, and then to march directly to the Barrier of that quarter which he had been shewn some days before, and through it to endeavour to force his passage into the Town. The false attack from Mons^r. de la Ferté's troopes was commanded by M^r. de la Guillottiere, who was to fall upon the Count de Fuensaldagne's quarter with two battalions, six Squadrons, two troopes of Dragoons, and two great guns. The false attack of

Three false attacks.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 95.

Monsieur d'Hocquincourt was not considerable, being only of four Squadrons, and some ropes with matches ty'd to them, commanded by M^r. de S^t Jean, who was to make his on Prince Francis of Lorraine's quarter. These were the orders of the Severall Armies for the attack of the whole Line.

P A R T
II.

1654.

And now Mons^r. de Turenne being come to the place appointed, found M^r. d'Hocquincourt already there in person, but without his troopes which were not yet come up, thō they had but a very litle march to make. Hocquincourt said, his men were just coming, and would immediatly be upon the place, till which time he desir'd the attack might be deferred. But Mons^r. de Turenne answer'd, That he could not possibly delay it, being now so neer the Line, that the Enemy would soon discover him, that therefore he desir'd him to make what hast he could to fall on after him: And his own troopes being by this time in order, he led them on himself (on) horseback to attack the Line.

M.deTurenne leads on his troopes to attack the Line without waiting for M^r. d'Hocquincourt's men that were not come up.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 96.

Wee had in our march thether a very still faire night, besides the benefit of the moon, which sett as favorably for us as wee could desire, that is, just as wee came to the place appointed. As the moon went down, it began to blow very fresh and grew exceeding dark, in so much that the Enemy could neither see nor hear us, as otherwise they might; and they were the more surprised when the first news they had of us, was to find us within half cañon shott of them. I remember not to haue seen a finer sight of the nature, then was that of our foot when they were once in battell, and began to march towards the Lines; for then discovering at once their lighted matches, they made a glorious shew, which appear'd the more by reason of the wind, which kindled them and made them blaze throw the darkness of the night; for the breeze keeping the coal of their matches very clear, whensoever any of the Musketeers (happened) to shog

In approaching the Lines the Soldiers lighted their matches; discover'd all at once, make a glorious shew, the night being very dark and windy.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 97.

P A R T
II.

1654.

M. de Turenne's foot fall on, the horse keeping close to their rear oblige the men to do their duty.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 97.

They master that part of the Line which they attack'd.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 98.
The horse march up to the holes before the Lines, and there throw down their fascines and wheel off again till passage was made.
Ibid.

It is whisper'd to the Duke that M. de Turenne was hurt, and that matters went ill on the right hand.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 98.
The great conduct and courage of his Highness on this occasion.
Ibid.

against each other, the matches struck fire, so that the sparkles were carryd about by the wind to increase the light.

Wee were no sooner discover'd by the Enemy then they fir'd three cannon at us, and either made fires or sett up lights along the Line: Our foot then lost no time in falling on; but had not the vigour of the Officers who led them, and the horse by keeping so close to their rear, obliged the common men to do their duty, they had not perform'd it as they ought, nor as I allways till that time had observ'd them to do, for I never knew them to go on so unwillingly as then; which notwithstanding, they stopt not till they came to the Line it self, where the resistance they found was not So great as they suspected; for in a very litle time all our five battalions made themselves masters of that part of it which they attacked; and then they who were appointed for that worke, began to make passages for the horse to enter, and every Squadron of horse went up to the very holes which I haue mention'd and then threw down their fascines, which the foot immediatly took up and help'd to fill up both the ditches. This being perform'd the horse wheel'd off, and drew up about thirty yards behind, expecting till passage should be made for them.

While this was doing, one came to the left hand of the attack where I was at the head of the horse, and whisper'd to me that M. de Turenne was hurt, and that matters went no well on the right hand: Upon which intelligence to incourage the foot, and to let them understand how near wee were to them, I commanded the kettle drums to beat, and the trumpets of the Squadron of horse at the head of which I was to sound, which being heard by all our other horse, they did the like. This incouraged our foot sufficiently, but was of some prejudice to my own Squadron, and to that which was next it, for from a Redan on my left hand, the Enemy by the beat of the kettle drums and sound of the trumpetts found where wee were, and plyd us with their shott. The Kettle drum was soon silenced, he being the first man who was kill'd of that Squadron where I was.

P A R T
II.

1654.
The Duke's Squadron much expos'd and his kettle drum kill'd hard by him.

Ibid. p. 99.

M. de la Ferté begins, his men are beaten off.

Ibid.

they shelter themselves amongst the horse commanded by the Duke, and do therby considerably augment the danger that Squadron was expos'd to.

Ibid.

This happen'd just as Mons^r. de la Ferté was beginning his attack, he having not put his men so soon in order as M^r. de Turenne had : But he either had not so good fortune, or found more resistance then our foot ; for thō his Officers led up their men with good resolution into the very ditch, yet they were not able to master the Line, but were beaten off, and came running away to shelter themselves amongst the horse which I commanded. The disorder was very great, the Officers complaining aloud, that they had been abandon'd by their Soldiers, and the Soldiers crying out, that they had follow'd their Officers, who had not behav'd themselves as became them : which part had justice on their side I know not, but beaten off they were, and the horse far'd the worse for their ill success ; for the Enemy seeing their lighted matches, plac'd their small shott amongst us with much more certainty then they could before.

By this time the* Foot of our attack had made passages for our horse to enter, and Mons^r. de Turenne's Regiment of Foot had found a Barriere which they open'd, and therby sav'd themselves the farther trouble of making a passage : Upon notice of which, Mons^r. de Turenne order'd M^r. d' Eclinvillers to enter the first with four Squadrons of horse, and to be seconded by me ; accordingly he enter'd the Lines with his three first Squadrons, but as the fourth was going in, they who had beaten off la Fertés Foot came along the Line to this Barriere, and finding only this Squadron of horse entring there, (the foot which had first master'd this Barriere having drawn

M.d'Eclinvillers is order'd to enter the first with 4 Squadrons of horse and the Duke to seconde him.
OR: MEM;
P. 2. p. 99.

* In the Cardinal de Bouillon's abridged Narrative, the King used the expression, Cependant l'Infanterie de l'attaque. — EDITOR.

P A R T
II.

1654.

Eclinvillers'
4 Squadrons beat off and the Barriere shutt upon them.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 100.

The Duke
being repuls'd here, seeks an other passage where he enters at the head of Turenne's Regiment.
Ibid.

The third Squadron which follow'd
the Duke, defeat a Regt of the Enemy and take the Commander prisoner.
Ibid. p. 101.

The Duke advancing still, comes to y^e countervallation. Ibid.

off from thence, and advanced farther within the Line somewhat more on the right hand, as not thinking it necessary for them to stay and maintain that post when once the horse was enterd) powr'd into them a volly of small-shott, and threw severall hand granados in amongst them; with which the Collonel who commanded that Squadron, one Bodervitz a German, being shott from his horse thō not slaine, and his Major also much wounded, they were beaten off and the Enemy shutt that Barriere upon us.

Seeing therfore I could not enter there, I went along the Line on the right hand till I found another passage, by which I enter'd at the head of M^r. de Turenne's own Regiment of horse, which on that occasion made but two Squadrons; and finding the Enemys huts on fire, which prov'd of great advantage to us (and As I heard afterwards was first thought upon by one Bout-de-bois Lieu^t. Coll^l. to la Feuillade) I advanced farther to see if any of the Enemy were yet drawn up behind them, and notwithstanding that some of their horse were still continuing there, it was so dark, that with the two first Squadrons I pass'd betwixt them without either seeing them, or being discover'd by them; But the third, which was the Regiment d'Espence (de Beauveau) lighted on them, beat them, and took the Marquis de Conflans prisoner, who commanded the Regiment w^{ch} they defeated. By this time the day began to break, and I still advancing, came to the Counter-vallation, where finding no passage in it —*; yet I found none, till I came to the River above the Town which divided the

* Here is another omission, which may be supplied from the Narrative sent to the Cardinal de Bouillon: — “Où ne trouvant point de passage vers la ville, il la cotoya, l'ayant toujours à sa gauche, et n'en rencontra point qu'en arrivant à la riviere au-dessus de la ville que séparoit le quartier de Lorraine de celui de Fernand Solis,” &c. — EDITOR.

Lorraine quarter from that of Don Fernando de Solis. And seeing that none of ours had yet pass'd over into the Lorraine quarter, I alter'd my resolution and thought it proper for me to go over the bridges into it.

This I undertook with the Reg^t. of Turenne only, which made but two Squadrons, the rest of the horse which should have follow'd me having lost their way, and advanced as far as Prince Francis of Lorraine's Tent without finding any opposition. But being there, I saw four or five Squadrons of the Enemy drawn up, about the distance of muskett-shott from me upon another little heighth. Whereupon I thought it best to halt a little, till more horse came up to me, and drew up both my Squadrons upon one front, which just fill'd up the distance betwixt the Line and the Tents; after which I sent away three or four persons severally to bring the horse I wanted. While I was there expecting them, the Duke of Buckingham came up to me, and ask'd me, Why I would not pursue the Victory, and charge those horse which were before me? To which I answer, That I had no mind to receive an affront, and expose my self to a certain defeat, what I saw of the Enemy already being twice our number, besides what part of them might be behind the heighth on which they were; That should wee advance and be beaten, the Enemy might make himself master of the bridges which wee had pass'd, and break them down, by which means they wou'd both save themselves and the baggage of that quarter; That if they came up and charg'd me where I then was, I should at least ingage them on equall termes, because they could not outflanck me, besides which I had here the advantage of the ground; In short, that I expected more horse every moment, which being come I would then go and charge them. Thus resolved I continued there, and would not give way to his importunitys.

The Enemy and wee stood looking on each other for some

P A R T
II.

1654.

Finding no passage in the countervallation, he enters into the Lorraine quarter wth two Squadrons only, the rest having lost their way.

OR: MEM:

P. 2. p. 101.

He draws up within muskett shott of 4 or 5 Squadrons of the Enemy, and halting sends for more horse. Ibid.

The D. of Buckingham's imprudent proposall of charging the Enemy, with his R. H. reasons for rejecting it. Ibid.

P A R T
II.

1654.

The horsemen quitt their ranks in spite of y^e Officers and fall to plunder P^{er} of Lorraine's Tent.

OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 103.

Non left with the Duke but Officers and the 12
Cornetts.

Ibid.

Y^e Duke is forced to ride back himself to fetch more horse.

OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 103.

He brings up the Squadron of Villequier, which he had hardly drawn up in order when they ran and left him.

Ibid.

The Duke intending to return again with 4 Squadrons into the Lorraine quarter, is prevented by d'Hocquin-court. Ibid.

time, no horse coming to me ; but, in mean time, some scatter'd men of ours fell to plunder Prince Francis his Tent, where besides his plate, there was a month's pay for his Army in ready mony, which had like to haue occasion'd our paying dear for it; for our horsemen hearing the noise which those plunderers made in taking it, in spight of their Officer's commands and threatnings, quitted their ranks one after another, and fell to ransack the Tent for their share of the booty ; so that at last there were none left with me but Officers, and the twelve Cornetts ; which being in full sight of the Enemy, I expected every moment to be charg'd and beaten : Being in this perplexity and hearing no news of those severall persons whom I had sent for horse, I thought it expedient to go myself and fetch them, and recommending to Mons^r. de Montaulieu the Lieut Coll^l to make good that heighth till my return, I rode back, and found the Second Squadron of Villequier on the other side of the bridge going towards the Town, which I stop'd, and putting myself at their head, march'd over again : But scarce had the rear of the Squadron past the bridge, and the head being gott off from a small causway begun to draw up into order again, when those horse which I had left to face the Enemy came running down the hill upon me in great disorder ; At this the Squadron which I brought with me took such a fright, that they also ran and left me, it being impossible to stop them. Whereupon I repass'd the bridge, having seen four Squadrons on the other side of it, intending with them to come over again into the Lorraine quarter : But before I could bring them to the bridge, the Mareshall d'Hocquincourt with all his horse, and severall Squadrons of the other two Armies were come thether, and began to pass.

Seeing this, I thought there were horse enough that way, and so in stead of following them, I march'd directly the other way, betwixt the Countervallation and the Town, towards the Count the Count de Fuensaldagne's quarter with my four Squadrons, two of which were Gendarmes commanded by Mons^r. de Schomberg, the other two the Regiment de Gesvres, under Mons^r. de Querneux. Being come with these upon a heighth from whence I could take a large view of all about me, I saw upon another heighth before me, betwixt the two Lines, severall Squadrons of horse drawn up facing towards the place wee enter'd. At first thought they were the Enemy; but seeing one of the Squadrons in red coats, I alter'd my opinion, and beleev'd them to be our horse, taking that particular Squadron to be either the King's Chevaux-Legers, or his Gendarmes, their coats being of that coulour: Upon which conjecture I marched towards them to joyn my Body to theirs, because by observing their posture I knew they were facing an Enemy; but what that Enemy was I could not discern, a higher ground being interpos'd on my left hand which hinder'd my sight.

But by that time I was gott to the bottom of the hill and was beginning to march up, an Officer came to me from Mons^r. de Turenne, with orders to come immediatly to him, and told me, that those whom I had taken for friends were enemys, and that Mons^r. de Turenne was on the heighth over against them, who was in great want of troopes: Being thus inform'd I march'd back to joyn him, and came very opportunely with my four Squadrons, he having at that time about him only three Squadrons, and one Battalion which was rather for shew then of any use, it being compos'd of men and Officers rallyd together, who had been broken either by the Enemy, or by plundering.

And here it will be proper to give an account how Mons^r. de Turenne came thether, and how he happen'd to be in the posture in which I found him. The Reader is then to understand, that Mons^r. de la Ferté being repuls'd at his own attack, enter'd the Line where wee had gone in before him: Being once there, he was desirous of doing something extraordinary; and putting

P A R T
II.

1654.

M.deTurenne sends for the Duke to come immediatly to him.

OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 104.

The Duke comes very opportunely to M. de Turenne's Succour, who was in great want of troopes.

OR: MEM.
P. 2. p. 105.

P A R T

II.

1654.

M. de Turenne's great foresight and conduct.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p: 106.

M. de la Ferté is beaten as
M^r. de Turenne had foretold.
Ibid.

The Duke draws up his Squadrons within the two Lines on the left hand of M. de Turenne's.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 107.

himself at the head of ten or twelve Squadrons of horse, some of which were his own and some belonging to M^r. de Turenne, it being now brode day light, he advanced along betwixt the two Lines towards the Count de Fuensaldagne's quarter; and at the same time, some of the Foot of both their Armies advanced also, amongst whom was the Battalion of the French Guards belonging to M. de la Ferté's Army, but these last came up in a disorderly manner along the line of Countervallation. Some horse of the Enemy were drawn up, and yet standing on a heighth: These being seen by Mons^r. de la Ferté, he march'd down the hill where he then was to charge them. But just before he ingag'd them, Monsieur de Turenne came up to the place from whence la Ferté was newly gone, and was much troubled to see him go on in that manner; he would willingly haue stopt him, but he came too late: so that all he could do was to stay two Squadrons which were following him, to draw them up upon the heighth, and to rally the battalion I haue already mention'd; telling those that were about him, That he fear'd they should presently see la Ferté rowted; after which he himself should be hard put to it, to maintain that hill on which he was. As he said, so it happen'd, for M. de la Ferté was sufficiently beaten; and at the same time when they charg'd him, they sent some horse to fall upon our foot which were without the Countervallation, and cutt most of them in pieces, taking, as I remember, severall Officers of the Guards, but not offering to follow their advantage, or to advance up the hill where M^r. de Turenne was drawn up; but, in stead of doing so, withdrew to the heighth from whence they came when they charg'd Mons^r. de la Ferté.

In this posture I found affaires when I joyn'd M^r. de Turenne, who immediatly commanded me to draw within the two Lines, and draw up my Squadrons on the left hand of those who were already there: He then inform'd me of what had happen'd there, and that he apprehended, if the Enemy could gett together any foot, they would advance upon us and give us work enough to defend ourselves, there being no relying on those whom wee had there with us. After this, he enquired of me where I had been, and what was become of his Regiment of horse, and I gave him an account of all that had happen'd to me, and others, where I had been.

P A R T
II.

1654.
The Duke and
M. deTurenne give account to each other of what had happen'd
them. Ibid.

By this time some of our cañon, I think seaven, were got into the Line, and came to us, to our great Satisfaction, with some few other Squadrons of horse; and our cañon began to play upon the Enemys horse, doing great execution amongst them. But notwithstanding this, Mons^r. de Turenne was not without some apprehensions of what might happen, as doubting that the Enemy might advance upon us with foot; for seeing how ill our horse maintain'd their order, and that almost all our four (foot) were in confusion by their plundering, so that no body of our men was left in order, but that which was about himself, it was with no small reason that he fear'd some ill revolution in our success, in case he should be worsted where he was: But he continued not long in this apprehension, after our great guns began to play; for whether it was that they made the Enemies post too hott for them, or that for other reason they thought it not expedient for them to stay any longer there, about half an hour after the first gun was fir'd against them, they began to draw off. Once wee perceived some of their foot appearing, but immediatly they drew out of sight again; and this happen'd some what before their horse drew off.

The Cañon
having begun to play, the Enemy drew off.
O^r: MEM:
P. 2. p. 106.

I haue since been informed by some who were then with the Prince of Condé (for it was he who was there and perform'd all that was considerable on the Enemys side) That he intended, if he could haue got two battalions of foot up to him, to haue come and charg'd as M. de Turenne beleev'd he would; and that once he had gather'd that number, which were those whom

The P^r of Condé was at the head of this party of the Enemy that had beaten M. de la Ferté, and 'twas he that did all that was considerable in that side.
Ibid. p: 108.

P A R T
II.

1654.

Condé and Turenne, these two great men, without being advertis'd of each others being there, find it out on both sides by their mutuall conduct.
Ibid.

wee saw appear, yet so soon as they came within reach of our cannon, they wou'd not be perswaded to advance one foot farther, but shog'd off.

And here 'tis admirable to consider, that these two great men, without being any other way advertis'd of each others being there, yet found it out on both sides by their mutuall conduct; Mons^r. de Turenne positively affirming that the P^{ce} of Condé was on the other hill, and that otherwise he would haue press'd those troopes more then now he would adventure to do; and the Prince of Condé saying the like of Mons^r. de Turenne, adding farther, That if any one besides him had been there, he would certainly haue charg'd him.

This very consideration made Mons^r. de Turenne, when the Prince drew off, not to follow him or endeavour to press upon his Rear; being satisfied with what already was perform'd, and unwilling to trust fortune with any thing farther, when the main of his design was already accomplish'd.

M. de Bellefonds pressing on the P^{ce} of Condé's rear as he retir'd, is beaten.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 109.

The Prince rallies his men and marches to Cambray, and the Archduke and the Count Fuensaldagne retire to Douay.
Ibid.

Account of what was done by M^r. d'Hocquincourt.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 109.

But Mons^r. de Bellefonds, with some of the horse belonging to the Town, was not so cautious; for endeavouring to do somewhat on the Prince's Rear as he passed the River into the Archduke's quarter, he was received so warmly that he was beaten off with loss: After which the Prince went over at his ease, for the rest of our troopes took warning by the success of their fellows, and ventur'd not again to charge him; and when he had pass'd through our old Camp, he began to rally his scatter'd men beyond the brook, and march'd away for Cambray. As for the Archduke (and) the Count de Fuensaldagne, they went to Douay with not above a Squadron or two in their company, and pass'd through our baggage, where the Archduke was known by some of Mons^r. de Turenne's Servants; and had one Squadron of our horse been there, they might probably haue taken him.

Tis now reasonable I should give some account of what was done by M^r. d'Hocquincourt. I haue already mention'd in the beginning of this Relation, that, when Mons^r. de Turenne fell on, he was not in a rediness with his troopes, and as I haue been since informed by some of his Officers, it was break of day before he began his attack. He storm'd the Line on the right hand of the place where wee enter'd, and found litle or no resistance; So that the greatest Imployment of his foot was to make a passage for his horse, at the head of which enter'd the Marshall himself, and came directly to the bridge, over which he pass'd into the Lorraine quarter, after I had been there and was gone out of it. And along with him went most of the horse belonging to the other two Armys. He met no opposition till he came to the brook which divided the Lorraine from the P^{ce} of Condés quarter, where he found M^r. de Marsin drawn up on the other side with severall Squadrons of horse, which stopt him there a considerable time; the Army having some few foot, or some Troopers with their Carabins who maintain'd that passage so long, that most of the foot in that quarter had leisure to get off: and when some of our horse coming out of the Town upon him, oblig'd him to draw off, he made his retreat in so orderly a manner, that he march'd out of the Line without being broken, making use of his foot or Troopers who stood in stead of them, as he had done formerly at the brook: For as he drew out of the Line he placed them behind it, from whence they fir'd upon our horse, who not being so well order'd nor led on as they ought to haue been, were kept at a distance by the fire they made; so that under their favour M^r. de Marsin gott out of the Line, and So march'd'off in excellent order, till he joyn'd the Prince of Condé at the same time when he was rallying his men as I haue related.

Much about this time, when Mons^r. de Marsin was making his retreat out of the Line, M^r. de Mondejeu Governour of Arras being come out of the Town, some (of) the old horse

P A R T

II.

1654.

He storms the Line with litle or no resistance.

Ibid.

Passes after the Duke into the Lorraine quarter.

Ibid.

M. de Marsin maintains the passage of a brook against him for a long time and then retreats in good order.

Ibid. p. 110.

P A R T
II.

1654.
M. de Mondejeu is desir'd by some Officers to put Mr. d'Hocquincourt's men in better order then they were.
His generous answer.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 110.

Officers seeing him, desir'd he would put them into better order, because neither M. d'Hocquincourt nor any of the Generall Officers there present, had perform'd that part of their duty as they ought: But he absolutely refused it, saying, he came only there as a Volunteer, and thought it very unreasonable for him to pretend to share in any part of the honour of that day with them; that the ordering of their men belong wholly to them: and as for himself, that he had gain'd sufficient reputation in the defence he had made, and was now come out with no other intention then to serue those who had so bravely releev'd him.

Account of the false attacks and what happen'd.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 110.

It remains now that I relate what happen'd in our false attacks. As for those of M. de la Ferté, and M. d'Hocquincourt, they follow'd their orders punctually, and no considerable accident befell them, but that the first had the best part of the plunder belonging to the Count of Fuensaldagnes quarter, which was the place appointed them for their false attack: But Mons'. de Turenne's had not so good fortune, M. de Tracy who commanded them, and who follow'd also very punctually his orders, having had a much different adventure: For being commanded to march without the least noise into a bottom which was within canon-shott of the Enemies line, and there to ly closs, without falling on, till some time after wee had begun our attack, which wee supposd that of necessity he must haue heard, it happend quite otherwise; because the wind proving contrary, and with all blowing fresh when wee began to storne the Line, he heard nothing of it. At last the day breaking, and no noise coming to him, he and all his men were verily perswaded that some accident had hinder'd our attack: however he resolv'd to stay in his post somewhat longer, and there he continued till he saw some horse coming out of the Line, which he conjectur'd to be such as were sent abroad to make discoverys; and presently after them a Squadron or two which he took to be the horse-guard coming to their accustom'd post, but seeing more still coming out, he concluded it was to fall on him as having discover'd where he lay. Vpon which he orderd his two Battalions of foot, to Save themselves by marching to the Castle of Neufville vitas, which was close by them; and himself with the horse took their way towards Bapaume. He had march'd a good part of his way thether, before he was sensible of his mistake, but the foot whom he left at the Castle were sooner undeceived, for most of the Lorraine horse and many out of the P^{ce} of Conde's quarter drew off that way, it being their nearest passage to Cambray; which our foot seeing, they commanded out the Aide-Majors of each Regim^t with fifty men apeece, to skirmish with them as they past by. This they perform'd, but at length they advanc'd so far, that some of the Enemies horse gott in amongst them, and kill'd every man of that party.

I will not take upon me to give an exact account of what numbers were slain on either side in this memorable action; But by what I saw myself of the bodies lying on the place, as well freinds as foes, I could not guesse them to be above four hundred. Wee had never a Generall Officer amongst that number, and I remember but one Collonell, M. de Puymarais, Coll^t of horse, a brave young gentleman, Son to Mons^r. de Barr, one of our Lieu^t Gen^{ls}, but very few Captains. It fell so heavy upon none as upon that Squadron of Eclinvilliers who had behav'd themselves so ill a day or two before, where Mons^r. de la Ferté led up to charge when he was beaten: They were it seemes desirous to recover the reputation they had lost, and therefore charg'd so home, that the rest giving ground sooner then they, they were worse beaten, and I was inform'd most of their Officers kill'd upon the place.

The number of our wounded men was not considerable: Mons^r. de Turenne had a bruise, besides a shott upon his armes,

Account of the Slain.
OR. MEM.
P. 2: p. 113.

And wounded.
OR. MEM.
P. 2: p. 113.

P A R T

II.

1654.

and his horse shott under him. Mons^r. de la Ferté had his horse kill'd. But of all our Gen^l Officers I remember not any hurt, excepting the Count de Broglio who was shott through the thigh; and of inferiour Officers the number was not great. The Volonteers all escap'd well, excepting those who were with M^r. d'Humieres, who received so home a charge from one of the Enemies Squadrons, that the Marquis de Breuauté et la Clotte, two of them, were so desperatly wounded that they dyd afterwards. Biscara and others of them were much hurt, as also the Cheualier de S^t Gé and severall Officers of his Regiment.

On the Enemies' Side the Baron de Briolle wounded and taken with his Son.

OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 114.

On the Enemies' side the General Officers escap'd well, for I remember not to haue heard that any of them were hurt or taken, excepting the Baron de Briolle, one of the P^{ce} of Condé's Marshalls de Camp, who was a very brave old gentleman; and who, thō he had the misfortune to be taken and wounded in fighting against his King, yet some days before he dyd of his hurts which he then received, show'd he was no Rebell in his heart, however accidentally he had been one: for Sending for his Son who had been made prisoner with him, he told him some houres before his death, by what inducements and in what manner he had been drawn into rebellion; after which he commanded him on his blessing, never to be seduced again, on what pretence soever, to take up armes against his Sovereign. Vpon which admonition of a dying Father the young man so heartily repented, that he prov'd himself both a loyall Subject, and a dutifull Son: Vpon which account he was sett free.

his dying admonition to his Son, never to take up armes against^e King.
Ibid.

Prisoners taken by the French about 3000.
Ibid. p. 115.

I can not be exact in the number of the prisoners: but it was comonly reported that they were about three thousand, And I am apt to beleeeve the account was true, for fifteen hundred of the Lorraine foot were all taken together in an envelope which was in their quarter. Wee found about sixty

P A R T
II.

1654.
63 brass cañon and all the Enemies baggage.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 115.

Above 7000
waggons attending the Army to carry their baggage when they march'd away from Arras, being then but 20,000 men.
Ibid.

They were about 25000 strong when they forced the Lines.
Ibid.

The Duke Sent with 2000 horse to Peronne to convoy the Court to Arras.
Ibid.

The Army marches towards Cambray the 31 August.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 116.

three brass cannon of all sorts within the Line, and all things proportionable for so great a Train. As for their baggage, they lost it all, amongst which our Soldiers found good plunder, the General Officers in those Countrys being all serv'd in plate, and every one obliged to haue a considerable quantity of baggage, because it was impossible to subsist without it in such Armies: And to shew in what Vast proportion they use to be furnished, some few days after this, when our Army passed over the Escaut below Cambray, it was commonly reported by some who pretended to haue reckon'd the number, that wee had above seaven thousand waggons and carts attending us, our Army at that time not consisting of many more then twenty thousand men; thō when wee were all together at forcing of the Lines, wee were about fourteen thousand foot, eleven thousand horse, and four hundred Dragoons.

The day after wee had thus releued our Town, I was sent with two thousand horse to Peroñe where the Court then was, to convoy it to Arras, where they continued for some few days; During which time our Army camp'd within the Lines of the Enemy, our men making use of their hutts, and finding their quarters so well furnish'd with forage, that wee never sent out for any, while wee stayd upon the place.

On the last of August wee march'd towards Cambray and camp'd at Sauchy-Cauchy, and at the same time the Court return'd to Peronne. On the 3^d of September wee march'd to Thun S^t Martin, which stands on the Escaut, and there pass'd it on bridges which wee made, advancing the next day as far as Saulsoy, which is the midway betwixt Cambray and Valenciennes; And the next day wee came to Kircurayn, (Kievrain) which is two good leagues short of S^t Guilain. The 6th wee fell back upon Quesnoy, a Town situate between Valenciennes and Landrecies; in which place thō there was a Governour, yet he had no considerable garrison. The Town of itself was not Strong, the outworks

P A R T
II.

1654.

Quesnoy sur-render'd to the French
the 7th Aug:
Ibid.

They march to Bavay and so to Binche which is deliver'd up the 11th Aug.
Ibid.

In this march
M.deTurenne begins a new method of employing the Lieu^t Generalls, which he continued always after.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 118.

having been demolish'd after the Spanish fashion, which is only enough to hinder them from being defended, but with all so little slighted, that they may be repair'd with ease, and put into as good a condition as before. This place was surrender'd to us, the day after wee came before it. It was no sooner in our hands but wee employd ourselves in repairing the old out-works, and raising new where they were wanting.

Some few days after, leaving a strong garrison in Quesnoy wee march'd to Bavay, and so to Binche on the 11th. The Town last mention'd lyes two or three leagues wide of Mons, and is of equall distance with Mons from Brussels. Binche was deliver'd to us on the same day wee came before it. Here wee stayd till the 22, only to eat up the Enemies' Country, and give leisure to our men in Quesnoy to fortify themselves.

During this march Mons^r. de Turenne, who was then our Sole Generall, the other two Mareshalls having left the Army when wee left Arras, gave more employment to the Lieut. Generalls, then they were used to haue; for before this time none but he whose turn it was, had any thing in particular to do, more then to attend the Generall; but he now order'd, that as he whose day it was, march'd at the head of the horse which had the Van, so also he who had been releev'd, should march at the head of the Foot, and he who went out before him, at the head of the other wing of horse which had the Reer; so that every day there were three Lieutenant Generalls on duty. And he found so great ease and benefit by this new order, that during all the time I continued afterwards in the French Service, he kept it up. And he further directed them, that whensoever they came to any brook or défilé, they should not stay till those before them were passed over, but make a passage for themselves, on the one hand, or on the other, keeping still the Van betwixt them, and that side on which the Enemy might come: by which means he was inabled to make greater marches ; for generally after this, observing the method above mention'd, wee pass'd over the défilés at once in three places.

In the time of this march the Enemies Cravats were very busy about us, so that it was not safe for any man to straggle, thō never so litle, from the body of the Army. And sometimes they would get up by two or three in a Company into our Army, and when they found their opportunity, take some or other, and carry him away : One of them was once so bold, as to put himself into the rancks of the first Squadron of the Reer of horse, at the head of which I march'd. I remember that immediatly after I had pass'd a défilé, and through some bushes, which were on the other side of it, hearing a noise in the Squadron behind me, I turn'd about to ask the reason of it ; when some of my Soldiers brought before me a Cravat, who had placed himself in the midmost ranck of that Squadron, as if he had been a Trooper belonging to the Regiment, and was so unfortunate to put himself the very next man to one, whom he had taken some few days before, being also at that very time mounted on the horse which he had then taken from him : But he was soon discover'd by the Trooper, who therupon calld out aloud, This is he who tooke me prisoner some days since, and this is my horse on which he rides. He layd hold on him immediatly and brought him to me. The fellow confessed, that himself and some others of his Camarades, the Cravats, had put themselves in ambuscade behind those bushes which I had newly pass'd, and had resolved to disperse and mingle with the Army : That had it not been his misfortune so to haue placed himself as to be discover'd, he was confident that before night he had taken a prisoner, instead of being one himself.

In this our march I know it was wonder'd at by some, that so considerable and victorious an Army as ours then was, should undertake no Seige of consequence that Year ; But if they had consider'd, how far the season of a Campagne was then declin'd,

P A R T
II.

1654.

A bold action of one of the Enemies Cravats : he is discover'd and brought before the Duke.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 119.

P A R T
II.

1654.

The taking of Quesnoy of great importance for facilitating the designs of next year's Campagne, already contributed by M.
de Turenne.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 117.

and that wee were not furnish'd with provisions of any sorte for a great undertaking, they could not haue thought it strange, that wee contented ourselves with taking of Quesnoy ; for thō that Town of itself was not very considerable, yet it was of great advantage to us for the carrying on of our designs in the next Campagne : for Mons^r. de Turenne, even thus early, had contrived the business of the next year. And thō it was a bold undertaking to make good that place, seated as it was in the very midst of the Spanish garrisons, yet our fortifying it, renderd his designs for the ensuing year more easy to be compass'd, and in particular the taking of Landrecies, of which I shall say more in its proper place : So that in reality the taking and making good this Town, was of more consequence to us, then any other Town which wee could haue master'd at that Season of the year.

The Enemy
draw together their baffled Army about Mons.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 117.

While wee stay'd at Binche, the Enemy drew together their baffled Army at Mons, sheltering themselves under favour of the Town, and endeavouring by their partys to molest our foragers. But such was the vigilance and conduct of our Generall, that they did us litle harm ; thō their Cravats were still plying about us, and laying many ambuscades with small success : Yet one day I remember, they miss'd but narrowly of taking an advanced horse-guard which was on that side of the Camp, and consisted of four Squadrons posted behind a brook, having also an advanced guard of about thirty horse upon a heighth on the other side of it ; I happen'd to come just as they were relieving it by four other Squadrons, and I pass'd a brook at the head of the party who went to releeve the advanced guard, with M^r. d'Humieres, and severall Officers of the guard in my company. Being come up to that post, wee saw a party of the Enemys horse about our own number, coming out from a wood, which was on our left hand, towards us ; but when they were at the distance of half cañon-shott, they turn'd off again

They miss narrowly taking an advanced guard of the French, who were running rashly into one of their ambuscades, if his R. H. who chanced to be there, had not prudently forseen the danger and prevented it.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 120.

as if they were affraid of being follow'd : wherupon some of the Officers propos'd to me, that I should pursue, and push them ; Mons^r. d'Humieres and some few with him, who were somewhat advanced before the rest, began immediatly to gallop after them ; which been (being) seen by those about me, they spurr'd on eagerly, and left me, without receiving my answer whether or not I would approve it. At this I put on my horse to his full speed, and got to the head of the formost ; It was all I could do to stop their rashness, and they grumbled sufficiently, that I had hinder'd them from taking the whole party, But I told them, I was as morally certain as I could be of any thing, that by stopping them I had preserv'd them from some ambuscade, and that I could not beleve the Enemy would haue come so near us, but out of design to decoy us into some inconveniency. My opinion prov'd true, for no sooner had I stop'd my men, but the Enemy turn'd about and fac'd us, offering to draw us on by skirmishing ; But when they saw that they could inveigle us no farther, they march'd away towards Mons : Immediatly after which I saw two hundred horse go off, which had hidd themselves in a litle bottom behind a wood not far distant, and thether it was that the first party had design'd to haue drawn us. Upon which discovery both Mons^r. d'Humieres, and the rest of the Officers thank'd me for preventing their pursuite : for had they gone forward, in all probability most of them must haue been taken, because our main-guard, which was posted on the other side of the brook, could not haue releev'd them time enough ; the défilé over the brook and afterwards through the Village, on the other side of which the advanced guard was placed, being so great, that the Action had been past, before their friends could haue come up to their assistance.

After wee had stayd at Binche about ten days, and eaten up all the forage of the neighbouring Country, Mons^r. de Turenne

PART
II.

1654.

M.deTurenne marches back his Army towards Quesnoy, by the way of Mau-beuge.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 122.

His great caution in this march, because he had so great an Enemy as the P^{er} of Condé in his way. Ibid.

Description of M. de Turenne's order of march.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 122.

thought it was now high time for him, to draw back towards Quesnoy, before the falling of the rains which would haue made the ways troublesome for our cañon, and so vast a quantity of baggage as wee had then in our Army.

Having taken this resolution he chose to return by the way of Maubeuge, because the Country betwixt that place and Binche was more open and had fewer défilés then the direct way to Bavay. And besides this consideration he had another full as prevalent, which was, that the Spanish Army lay then at Mons ; so that in case he should haue taken his march by them, he must haue had no less an Enemy then the Prince of Condé in his way, before whom there was no making a false step ; and wee could not but expect to haue him on our wings, in our drawing off, and watching all opportunitys of the least advantage which should be offer'd to him.

Mons^r. de Turenne therfore to avoid an affront on his first days march, which was the 22^d of September, sent off all the baggage at break of day, with about six or eight Squadrons of horse, and M. de la Ferté's Dragoons, which march'd at their head, or on their flancks, as occasion offer'd. They were no sooner in their way, but he follow'd the Reer of them with his Van, and that he might be the less expos'd to any attempt, he march'd in a closer order then he formerly had used, as by the draught of it may more easily be seen.

Here the * draught - - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - -

Yet he so managed it, that he could suddainly put himself into his ordinary forme of battell, and that without the least confusion ; for upon the right hand of all march'd the first Line of that wing which had the Van that day, upon their left hand half of the first Line of foot ; Again on their left hand the second Line of horse of that wing which had the Van ; and on their left hand, the other half of the first Line of foot : And so after the same manner on their left hand, the other wing of horse, and the second Line of foot ; and on the left hand of all, the reserve of horse ; so that wee march'd with four Battalions and five Squadrons of horse afront, Each file consisting of - - - - Battalions and - - - - Squadrons. In this order wee march'd with our greatest cannon in the Van, and some few small pieces in the Reer, and as wee came to any pass or défilé, the Reer faced about with their feild pieces, while the Van past over ; which when they had done, then they drew up on the other side, and faced about also, leaving sufficient space for the rest of those who were to follow them, to draw up after they had pass'd : In this maner they continued, till all were come over to them, and then the whole body began to march again.

* None was inserted either in the original M.S. or in the Narrative of Mons^r. de Turenne's Campaigns sent to the Cardinal de Bouillon. — EDITOR.

By that time wee had march'd above a league, wee discover'd about fourty Squadrons of the Enemies horse coming towards us on our right hand: The main-body of them came not within cannon-shott of us, keeping still a narrow brook betwixt us and them, and only sending over it their Cravats, with a Squadron or two of horse to second them. The Cravats came so very near us, that severall of our Foot just stepping out of their rancks, fir'd on them betwixt the Intervals of the horse, which having done, they return'd into their order. Thus they march'd along by us, skirmishing, and wee never making any stop for them. They follow'd us till they came to a pass not far distant from Maubeuge, expecting still to find an opportunity of doing some execution on us. But our Generall was so carefull, and order'd his march with so much caution, that thō the Prince of Condé himself was at the head of those Squadrons, he was never able to fasten one charge upon us, or to put any of our horse into the least disorder ; neither indeed were they in any likelihood

The Enemies' Cravats skirmish with the French.

OR: MEM:
P. 2. p: 124.

M. de Turenne's march so well order'd, that the P. of Condé himself, at the head of 40 Squadrons, is not able to fasten one charge upon him. Ibid.

P A R T
II.

1654.

of doing it, unless it were once, and that was at the pass I mention'd near Maubeuge. Att that place they press'd a litle on our last troopes in their going over; but seeing our men turn'd so readily upon them, and in so good order, they thought it not expedient to charge them, but after having thus tasted them, suffer'd them to draw off quietly: By this time they found it was to no purpose to follow us any farther, for they durst not adventure to pass the défilé after us, for fear of exposing themselves too much, and therfore march'd back towards their own Camp, while wee continued our way to Maubeuge.

It was dark night before wee got thether, and thō our Camp was mark'd out to us betwixt the woods and the Town, yet what through the darknes, and what by confusion in which wee found our baggage, and more them (than) both by the straightness of the ground betwixt the Town and woods, none of our troopes could find out their appointed quarters; so that they fell into a very great disorder, and were so intangled amongst the baggage, that Mons^r. de Turenne could not possibly disengage them, or bring them into order. At last finding there was no remedy for the confusion, he got together two or three battalions of foot, and plac'd them without all our baggage, in that side on which the Enemy might possibly haue come. He staid with them all night in person, and so soon as it was broad day light drew up the Army again into good order, and that day being the 28^d of September wee march'd to Bavay.

In our going thether, the whole Regiment of the Enemies Cravats pursu'd a small party of ours to the very Van of the Army, and came so near us, before they were aware of it, that all of them were in danger of being taken: for our two first Squadrons disbanded after them, and follow'd them so close, that they had no other way for their Escape then to gain the shelter of the woods; many of them being forced to quitt their

M. de Turenne's Army at Maubeuge so intangl'd with the baggage, that he's forc'd himself to watch all night to guard the Camp.
OR: MEM:
P: 2. p. 125.

A Regiment of the Enemies' Cravats pursuing a party of the French, is defeated.
OR: MEM:
P: 2. p. 125.

horses for their own preservation: And truly, I beleeeve, they lost more men and horses on that occasion, then ever at any time before or since.

At our arrivall at Bavay wee demolisht the walls of that litle Town, the inhabitants wherof had abandon'd it the first time wee camp'd by it. It had four Roman ways mett in it, and being not above three or four leagues from Quesnoy, it might haue been very troublesome to that garrison, and disturb'd them in raising their contributions, if the Enemy had put any troopes in it during the winter.

From Bavay wee march'd the next day to Baudignies, and camp'd close by the Quesnoy. There wee stayd till the 28th, and then march'd to Château Cambresis, after wee had consum'd the forage therabouts. During the time of our abode there, the workes of the Quesnoy were so far advanced, and the place so well furnish'd with all kinds of stores and other necessities, that the winter now coming on apace, it would haue prov'd too difficult a peice of work for the Enemy to undertake, after wee were drawn off into our winter quarters.

While wee continued at Château en Cambresis, one of our Convoys of forage was like to haue been defeated, and was so near it, that the Count de Renel, a Collonel who commanded it, was made prisoner at the first charge, in leading up the foremost Squadrons which were broken by the Enemy; and had not the remaining horse, which were of the old Regiments, as namely, la Valette, Grammont, and others, after that, done their part with great bravery, they had been cutt off intirely and all our foragers expos'd: But notwithstanding that they saw their Commander taken, and their first Squadrons routed, they advanced upon the Enemy and forced them to draw off, without any further attempt; after which they march'd away with the

P A R T
II.

1654.

M deTurenne demolishes Bavay.
Ibid. p. 117.

Marches to the Quesnoy and camps there till the 28th Sep: and then marches to Chauteau en Cambresis.
Ibid. p. 126.

One of the French Convoys of forage like to be defeated, Count de Renel who commanded it being taken prisoner.
OR: MEM:
P: 2: p. 126.

P A R T foragers to our Camp, without having lost any of them. The II. Party of the Enemy which made this onset, came from Cambray, 1654. and, as I was inform'd, consisted of eight Squadrons of horse, ours were about the same number; and had the Enemy improv'd their first advantage, they must certainly haue beaten the whole party, and taken as many of our foragers as they could haue driven away with them.

This adventure obliged Mr. de Turenne to be more cautious afterwards in his foragers, and to send out Stronger Convoys with them. Two or three days after this accident, when they went abroad again, he himself went along with them to the same place where the Count de Renel had been taken, but with a much stronger Convoy; for he took with him above twenty Squadrons of horse, two Battalions of foot, and about four feild peices, supposing the Enemy would now come Stronger out upon our foragers then formerly, and he was not deceived in his conjecture: for some time after he had posted his troopes for the best security of his foragers, wee saw about six Squadrons of the Enemy coming out of a wood which was close by us, and where they had been in ambuscade. They cam on at a round gallop, as if they would haue fallen on two or three Squadrons of our Gendarmes, who were drawn up in a litle bottom betwixt the wood, and a Village where many of our foragers were at that time loading their horses: On one side of this Village was Mons^r. de Turenne himself with the greatest part of the horse, and one battalion of foot; but, there being a small pass betwixt us and the place where the Gendarmes were posted, which were commanded by Mons^r. de Schomberg, had the Enemy push'd on vigourously, they might haue routed him, before wee could haue come to his releif: he therefore, considering the danger in which he was, found there was no way of saving himself, but only by a bold action; and accordingly

M. de Turenne
go's abroad himself to forage with a Convoy of 20 Squadrons and two battalions.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 127.

M. de Schomberg in danger of being routed, escapes by doing a bold action.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 127.

advanced towards the Enemy, who seeing him come up to charge them, and not being able to discern what was in the bottom from whence he came, in all probability imagin'd he had more behind to second him, for immediatly they withdrew into the wood again: he was very glad of their retreat, as he had reason, and stopt short upon the litle high where he then was, without offering to follow them, because he was not strong enough, besides he knew not what other troopes they might have, either within the wood or behind it. There he stayd, more horse being sent from us to strengthen him, till our foragers were all loaded, and that wee began to draw off; which wee did without seeing any other Enemy appear.

Ever after this wee sent such strong Convoys with our Foragers, that for the rest of the Campagne the Enemy made not any attempt upon them: And wee were full as carefull of the Convoys which wee sent to the Quesnoy with provisions, for all of them were so well guarded, that the Spaniards thought it not for their advantage to sett upon them.

The last that went thether while wee stayd at Château en Cambresis, was commanded by me, after which wee march'd into forage-quarters, and spent some weeks upon the frontiers. There wee took two Castles, one call'd d'Anvillers, and the other Girondelle not far from Rocroy, which wee demolish'd: And then it was time for us to march into our winter quarters, the cold season being so far advanced, that it was become too late that year for the Enemy to attempt any thing upon the Quesnoy.

P A R T
II.

1654:

The Duke . commands the last Convoy sent to Quesnoy, after which the Army having spent some weeks in forrage-quarters and taken two Castles, they march'd to their winter quarters.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 128.

The Campagne of 1654 being thus ended, his Royall Highness repair'd as formerly to the French Court at Paris, where he arrived about the midle of December, and there spent the

P A R T remaining part of the winter : Towards the end of which his
II. brother the Duke of Gloucester took his leave of him, the King 1654. his brother having sent My Lord of Ormonde on purpose to bring him to him at Colen.

The summer following his Royall Highness went to make his fourth and last Campagne in France, of which he gives the following account in his Memoires.

THE DUKE'S FOURTH AND LAST CAMPAGNE
IN FRANCE.

THIS CAMPAGNE of 1655 began with putting in execution what was design'd the year before, when wee took and fortified Quesnoy ; for wee open'd it with the Siege of Landrecies, and then our Army found the benefit of having that place to freind. For immediatly after they sat down before Landrecies, the Enemy came and posted themselves betwixt that Town and Guise, therby to hinder all communication betwixt our Army and our own Country ; so that had not this been timely foreseen, and their design frustrated by our laying up a magazine of all necessarys in Quesnoy, sufficient for the carrying on of that Seige, Mons^r. de Turenne must haue been put to great extremities ; Wheras he was now so much before hand with the Spaniards, that the post which they had taken up, was of small advantage to them, and no manner of hindrance to the French in pursuance of their Seige, Convoys passing every day with great ease and security from Quesnoy to the Camp : So that no other inconvenience follow'd from the Enemies being posted near Guise, then that it hinder'd some Officers and Volonteers from getting into the Army, while the Seige lasted, whose affaires had hinder'd them from marching with it, when it came before the Town.

P A R T
II.

1655.

Is open'd with the Seige of Landrecies.
ORIG: MEM:
Par. 2. p. 130.

The Duke absent from this Seige, and why. Ibid.

The Duke
waits at la Fere an opportunity to joyne the Army.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 131.

Of this number I was one ; for which reason I shall not give a particular description of that Seige : Most of us who came short, and could not joyn our Army time enough, were either at Guise or la Fere while this Seige continued ; I was myself at the last of these places, expecting the opportunity of some

P A R T

II.

1655.

M. de la Feuillade endeavouring to pass is wounded and taken prisoner.
Ibid.

The Duke
joyns y^e Army a day or two before the surrender of Landrecy.
Ibid.

Landrecies
surrender'd up to the French.
Ibid. p. 132.

The Spaniards draw back into their Country.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 132.

The King of France and Cardinal Mazarin joyn
the Army.
Ibid.

Convoy to favour my desire of being present at the Seige ; but the Spanish Army was so posted in our neighbourhood, that the passage was render'd too difficult for any of us to attempt. Mons^r. de la Feuillade, with two or three officers and a small party of horse, ventur'd to haue pass'd, but they were mett by the Enemy and beaten, la Feuillade himself being taken and desperately wounded. This ill success of his, so far discourag'd all of us, that wee layd aside the thought of it ; so that till the Enemy drew off, which was a day or two before the surrender of the Town, wee came not to our Army.

This Seige was a very favorable one to our Soldiers ; those of the Town contenting themselves with a bare defence, according to the ordinary formes, and not making any vigourous Sallys during the whole time it lasted ; so that wee lost as few men, as could possibly be expected, in the mastering of such a place, and no officer of note but Mons^r. de Tracy, who had the Command of all the German horse, as being the eldest Collonel of them. The Garrison held out only, till a breach was made by a Mine in the face of one of their Bastions, and a lodgment made upon it, after which they capitulated and Surrender'd.

After the Town was deliver'd up to us, Our Army stayd by it some days to repair the breaches and outworks, and to slight our Line of Circumvallation ; and the Enemy drew back into their own Country betwixt Mons and Valenciennes behind the Rivers, not thinking themselves strong enough, as indeed they were not, to hazard a battell with us on equall termes ; So that their business was to attend our motions, and endeavour to hinder our undertaking any other considerable Seige.

And now by that time wee were in a readiness to march, the King and the Cardinal came to the Army, and wee march'd down along by the Sambre, as far as la Bussiere, which is within a league of Thuyn, a small Town belonging to the Pays de Liege. Having spent some time in this march, and stay'd a day or two at la Bussiere, wee march'd back, and passing by Avènes invested la Capelle; and thō wee camp'd within a league or two of it with our whole Army, yet on better consideration wee did not beseige it, as not judging it a place of so great importance, that our Army should lose so much time as was necessary to reduce it. And therefore leaving it, wee pass'd the Sambre, advancing into Haynault as far as Bavay on the 11 of August. The Town I last mention'd is betwixt Quesnoy and Mons; and our intentions were to advance yet farther into the Enemie's Country, and to pass the Haisne, a litle River which coming from Mons, takes its course by S^t Guislain, and falls into the Schald at Condé: But sending to view the passages upon it, wee found that the Enemy had fortify'd the River from S^t Guislain as far as Condé, with a very strong Brestwork and Redouts, with platformes ready made in them at the distance of every three or four hundred paces; which together with the difficulty of approaching the River itself, by reason of the lowness of the Country, which was full of ditches, and there being no way to come to the River but along narrow dikes, made the passage very hard to be forced. Which notwithstanding, in a consultation that was held in the King's presence, where were assisting the Cardinal and the two Generalls, M^r. de Turenne and M^r. de la Ferté, together with the Marshalls de Villeroi, de Grammont, du Plessis, and myself, it was once upon the point of being resolved, that wee should attempt to force our passage au Pont de Haisne; And had it not been for M^r. de Turenne, that opinion had taken place: for the Cardinal hauing propos'd it as an undertaking which would be of high reputation in the world, if wee could make a way over a River in the face of a formidable Army, he was seconded and his advice confirm'd by most who were there

P A R T
II.

1655.
The French invest la Capelle.
Ibid.

They Leave la Capelle, passing the Sambre they advance to Bavay, Aug^t 11.
Ibid.

The Spaniards fortify the Haine from S^t Guislain to Condé.
On: MEM:
P. 2: p. 133.

A Council held in the King's presence, the Duke assisting there with the Card^l. and
M^r. de Turenne.
Ibid.

The Cardinal proposes to force the passage at Pont de Haisne, and his advice is seconded by most of the Gen^l Officers.
Ibid.

P A R T
II.

1655.

M.deTurenne
opposes it.
Ibid. p. 134.

Gives his reasons.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 134.

present, whither out of complaisance, or by the force of his reasons, I shall not pretend to judge; but resolv'd on, it had been, had not M^r. de Turenne oppos'd it, by representing the great difficulties which would be found in that attempt.

For, said he, Besides that the whole River is strongly fortified all along, there is no approaching it but by the side of a Dike, by reason that all the ground on our side is full of ditches, so that the Enemy would have a double advantage over us; and thō at last, I believe, we may force our passage, we should unavoidably lose many men in compassing our design: he added, That it was not this consideration alone, which mov'd him to dissuade that undertaking, but the belief he had, that the thing we aim'd at, might be effected without running so great a hazard, or venturing the lives of so many Soldiers; That instead of our endeavouring to force a passage there, we should rather march, and pass the Escaut somewhat below Bouchain, and then passing by Valenciennes and leaving it on our right hand, should march to Condé, and there pass the Escaut again; That in so doing, we should take the Enemy on the flank, and thereby render that great intrenchment of no effect to them.

M. de Turenne's opinion prevails in Council and his proposal being approv'd of, the French Army marches towards Bouchain. Ibid.
The Spaniards
post themselves advantageously by Valenciennes.
Ibid.

The French
pass the Scheldt
the 14th of Aug:

With these and other arguments he convinced the Cardinal, and all those of the Council who had abetted his opinion: And in pursuance of M. de Turenne's proposall, we march'd immediatly from Bavay towards Bouchain, upon notice of which the Enemy march'd also toward Valenciennes, and posted themselves very advantageously, having their Right cover'd by the woods of St. Amand, and their left by the Town, and the old Line ready made to their hands, upon Mont Azin, from the woods to the Town; and instead of endeavouring to hinder our passing the River, they fell on repairing the old Line, which by the next morning was put into very good defence; which whilst they were a doing, we past the River on our bridges of boates, and by eight next morning, being the 14th, pass'd over our whole Army, leaving some few troopes behind to secure our baggage from the garrison of Bouchain.

I haue been since inform'd by some of the Enemys own Officers, who were then upon the place, that they came thither with an intention of making good that post, for upon the proposall of that march, the Prince of Condé oppos'd it, unless they would absolutely resolve to maintain it when they were once there ; telling them plainly, That he would not stirr a step, unless the Spaniards would ingage their promise to do this: They gave him all the assurances he could desire: Yet he foretold them, that in that post, wee should certainly come upon them, and then it would be too late to think of retiring, by which they would expose their whole Army to be beaten. But whatever arguments he urg'd were not sufficient to divert them, for march they would ; but at the same time they confirm'd their promise to him, of making good that Post: So wee found them there.

And now our Partys having brought us word how they were posted, so soon as wee could put our troopes in battell, wee march'd towards them ; and being come within a league of them, seeing they were well intrenched on that advantageous post, wee halted till our cañon and ammunition, which were somewhat behind, could come up to us. During this our stay, Monsieur de Turenne went with a Squadron or two, to view their Line, advancing till he came within cannon shott, and then they fir'd at him with their great guns ; which confirmed him in the belcef, that they would maintain their post: upon which he commanded M^r. de Castelnau with his Camp-Volant, which consisted (of) about twelve Squadrons and two or three Battalions, to march, and post himself on the Enemys right hand on the high way which comes from S^t Amand ; that at 1655. and march'd to the Enemy.

P A R T
II.

OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 135.

The P^{re} of Condé was against the Spaniards of taking that post unless they would resolve to maintain it.
Ibid.

M.deTurenne
go's to view the Enemies Line.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 136.

He detaches
M. de Castel-nau to attack them on the flanck designing himself to attack their front. Ibid.

P A R T
II.

1655.
The Enemy draw off towards Condé. Ibid.
Castelnau is order'd to press upon their reer, and endeavour to retard their march till
M.deTurenne could come up with the body of the Army.
Ibid. p: 137.

the same time wee should attack their front, he might see what could be done upon their flank.

No sooner was Castlenau gott thether, but he perceived the Enemy was drawing off towards Condé, of which (he) immediatly advertis'd M. de Turenne; who order'd him to press upon their Reer, and by that means retard, if possibly he could, their march, till he could come up himself with the body of the Army: and till wee receiv'd that advice which wee had from M^r. de Castelnau, wee perceived nothing of the Enemys retreat; neither indeed could wee by reason of the ground; their Line being, as I haue said before, upon a heighth, so that wee could only discover such troopes as they would shew us.

It seems that so soon as the Arch Duke, and the Count de Fuensaldagne were inform'd that our whole Army was past the River, and that they saw us marching up towards them, they repented themselves of being So far ingaged; and, as the Prince of Condé had foretold them, resolv'd to march back to Condé, and there to pass the River. This resolution they took without consulting him, so that the first notice he had of it, was by an Adjutant, who brought him word, that the Arch Duke was marching away, and desir'd him to bring up the Reer, and make good the retreat, thō it was the turn of the Spaniards to haue done it: And that they might haue as litle disorder as they could, they sent their great cañon into Valenciennes, and only carryed off with them their small feild peeces.

The Pe^r of Condé hard put to it, if Castelnau had done his part.
Ibid.

Had Mons^r. de Castelnau done his part as he ought according to his orders, and also as he might, the Prince of Condé would haue been reduced to great extremitys: Tis true he fail'd not in point of courage, but meerly in conduct, for he was so hasty that coming to the Pont de Beuerage (where runs a brook which coming from the woods falls into the Escaut on the other side of Valenciennes, where Mons^r. de Marsin was posted with severall Squadrons and some Dragoons) he would not stay for his foot, but endeavour'd with his horse alone to haue forced the pass upon him, and charg'd over the bridge twice or thrice, thō he was still beaten with some losse, and at last was forced to Stay till his foot were advanced to him; who were longer in coming up then they needed to haue been, by reason that all his horse were gott before them into the way. But so soon as the Enemy discover'd his foot advancing, they immediatly drew off, and left the bridge free for him to pass over, which he did. And by this time, Mons^r. de Turenne was come up with his Van, to the Reer of M^r. de Castelnau's troopes, and sent severall Messengers to him with orders, that he should press the Enemy as much as possibly he could, therby to hinder their march, that he might come up with them in their retreat: But Castelnau perform'd not what was expected of him, suffering himself to be overreach'd by some of the Prince his Officers, who bringing up the Reer of their Army and seeing M. de Castelnau advance before his troopes, ask'd to speak with him upon parole; To which he consenting, because they were of old acquaintance, he order'd his men at the same time to halt a litle, while they were passing their compliments: Mean while the Prince of Condé commanded his men to make what hast they could, to secure themselves by getting off; and so amused our Lieu^tGen^l, till a man whom they had left on the top of a rising ground, which was behind them, made a signe to them, and then they took their leave immediatly of Castelnau, and gallop'd after their troopes: By this means they gain'd so much time, that they pass'd the River, before our men could come up with them again.

Soon after this, Mons^r. de Turenne arriv'd at the place where Castelnau had drawn up his men within cañon-shott of the River, and saw the Enemys Army drawn up on the other Side of the River by Condé: And then Mons^r. de Castelnau gave

P A R T
II.

1655.

Great oversight of Castelnau in letting himself be overreach'd by Some of the P^{er}. officers.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 138.

Castelnau's mistake is the occasion of a

P A R T

II.

1655.

Sharpness afterwards between the P^{as} of Condé and M. de Turenne.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 146.

Mons^r. de Turenne an account of what had past, and added, That the last Squadron of the Enemys horse were forced to swim the River to Save themselves: This mistake of his caused some Sharpnesse more then ordinary between the Prince and Mons^r. de Turenne, by an accident which happen'd some days after as the Reader will find in the following account.

The Enemy had no Sooner past over the River, but they broke the bridges, so that they were in a further danger, and, as I remember, march'd the same afternoon for Tournay. Wee quarter'd that night at Frane, closs by Condé, and the next morning fell to making our bridges over the River, about a league below the Town; intending so soon as they should be finish'd to attack that place. At first it was resolved that only M^r. de Castelnau and M^r. d'Vxelles, with the troopes which they commanded, should be employd to take the Town, while the two Mareshalls, with the rest of the Army, should cover them from any attempt from the Army of the Spaniards. And so they began to make their approaches to the Town; But the very first night they found so vigourous a resistance from the Defendants, whose workes indeed were very slight, but lin'd with great numbers of men within them, that it was found too hard a taske for them alone to undertake.

The French
besiege Condé.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 139.

Two attacks, the one carryd on by the 2 Mareshalls, the other by Castelnau and Vxelles. Ibid.

Of this the two Mareshalls being advertis'd, they came themselves, and carryd on one of the attaques, leaving the other to the conduct of the two foremention'd Lieutenant Generalls. And here wee found a very favourable shelter, from the houses of a small fauxbourg which was before the gate: for thō the Enemy had burnt it, yet not hauing time to pluck down the walls, it prov'd beneficial to us; for from thence wee began our Trenches, which was but litle above half musket shott from the Town. The first night of their being open'd at our attack, they were mounted by a Battalion of the Guards commanded by Vautourneux, the eldest Captain of these ten Companies ; and at the Lieutenant Generall's attack was the Regiment of ———.

P A R T
II.

1655.

That night wee made a very good (attack) at both places ; yet wee lost betwixt three or four hundred men at those two attacks, of which number were Severall Officers. At our approche wee lost Mons^r. de Vautourneux, who seeing one Captain LLloyd (a Welshman and an Engeneer, who had been bred up under the Prince of Orange and was a stout colerick man) coming back from the Trenches after he had perform'd his duty, traced out the work, and sett the workmen upon their imployment, ask'd him, why he returned so soon? Saying withall, That he was certain he could haue not perform'd all he had to do in so short a time ; after which he let fall some words, as if he doubted of his courage : At which the Engeneer was so incensed, that it made his Welsh blood boyle with him ; So that he told Vautourneux, That if he pleas'd to go and look upon what he had trac'd out, he should find he had not been wanting in any part of his duty. Vpon this they both went together to view it, and the shott from the Enemy flew so fast, that Vautourneux was kill'd before he could get to the head of the workmen, and Captain LLloyd shott through the head.

3, or 400 men kill'd at the 2 attacks, the first night the Trenches were open'd.
On: MEM:
P. 2. p. 149.

The next night a Battalion of Suisses had the guard of the Trenches at one attack, and the Regiment de - - - - - at the other, both which attacks carryd on their Trenches within pistoll shott of the Town : that night wee lost at least as many men as the former. The third night, an other Battalion of the frech Guards releevd the Suisses at our attack, and the regiment de - - - - - at the Lieu^t Generall's. That night at our attack, there happen'd a very great mistake, which caus'd the loss of many men : It was the turn of Mons^r. de la Ferté to be in the Trenches, who coming in the Evening to take a view of what had been perform'd there,

The 2^d night
the Trenches carryd, within pistoll shott of the Town.
On: MEM:
P. 2. p. 141.

P A R T
II.

1655.
The 3^d night a mistake, in taking the pallisades to be without the ditch, whereas they were within it, occasions the loss of many men. Ibid.

and to resolve what was to be farther done, suppos'd that he was now neer enough to endeavour to make a lodgment against the pallisades, which both he and all the Officers concluded to be without the ditch on the very edge of it; And accordingly, he order'd his men to lodge themselves at the foot of them, which so soon as it was dark, they attempted to haue done: but when they came to the ditch, they found the pallisades were not before it, but upon the barme, which, notwithstanding, they pass'd the ditch which was but shallow, and not broad, in obedience to their orders, and endeavour'd to haue lodged themselves at the foot of the pallisades upon the barme, which they disputed so long, that they lost a considerable number both of Soldiers and Officers; and at last were constrain'd to draw off, and content themselves only with carrying on their Trench to the edge of the ditch. And here it is not to be wonder'd at, that this mistake was made; for the ditch, as I said, being narrow, and it being generally the Custom, that the pallisades were placed without it, they took it for granted, that so they were: to which I might add, that it was exceeding difficult to the eye to distinguish att a distance, where they were sett.

Condé sur-render'd up to the French
the 19 of Aug.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 142.

The next day the Count de Henning Governour of the place sent out to treat, and made his conditions to march forth with his armes and baggage on the day following, which was the 19th of August. He accordingly perform'd his Articles, and came out with upwards of two thousand foot, and some few horse.

M. de Bussy-Rabutin sent out with 7 or 8 Squadrons to guard the foragers, falls into an ambuscade of the Enemy.
OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 143.

While wee lay before this place, Mons^r. de Bussy-Rabutin, Mestre de Camp de la Caualerie, being sent out with seven or eight Squadrons of horse to convoy and guard our foragers, while they were about their work on the other side of the Escaut, betwixt S^t Crepin and Valenciennes, having plac'd his troopes before the Villages in which our men were foraging, and towards the Evening, when our foragers had almost ended their work, and were most of them gone home laden, seeing two Squadrons of the Enemies horse appear in the plaine betwixt him and Valenciennes, he was desirous to fall upon them ; being also prest to it by Severall Volonteers and persons of quality who happen'd to be with him, amongst which were the Prince de Marsillac and the Count de Guiche : He therfore march'd to them with all his horse ; Vpon which they drew off at a round rate, and he follow'd them : But when he was almost got up to them, they faced about on the suddain, and at the same time twelve or fourteen Squadrons came out of a litle bottom, where they had been all that time in Ambuscade, which so much surpris'd both him and all his company, that at first they knew not what resolution they should take ; and at length when he was going to haue charg'd them, he hauing then no other choice to make, as he had order'd matters, but either to charge there, or to retire back and make good a défilé that was behind them, he was determin'd by the men themselves ; who without waiting for his command, chose the latter, which they had reason enough to do, seeing themselves so far outnumber'd by the Enemy, so they faced about, and made the best of their way to the défilé, crying out, as they broke and ran, Au défilé! meaning they would rally at the pass, and they were as good as their words ; for so soon as they were come thether, they rallyd very well, and the Enemy being Satisfied with what they had taken in the poursuit, press'd them no farther. These Regiments that did this, were of the best of our Army, and most of them old Troopers as well as Officers, and had they not done that they did, the loss had been much more considerable.

In this rencounter wee lost above a hundred horsemen, and a Cornett or two of the Regiment Royall, who happening to be taken by some of the Prince of Condé's troopes, he sent them back to the King by one of his own Trumpeters ; but his

P A R T

II.

1655.

His men outnumber'd by the Enemy break and run, but rally afterwards at the pass and make it good.

OR: MEM:

P. 2: p. 144.

Above 100 horsemen lost in this rencounter and a Cornett or two of the Reg^t Royall.
Ibid.

P A R T

II.

1655.

The P^{er} of Condé Sends back the Cornetts to the King of France, who refuses to accept of them. Ibid.

A Letter from M. de Turenne to the Cardinal, intercepted by the P^{er} of Condé. OR: MEM:

P. 2: p. 145.

The Prince upon this occasion writes a sharp letter to M. de Turenne and sends it by a Trumpeter Substance of the Letter. Ibid.

M. de Turenne's answer to the Trumpeter threatening him. Ibid.

Ma^{ty} refused to accept of them, and so those troopes of the Regiment which had lost them, march'd without any during the rest of the Campagne.

There happen'd also about that time an accident, which caus'd a worse understanding betwixt the Prince of Condé and Mons^r. de Turenne, then is usuall betwixt persons of their quality commanding against one another: For a letter which the Marshell had written to the Cardinal being intercepted, wherein he gave his Eminence an account of what had past in the retreat, when the Spaniards quitted their post neer Valenciennes; The Prince, into whose hands it fell, after hauing read it, sent a Trumpeter, with a letter to Mons^r. de Turenne, which was full of very Sharp and ressenting expressions, some of which were to this purpose, That had he not known M. de Turenne's own handwriting, he should haue thought, that the account which was given to the Cardinal in that paper, had rather been written by some Gazettier, then a Generall; and clos'd his letter with these words, 'That had Mons^r. de Turenne been at the head of his Army, as himself was at the Reer of his, he would haue seen the contrary of what he writt, none of his horse being forced to swim the River to Save themselves in their Retreat. Mons^r. de Turenne grew very angry at the reading of this letter, and told the Trumpeter, That it concern'd him to haue a care, how he brought any papers of that nature; and warn'd him of it, That if he committed the same fault again, neither his character nor his Livery should protect him; but that for this time he was contented to let him go, though he had well deserv'd to be punish'd for bringing so injurious a paper. The Prince was not long ignorant, that Mons^r. de Turenne had written nothing but what had been told him by Mons^r. de Castelnau, and therefore was sorry that he had written so angry and offensive a letter; yet, till the conclusion of the Warr, they were never heartily reconciled ; I mean, they liv'd not with that Civility towards each other, as men of their quality and posts are accustom'd to do in those parts.

P A R T
II.

1655.

The French besiege S^t Guislain the 20th of Aug.
OR: MEM:
P: 2: p. 146.

And now Condé being taken, and wee hauing left a sufficient garrison within it, our Army march'd on the next day which was the 20th of August to S^t Guislain, and besieg'd it, Mons^r. de Turenne having his quarter at a Village called Hornu, and M^r. de la Ferté his, on the other side of the River. At this place the King of France and the Cardinal came to the Army, and were quarter'd at the Castle of Bossut, a litle below the Town, on the same River. This Town is very strongly situated, standing very low, and the River of Haisne running through it ; so that they can drown at their pleasure most of the ground about it, as now they had, for which reason wee found difficulty enough in the carrying on our Trenches : 'twas also very hard to make a line of Circumvallation, because bridges of communication could not be made without great trouble : So that at the best, notwithstanding all our endeavours, our Trenches were full of water, especially when wee came neer, and our approaches might more reasonably be call'd blinds of fascines, then any thing else ; because the water being even with the ground, wee could neither sink ourselves, nor make use of that earth to cover us. Yet surmounting all these difficulties, wee carry'd the Town in the space of three days, after wee had broken ground.

Great difficulty of carrying on the Trenches,
most of the ground about the Town
being drown'd.
OR: MEM:
P: 2: p. 146.

When wee came first to our quarters at Hornu, (Horn) it was exceeding dark ; so that, thō severall of our Generall Officers had houses mark'd out for their reception which were within lesse then cañon-shott of the Town, they knew it not, till next morning, when they were waken'd with the thundering of the great Guns from the Town ; and the houses being all paper buildings, they were soon dislodged, as in particular Mons^r. de Passage, with others, who were all obliged to seek their quarters out of gune shott. I onely made bold to stay in mine, which is the only Generall Officer that venturs to stay in his quarters, which were within litle more then muskett shott of the Town, during all the time of the Siege of S^t Guislain.

The Duke
OR: MEM:
P: 2: p. 147.

P A R T

II.

1655.

indeed being little more then muskett-shott from the Town, they neglected it so much as not to shoot at it, as supposing that nobody would stay in it; so that I remain'd there in great security during the time the Seige lasted.

At this place the French Guards, according to custome, had the guard of the Trenches the first night; it being an indisputed right in those Countrys, that how many Seiges soever, thō of very short continuance shall happen in a Campagne, the eldest Regiment has allways the honour of first breaking ground. There happen'd a dispute that night betwixt M^r. de Montpezat the eldest Lieu^t Generall, and the Grand Maistre de l'Artillerie, occasion'd by the first mention'd sending his orders to the latter, to furnish him with some necessarys which he wanted for carrying on the Trenches, the first night they were open'd; which the other refus'd to obey, pretending he ought to receive no orders but from the Generall himself: Of which M^r. de Montpezat complaining the next day, the dispute was decided in favour of the Lieu^t Generalls, that the Grand Maistre was obliged to receive orders from any of them: Upon which result, for so long time as he continued in the Army, he officiated no more as Grand Maistre, but had a Comission, granted him for Lieu^t Generall and served only in that capacity.

Wee lost no many Soldiers at this Seige, nor do I remember that any Officer of note was kill'd; only the Cheualier de Crequi and Mons^r. de Varennes were wounded, besides some other Officers, as Mons^r. de Chavigny Aide Major to the Regiment of Guards, and since Pere de l'Oratoire; The Cheualier de Crequi was wounded at Mons^r. de la Fertés attack, and dangerously hurt in the head, of which notwithstanding he afterwards recover'd, and Mons^r. de Varenne was shott in the thigh at our attack as he was talking with me.

A dispute betwixt M. de Montpezat and the Grand maitre d'Artillerie, decided in favour of the Lieu^t.
Generalls.
OR: MEM.
P. 2. p. 147.

M. de Varennes shot in the thigh as he was talking with the Duke.
OR: MEM.
P. 2: p. 148.

In three nights wee carryd on our approches to the edge of the ditch, and the next day, the Governour Don Pedro Savali sent out to capitulate, and march'd out of the Town the next day following which was the 25th.

P A R T
II.

1655.
S^t Guislain
surrender'd to the French 25 Aug.
Ibid.

The Spaniards divide their Army.
Ibid. p. 149.

While wee were busied at this Seige, the Enemy divided their Army; the Arch Duke and Count de Fuensaldagne with most of the Spanish foot and some horse, were at Notre-Dame-de-Halle, The P^{ce} of Condé with the greatest part of his at Tournay, the Lorrainers at Ath, and the Prince of Ligny with about four or five thousand men at Mons.

And now the year was so far spent, that it was not thought expedient for us to undertake any other Seige, So that wee spent severall days in the same quarters where wee were when wee Satt down before S^t Guislain, from which place the Court departed, some few days after it was taken. During the time of our abode there, wee work hard both at that Town and Condé, adding new fortifications to them, but our cheifest care was to secure our Foragers, and to eat up the Country round about those garrisons; that by so doing wee might make it impracticable for the Enemy to beseige them in the winter. And to that intent wee continued in our Camp by S^t Guislain, till our men had quite made an end of the Forage thereabout, and wee took care allways to send out strong Convoys with our foragers, to prevent their being beaten or taken by the Spaniards. Sometimes Mons^r. de Turenne himself went out with them; and when he did not, there was allways a Lieu^t Generall at the head of those partys, which had never less during our abode in that place then two thousand men to guard them.

The French
Army remains about S^t Guislain in order to fortify that Town and Condé, and eat up the Country.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 149.

Having taken these precautions, wee never received any affront or considerable loss in our Forage: yet notwithstanding all the care which could be taken, some small partys of the Enemys would be still abroad, and glean up here and there a man or two; it being impossible to restrain our Vedettes from running out beyond our Guards, where commonly they were

P A R T

II.

1655.
The Enemies' Cravats very troublesome to the Foragers.
On: MEM:
P. 2. p. 150.
M. de Turenne's care to prevent their designs.
Ibid.

surpriz'd ; And of all the Enemies' horse, none did us so much mischeif as their Cravats, who in litle partys would be perpetually upon our Foragers : but to prevent their designs as much as possibly wee could, Mons^r. de Turenne order'd, That every Squadron of horse should send along with their Foragers, three or four Officers well mounted, so that when any of these Cravats fell upon their fellows, they might joyn twenty or thirty of them together, which were enough to beat off one of those straggling partys : By this means our Foragers were better protected then before, and many of the Cravats taken.

The Duke
commands the last Forage that was made in that quarter, and which was the greatest and the most dangerous.
Ibid. p. 151.

The last Forage wee made while wee stayd in that quarter, was the greatest of any, and of the most danger, being to go as far as Chievres and the Abbey of Cambron ; the first of which places is but the distance of a large league from Ath. This Convoy was commanded by men (me), and being to march so great a distance from our Camp into the midst of those places where the Enemies troopes were quarter'd, I had five Battalions and fourty Squadrons with two pieces of cañon along with me. And as I gave a particular account of one considerable Forage which was made in the foregoing year, I shall do the same of this.

A particular
account of the great Forage at S^t Guislain, which was commanded by the Duke.
Ibid.

Having consider'd that I was to be ingaged so far in the Enemys Country, I thought it necessary to take what precautions I could, and to that purpose before day I sent a party of horse to a great wood, through which I was of necessity to pass, to stopp all the Foragers there, and to permitt none of them to go on beyond those limits, till I came thither myself with the Troopes I commanded. This being perform'd according to my order, I march'd through the wood, and drew out upon the plaine before any one Forager was there. In the wood I left a Battalion, that from Mons, partys of foot might not intercept them when they return'd loaden. Then I gaue my orders, that the Foragers should not presume to disband, or march faster then the Convoy ; but go along with me upon the same front on each hand of the Squadrons. In this manner I march'd till I came almost within a league of Chievres ; and it was an extraordinary sight to see about ten thousand Foragers, most of them with scythes in their hands, with the Officers before them marching as they did, the front of them being almost half a mile in breadth : But when they came within sight of that part of the Country, which had not been already forag'd, it was altogether impossible either for me or their particular Officers to keep them in order any longer, or to hinder them from disbanding, and making what hast they could to forage. Which when I observ'd, I left the remainder of my foot, and some horse together with the cañon, upon the heighth where I then was, near a Village ; and myself with the greatest part of the remaining horse, march'd at a round trot after the Foragers, and when they were fallen to their work, I placed myself before them betwixt Chievres and Brugelet, by that means to cover them from those in Ath. At the same time sending the Count de Grandpré with the rest of the horse the other way, ordering him to draw up by a Village call'd Leuse, therby to Secure our Foragers from any partys which might come out from Mons.

And upon this occasion I cannot forbear to mention the great order and justice which was observ'd amongst Foragers ; for he who first enters into a Feild of Corne or Meadow, keepes possession, and none will offer to come within such a distance of him, and not to leave him sufficient forage to load his horse : And whosoever gets first into a Barne, or on a Hay-mowe, no man offers to disturb him, or to size on any thing, till he has provided for himself ; so that First come first serv'd.

About noon I had an alarme, but it prov'd to be only Mons'. de Rochepair, who had been abroad with a party of about a thousand horse, and was returning to the Camp, without having

P A R T
II.

1655.

The Prince de Ligne intending to fall on the Duke's Foragers, is hinder'd by a false intelligence and the Forage by this means escapes a great danger.

OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 153.

done any thing: I desir'd him to stay with me, not knowing what use wee might haue of more men: And now hauing continued there till all the Foragers had loaden, and were gone, I march'd back to the Camp after them, loosing only half a score, who had past over the brook by Cambron contrary to order, and were taken by a small party of the Enemy. I haue since been told by the Prince de Ligne, and other Officers of the Spanish Army, That they had intended that day to haue fallen on our Foragers, and had appointed a Rendezvous for most of their horse from Tournay, Mons, and Ath, (and) haue met for that design; but that when I march'd out with our Foragers, there was so great a noise in our Camp, that some of the Prince de Ligne's small partys brought him intelligence to Mons, that our whole Army was on its march: wherupon he sent immediate notice of it to the Rendezvous, and they all march'd back into their severall quarters, apprehending to meet with the Van (of) our Army: Thus in all appearance by this mistake, that Forage escap'd a great danger; for it would haue been very difficult to haue gott off in safety, when so great a body of horse should haue fallen on them.

The French Army marche to Leuse the 19th Sep. and rests there to eat up the forage.
Ibid. p. 154.

They take the Castle of Briffeil.
OR: MEM:
P. 2: p. 154.

Some days after this, all the Country about us being now quite caten up, wee past the River, and Camp at Outrage on the 14th of September, and on the 19th wee march'd to Leuse a Bourg in the midway betwixt Tournay and Ath, where wee rested for some days, till wee had also eaten up most of the Forage in those parts. During our stay there, wee took in the Castle of Briffeil, in which the Enemy had a garrison, who would not deliver it up till they saw our cañon in battery against them.

They quitte the Enemies Country and march to .. Pommereuil the 26 September and thence to Angre. Ibid.

Having stayd as long as it was convenient in that quarter, wee began to think it necessary for us to go out of the Enemys Country; and on the 26th of September, wee march'd to Pommereuil near Pont de Haisne. The next day wee past over that River, and camped at Angre upon the Hosneau (Anirt sur l'Haisneau) about a league from Keuvrain up that brook. This quarter and all adjoining to it, had been so consum'd, that the very first night of our coming thether, our Foragers were forc'd to go out two leagues for nothing but for straw. So that had any one proposed to haue stayd there, about three or four days, it would haue been judged impracticable. Notwithstanding which Mons^r. de Turenne maintain'd us there without want above a fortnight; which was impossible to haue done, had he not order'd us to provide ourselves with corn when wee went from Leuse: at which time our waggons were not only as full as they could hold, but every Trooper carryd a sack of corn behind him, the day wee came thether, which enabled us to subsist so long as wee did in that leane quarter; where there was so litle Forage in the neighbourhood, that I do not remember wee sent out above thrice while we continued there.

P A R T
II.

1655.
The Country about Angre so consum'd that they are forced to go two leagues for Straw.
Ibid. p. 155.
Yet M. de Turenne
maintaine the French Army ther above a fortnight.
Ibid.

Here at Angre the Duke likewise commands the last Forage which was made on that quarter.
Or: MEM:
Pt 2. p. 156.

At this place also I commanded the last Forage which wee made, and was forced to go almost as far as Bouchain before any thing could be found, most of our men coming loaden only with Straw. The occasion of our long stay in that place, was to furnish the two Towns which wee had newly taken with all manner of Stores and necessary provisions, and for finishing of some works which were absolutely needfull for their Safety.

When this was done, about the 11th of October wee march'd to Barlaimont, and on the 22^d to the Abbey of Marolles; where wee thought wee should haue continued for some time: but having received intelligence that some troopes of the Enemy were drawing down that way, wee thought it expedient for us to remove from thence to a place called Vandegies-au-bois, where our Generall received orders to march towards la Fere; the Court being then just advertis'd, that the Mareshall d'Hocquincourt was making a Treaty with the Prince of Condé, to deliver up to him Ham and Peronne, of both which places he

PART
II.

1655.
The 4th Nouuemb^r M. de Turenne comes with the Army to Mouy hard by la Fere, where he is order'd to leave it and come to Compiègne (where the Court then was) to consult concerning M. d'Hocquincourt.

OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 158.

M. de Turenne going to Court, leaves the Army under the Duke's command at Mouy, at the very time the peace was concluded between France and Cromwell.
Ibid.

The Duke marches the Army to Mondécour, the 10 of Nov:
Ibid.

The affaire of M. d'Hocquincourt being accommodated, M.
de Turenne returns to the Army the 14th Nov: and soon after that the Duke go's to Court when the Army was just preparing to go to winter quarters.

OR: MEM:
P. 2. p. 159.

was Governour. In pursuance of which order Mons^r. de Turenne came with the Army on the 4th of Nouember to Mouy, a Village upon the River of Oyse, about two leagues above la Fere; where so soon as he arriued, he received a letter from the Cardinal to leave the Army there, and come himself to Compiègne where the Court then was, that they might consult together, what resolution was to be taken, in case the Mareshall d'Hocquincourt should not hearken to the offers which were made him from the King, and receive the Enemy into those two so considerable places, upon the River of Somme.

Accordingly he went thether leaving the Army under my command, who was then the only Lieu^t Generall remaining with it, all the others having had leave given them before to go away, when they askt it, there being no probability of Action. By this accident I came to haue the command of the Army committed to me, at the very time when the Peace betwixt France and Cromwell was concluded and actually publish'd, and by which Treaty, I was by name to be banish'd France. The Army stayd at Mouy during some days, and there I received orders to march with it to Mondécour on the 10th of Nouember. That Town is betwixt Noyon and Chauny, and there I stayd till Mons^r. de Turenne return'd to the Army, which was about the 14th, when the affaire concerning M^r. d'Hocquincourt was wholly accommodated, and the Court was secur'd not to lose those two places. After which I obtain'd leave from Mons^r. de Turenne to go to the Court, the Army being at that time just ready to go into their winter-quarters, and no likelihood of any more action that Year; for as long as there was any, I thought myself obliged in honour not to quitt the Army, thō I knew the Treaty betwixt the Crown of France and Cromwell, by Vertue of which I was presently to leave the Country, was already sign'd on both sides.

The French Court was then at Compiègne, where I was received as kindly as ever, both the Queen Mother of France and the Cardinal making their apologies to me for the Treaty which they had concluded, and telling me they were Sorry the condition in which they were, had forced them to make an Alliance so contrary to their inclinations; but withall they assured me, I should not find the least alteration in their kindness, and they would still continue the same care which they ever had of me. The Cardinal acquainted me with the reasons which had induced him to this Peace, excusing it to me as a thing which he had been obliged to do, out of meer necessity for the service and safety of the Crown: for that, had he not then closed with Cromwell, the Spaniards had prevented him, by strikeing up an alliance with that Vsurper, having offer'd to assist him in taking Calais, which they would haue put into his hands. That therefore foreseeing the dangerous consequence of such a Treaty, he had upon the Same grounds concluded a Peace with Cromwell; and, that notwithstanding any proviso that might be made in it against me, I should still find the Same markes of his Master's esteem and kindness for me: And truely upon this occasion, I cannot but do the Memory of the Cardinal that Right to affirm, that he had been a very ill Minister, if he had not made that Treaty with Cromwell in such a juncture of affaires; and the King of France would haue had just reason to be ill satisfied with him, if he had missed that opportunity.

I stayd at Compiègne some few days, and then went to Paris, where I arrived the 23^d of November, and soon after the Court likewise return'd thether. And now thō, by the Treaty which they had newly made, I was not to stay in France, yet the Cardinal being willing (unwilling) to put that hardship upon me, who was so nearly related to the King of France, and Grandson to Henry the 4th, and apprehending likewise in case I should leave the Country, that he should not long retaine the 1655.

P A R T
II.

The Duke is received very kindly at Court and great apologies made to him for the Treaty with Cromwell.

Ibid.

The Cardinal's reasons for striking up a Peace with Cromwell.

Ibid.

The Duke justifies the Cardinal for the good Services done to the King his Master upon this occasion. OR: MEM: P. 2. p. 160.

The Duke returns from his 4th and last Campaigne in France to Paris the 23 Nov. Ibid.

P A R T

II.

1655.

Irish who were in the French Armys, propos'd to me, That, if I pleas'd, he would use his endeavours to perswade Cromwell to give his consent for me to remain in France, and to serue again in the Armys; assuring me at the same time, that in case he could not prevaile with him, my pension at least should be secur'd to me and punctually payd to whatsoever Country I went, provided I enter'd not into actuall seruice against France.

At the Cardinal's request Cromwell consents that the Duke should stay and serve in any of the French Armys except that of Flanders. On: MEM: P. 2: p. 160.

Vpon which it is offer'd to his R. H. to serve in Italy as Captⁿ Gen^l under the Duke of Modena.

Ibid.

The Duke accepts of the offer, and the thing was accordingly agreed upon to be put in execution the following Campagne, but was afterwards alter'd.

It was not long before the Cardinal received an answer from Cromwell to this effect, That he consented to my Stay in France, and to my Seruing in any of their Armys, excepting only that of Flanders; as not thinking it his interest that I should continue in that Army whither he was obliged by the Treaty to send a considerable body of men for the assistance of that Crown. Vpon which the Cardinal offer'd me to serue as Captain Generall under the Duke of Modena, who was generalissime of all the forces of France, Savoy, and Modena, in Piemont; which offer I willingly accepted of, because I was still desirous to be in the Armys, and there to improve my knowledge. And I was also the more inclin'd to Serue in that Country, because my Aunt the Duchess of Savoy desir'd to haue me neer her, and had written to the Queen her Sister concerning it, having on all occasions shewn a particular concern for me; And for these reasons it was so resolved at that time, but alter'd again before the next Campagne, of the reasons mention'd in the ensuing Part of these Memoires.

Thus ends the Relation given by his R. H. of the Campagne of 1655, which was the last he made in the French Seruice.

THE THIRD PART.

IN THIS year, 1656, about the beginning of February, the Princesse of Orange came to Paris to see the Queen her Mother, and his Royal Highness the Duke of York went to meet her betwixt Peronne and Cambray, and came along with her to Paris; where she was received with great civility by the Court, which came to meet her out of Town, and carryd her to the Palais Royal, where they left her with the Queen her Mother.

P A R T
III.

1656.
The P^{re} of Orange comes to Paris to See the Queen.
OR: MEM.
P. 3. p. 2.

Some few days after this, it being reported, that the King of England was to go from Colen into Flanders, all the Irish Colonells who had serv'd in the French Armys, under Mons^r. de Turenne and Mons^r. de la Ferté, hearing of it, writt to the Duke to offer him their Service and receive his directions what they should do; as being ready to obey his orders in any thing, that became men of honour and good Subjects. To which offers of theirs his Royall Highness return'd them his acknowledgments, recommending to them the care of keeping their Soldiers together, and by no means to permitt them to go into Flanders by piece meale, or in scattering partys, thō they might be invited So to do by Some from the Spaniards, upon the occasion of his Ma^{ties} being there; which would be of no advantage to them, but put them out of a capacity of serving their King with their whole Regiments, when any opportunity should present itself: besides, that their going off in such a

The Irish Colonells offer their service to the Duke.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 4.

P A R T
III.

1656.

A particular account of the handsome carriage of Co: Rich: Grace, when he quitte the Spanish Service.
Ibid. p. 5.

manner might be of prejudice to his affaires, while he continued in that Country, and that when it should be a proper time for him to make use of their offer, they should be sure to hear from him, in case they hearken to his Councell to keep their Regiments entire and full.

And here his R. H. takes particular notice in his Memoires of the handsome carriage of one of those Colonells, when he quitted the Service of the Spaniards. This gentleman by name Col: Richard Grace, after having seru'd the late King Charles the 1st till the surrender of Oxford, then going into Ireland, had there seru'd the King Charles the 2^d, so long as any part of that Island held out for him; when that Warr was ended, he obtain'd leave from the English Rebels to carry over a Regiment into Spain of his own Countrymen: The Regiment he brought over with him, consisting of above twelve hundred men; he procur'd a very favourable and honourable Capitulation for them: but as Soon as they arrived there, the Spaniards wholly broke the Capitulation they had made with him, and us'd his men so very ill, that before he could march them into Catalonia he had lost halfe his number. Notwithstanding which bad treatment, he serv'd in the Spanish Army with good reputation, till the end of the Campagne: At which time being left in garrison in a Castle upon the frontiers, which was a considerable post, and considering that by the ill usage he had received, and was like to receive for the future, he should in all probability lose the remainder of his Regiment; at the same time also, hearing that the King his Master was in France where he was honourably treated, and that his Royall Highness was also in the French Service, he resolv'd to Stay no longer with the Spaniards. Yet, notwithstanding that they had broken their Articles with him, he would not for his own sake do any thing unbecoming a gentleman, but would leave them fairly.

To which purpose he sent to the Mareshall d'Hocquincourt, who at that time commanded the French Army in Catalonia, to let him know, that on such a day, which was mention'd by him, he would march off with his Regiment on these conditions, that his Regiment might be upon the same foot with the Irish Regiments then in the French Service, and that they might be permitted to go and serve their own King, whensoever his affairs requir'd their Service: These conditions were easily accepted, and great offers made him in case he would deliver up the Castle; But that he absolutely refused, and only desir'd the Mareshall to send some horse on the day appointed to bring him off. When that time was come, he sent to the neighbouring garrison of the Spaniards to give them notice of his intention, that they might give order to some of their men to come and take possession of the Castle, as he march'd out of it, and that by his giving them this notice, they might perceive he intended only to march away with his Regiment, and not to deliver up the Castle to their Enemies; he also warn'd them, that they should not send above two hundred men till he was march'd out of it: for in case they gave him any reason to suspect, that they intended to betray him, he would give up the Castle to the French. This precaution of his secur'd him from their Sending any more troopes then he had desir'd, and as soon as they approached the place, he permitted them to enter at one gate, while he march'd out at the other, and went off to the French horse that waited for him.

But to returne where wee left. After this address, which was made to the Duke from the Irish Collonels, there came certain news, That the King was in Flanders, and that he had concluded a Treaty with the Spaniards; which made most people beleieve that his R. H. was also to go over to them: Upon which occasion, as he was one day talking with Mons^r. de Turenne (with whom he was used to speak very freely of his

M. deTurenne
advises the Duke to write to the King

P A R T
III.

1656.
his Brother, for leave to Stay and Serve in France.
OR: MEM:
P. 3: p. 7.

concerns) he advis'd him to write to the King his Brother, and to offer to his consideration, That having serv'd so long in France, and having received the greatest part of his education there, since his departure from England, it might be of great advantage to his Ma^{ties} Service, if his Royall Highness were permitted to continue there, that so he might keep up the intrest he had made, and the freindship he had contracted with many considerable persons both in the Court and Army; with whose assistance when a proper time should offer it self, he might be in a condition of doing his Ma^{ty} some service: wheras he should run great hazard of losing that intrest with his friends, and quite incapacitate him to make them usefull, either to the King or to himself, if he should go into Flanders where he could do his Ma^{ty} no great Service; That his Brother the Duke of Gloucester was there already, which ought to be enough to satisfy the Spaniards, especially since they had not desir'd the Duke's coming thither, nor so much as mention'd him or taken the least notice of him, in what had pass'd betwixt them and his Ma^{ty}; and in case they should desire the King to send for the Duke into Flanders, his Ma^{ty} might consent privatly to his R. H. stay in France, and seem publickly to be very much displeas'd with him, for not obeying those pretended commands, therby to keep faire with the Spaniards; and that this coñivence should be kept so secret, that no one person shou'd be privy to it, but only who should be sent with the proposition.

The Duke
communicats M.
de Turenne's advice to the Queen, and both approving of it, Charles Barclay is pitch'd upon to carry the proposall
to the King.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 8.
The Duke's appoint^{ed} in France 6000
pistoles a year,

This advice of Mons^r. de Turenne was so much approv'd by the Duke, having first communicated it to the Queen his Mother, who was also pleas'd with it, that he resolv'd to send Charles Berclay (Berkley) with all speed to make this proposition to his Ma^{ty}, charging him also to inform the King particularly of his present condition as to his subsistance; which considering all things was reasonably good, his Royall Highness having at that time an appointment of six thousand pistoles a year, well

payd, besides the helps he had by his Regiment of foot, and Troop of Scots Gendarmes, which together with what should be farther settled upon him when he should go into Piemont, would inable him to live at ease and with decency, till his Ma^{ty} should haue some occasion for his seruice in relation to England.

When the Duke had writt his letters and fully instructed Charles Barkly, in all he had to say in that affaire, just as he was ready to take his journy, he unfortunately broke his leg ; which obliged his R. H. to make use of Doctor Fraiser (who was then going to wait on his Ma^{ty}) to be the bearer of his letters, he having at that time none about him, whom he could spare, who was so fitt to be imployed in that business, or who was more in his confidence then the Doctor ; who indeed perform'd his part with all exactness, in representing to his Ma^{ty} who was then at Bruges, the reasons which mov'd his R. H. to make that proposition. But neither what the Doctor said, nor what the Duke had written, had the desired effect: for his Majesty, and his Ministers, would not be induced by any means to hear of his R. H. continuing either in any part of France or in the French Service ; and the King was so far from being willing to connive at it, that he presently layd his absolute commands upon the Duke, to come away to him into Flanders with all hast imaginable, thō (as has been already said) the Spaniards had not then desir'd it, or made any the least mention of the Duke to his Majesty.

Sir Henry Bennett, who was at that time the Duke's Secretary, and very inward with those that were in favour with the King, was the person sent to the Duke with his command ; which so soon as his R. H. had received, he writt back word immediatly, That he was ready to obey his Majesties orders without delay : and in pursuance of them, he sent to the French Court then at Compiègne, to inform them of the commands which he had

P A R T III.

1656. besides his Reg^t of foot and his troop of Scots Gen-darmes.
Ibid. p. 9.

Charles Barclay, fully instructed and ready to part with the Duke's letters, breakes his leg. Ibid.

The letters are Sent by Doctor Fraiser.
Ibid.

The King refuses to consent to the Duke's Stay in France, and lays his absolute commands on him to come away to him into Flanders with all hast.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 9.

Sir Henry Bennett is sent with this command to the Duke, who immediatly complying with his Ma^{ty}'s orders, sends for leave from the French Court, and prepares himself for his journy.
Ibid. p. 11.

P A R T

III.

1656.

Some false reports of the Duke credited by the King and his Ministers, are the occasion of pressing his journey.
OR: MEM:
P. 3: p: 11.

His R. H. declares he never had the least thought of sending Tuke into England.
Ibid. p: 12.
No ever so much as try'd to procure money from thence. Ibid.

The Factions at Court are the occasion of these reproche as the Duke plainly Shews by the following account.
OR: MEM:
P. 3: p: 13.

received from the King his Brother, and to desire their leave that he might go to him: which the Court readily consenting to, his R. H. began to set himself in order for his journey.

That which urg'd the Duke to make the greater speed, was the great desire he had to clear himself to his Majesty from some reports which had been made of him, and which had gain'd so much belief both with him and his Ministers, that they were the principal occasion of sending Sir Henry Bennett to hasten his journey; one of whose Instructions by word of mouth was to inquire of the Duke, Whither it was true, as his Ma^{ty} had been inform'd, that his R. H. intended to send Tuke into England to treat with Some persons there, and whither his Sister, the Princesse Royall, was not to furnish Tuke with money for his journey. When Sir Henry Bennett deliver'd this message, he told the Duke also, That had not he hinder'd it, his Ma^{ty} had put this Article into his written Instructions, so much he was perswaded of the truth of that report: By which it may be easily concluded, what Strange Stories were then both raised and credited concerning the Duke, and what groundless jealousies they had of him; he never having had the least thought of Sending either Tuke or any other man into England, or ever endeavouring to haue any correspondence there with any one, not judging it to be his business: nor did he so much as try to procure money out of England from the well affected there, who us'd from thence to supply his Ma^{ty}; of which supply's the Duke never had any part, excepting two hundred and fifty pounds which was brought over to the King by R. Nicholas from the Countess of Devonshire, with a desire that his R. H. might haue a share of it.

Yet how groundless soever these suspitions were, most certain it is, that they were credited, and therefore it will be necessary to shew, what the Duke had reason to believe was the occasion of them: In order to which wee must look backward with his

R. H. as far as his Ma^{ty} coming into France, after his miraculous escape from the battail of Worcester.

P A R T
III.

1656.

At the King's first coming to Paris, his Ma^{ty} made use of the Lord Jermyn, in most of his affaires, trusting him as far as any one in the management of his most Secret busines; which trust he continued to him, for some time after the coming over of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, S^r Edward Hyde, who by degrees gott the favour and entire confidence of his Ma^{ty}; which was also much farther'd by the King's freinds and Servants in England, who desir'd that their addresses might rather pass by him, then through the hands of any other person. This consideration principally together with the concurrence of some other accidents, increas'd his favour with the King so far, that by degrees he began to withdraw his confidence from the Lord Jermyn, and at last only to let him participate of such affaires, the knowledge of which was common to him, and all the Councill; which by litle and litle caus'd no very good understanding betwixt him and S^r Edward Hyde.

The King withdrawing his confidence from L^d. Jermyn, and Chancellor Hyde getting by degrees the entire favour of his Ma^{ty}, these two favorites become jealous of one another. Ibid.

There happen'd also about the same time another accident, to make the breach yet wider; which was the advice given by the Chancellor to the Countess of Morton (then Governess to the Princess Henriette) not to marry Sir John Berkley, because he judg'd it both improper and very inconvenient for either of them on severall reasons, which counsell he thought himself obliged to give as being very much a freind to both. But it was not so looked on by Sir John Berkley, who fell out with him upon it, and heighten'd the breach between him and the Lord Jermyn, hardly ever forgetting it, but being ever afterwards on all occasions his bitter Enemy.

Sir John Berkley falling out with the Chancellor sides with Lord Jermyn and widens the breach between them. OR: MEM: P. 3: p. 14.

And now this animosity betwixt the Chancellor and the Lord Jermyn, encreasing every day, caus'd at length some coldness to grow betwixt the King and the Queen his Mother,

The animosity of these two Factions occasion'd at last a coldness between the

P A R T
III.

1656.

King, and Queen Mother, the first supporting the Chancellor and the latter countenancing L^d Jermyn.
Ibid.

his Ma^{ty} looking on himself as obliged not to let the Chancellor suffer for the confidence which he had reposed in him; and her Ma^{ty} not thinking herself in the wrong to countenance the Lord Jermyn, who had so long serv'd her, and had her entire confidence, and the sole management of all her affaires. By this means there arose two factions in that unfortunate Court, which were not fully reconciled till some time after his Ma^{ties} happy restoration.

The Duke by being in the Army avoids happily entering into these Factions.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 14.

In the mean time it was very very difficult for the Duke so to fashion his behaviour, that he might equally perform his duty both to the King and to his Mother; and his taske had been much harder, had he not had good fortune, as he calls it, to be in the Army in the year, 1652, when most of this happen'd, So that when his R. H. came back, things had already taken their bent, and no hopes were left of a better understanding.

Attempts made to remove the Chancellor.
Ibid. p. 15.
The accusations against him being only the effects of malice, they strengthen the King's kindness to him.
Ibid. p. 16.

In the following year some attempts were made to remove the Chancellor, by accusing him of betraying his Ma^{ties} Counsell, and holding correspondence with Cromwell: but these allegations were so triviall and frivolous, that they manifestly appear'd to be nothing but the effects of malice against him, and therefore produced the contrary effects to those which some desired, and strengthen'd the King's kindness to him; as giving him just occasion to beleieve, that these suggestions against him, proceeded all from one and the same cause, namely, from the ambition which some people had, to enter in his room into the first trust of his Ma^{ties} affaires, if once they could remove him from that Station.

The Duke keeps himself still free from these Intrigues, but some of his Servants are led into them.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 16.
S^r Henry Bennett the Duke's Secr^y sides wth the

In the year 1654, his Ma^{ty} left France and went to Colen. During all this time the Duke kept himself out of these troublesome Intrigues, as much as possibly he could, and his being so frequently and so long together in the Armys was of great advantage and ease to him in that particular; but his domestick Servants were not altogether so free as himself, from entering into prejudices and partialitys, as being led into them, either by some Relations or intrest of some kind or other : For S^r Henry Bennett his Secretary, having had the same Employment under the Earle of Bristoll who was a great freind to the Chancellor, went along with him, in which resolution he was also confirm'd by some litle quarrells which had happen'd betwixt him and Sir John Berkley ; and as for Mr. Charles Berkley and Mr. Henry Jermyn, they took part with Lord Jermyn, by which means, thō really the Duke was not engag'd himself in these Intrigues, yet his having more kindness for Charles Berkley and Henry Jermyn then for any others, caus'd some to report and to look upon him as an Enemy to the Chancellor ; which together with his living so kindly with the Lord Jermyn (which he first began to do in obedience to his Ma^{ties} Commands) gave more occasion for those reports, and had made such an impression with those who had most credit with the King, that by that time the Duke came to Bruges, they gave beleef to severall malicious Storys which were forg'd, and were of the same nature with the Story already mention'd relating to Tuke. And 'twas this that put them upon a design of removing from about his R. H. all those Servants who were not entirely in their intrests, so Soon as he should arriue at Bruges.

1636.
Chancellor
and L^d Bristoll, in opposition to Sir John Berkley, who with Charles Berkley and Henry Jermyn was on Lord Jermyn's side.
Ibid.

The Duke having more kindness for Charl Berkley and Hen: Jermyn, then others, and living freindly with Lord Jermyn, was what gave occasion to the reports above mention'd, and make him be look'd upon as an Enemy to the Chancellor.

Ibid. p. 17.
'Tis also the occasion of the design which was taken of removing those Servants the Duke had a kindness for,
as soon as he should arrive at Bruges.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 17.

The King Sends the Marq. of Ormondeto Conde to command
the Duke's Regim^t. and L^d Muskerry, to quitt the French Service and repair immediatly to

AND now to return where wee broke off. His R. H. having, in pursuit of his Ma^{ties} order, gott himself in readiness to begin his journy about the beginning of September, he resolved in the first place to go to Compiegne and take his leave of the Court : At which time there happen'd an accident, which in any other Country might (haue) occasion'd great trouble to his R. H. which was, that the Marquess of Ormonde, at the request of the Spaniards, was sent by the King of England to the Town of Condé, then block'd up by them, and to be deliver'd up to them in a few days. The Marquess, when the garrison capitulated, sent in

P A R T
III.

1656. his Ma^y. This happening while the Duke was preparing for his departure might have occa-sion'd trouble to him. Ibid.
Lord Mus-kerry's answer.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 18.

The Duke
taking his leave of the Court at Compiègne, is promis'd the continuation of his pension in case he did not ingage in actual Service against France.
Ibid. p. 19.

The Duke perceives by the King's letters, that his Ma^y de-sir'd he should leave Sir John Berkley behind him. Ibid.

to his Nephew Muskerry, who had a Regiment of Irish there, and to S^r John Darcy the Duke's Lieu^t Collonel, to command them, in the name of his Ma^y, upon their marching out, immediatly to quitt the Service of the French and to repaire to him. To which Muskerry answer'd, That thō he had all the duty for his Ma^y, which a good Subject was obliged to haue, yet being already ingag'd in the French Service, he look'd on himself as bound in honour, before he left it, to ask his pass ; which he would immediatly, so soon as he should joyn the French Army : This message, as reasonably might be expected, made a great noise at the Court ; yet it hinder'd not the Duke's being very well treated there, when he came to take his leave . for they assured him, notwithstanding what the King of England had done in sending the Marquess of Ormonde on such an account to Condé, that he should still haue his pension constantly paid him, in case he did not ingage in actuall service against them.

After this, his R. H. returning to Paris, prepar'd himself in three or four days to sett forwards on his journey to Flanders. But before he left Paris, he found by severall letters which he receiv'd from the King his Brother, that his Ma^y desir'd he should leave S^r John Berkley behind him in that Town. Which thō not directly mention'd, his R. H. could not but take notice of, by the King's pressing him to make hast to him, saying particularly in one of his letters, That it concern'd his service very much that he should come immediatly to him, and that in case his mony busines or any other affaire he had, were not yet settled, he might however come away himself. and leave Sir John Berkley behind him to dispatch it. By this and many other expressions, the Duke plainly perceiv'd the design which was carryd on by some, to remove Sir John Berkley from his Service, and to bring in again Sir George Ratcliffe, an absolute creature of those who were most inward with his Majesty. But this their project did not take, for the Duke's affaires were so soon settled, that he obeyd his Ma^{ties} Commands by making all possible speed in coming to him, and yet he carryd Sir Johr Berkley along with him; as being certain that in case he should haue (left) him behind, it would haue prov'd very difficult for him to haue had him again, as he found by what happen'd after his arrivall at Bruges. •

On the 10th of September the Duke set out from Paris, all his equipage and servants, excepting two or three, having begun their journey two days before. That night his R. H. lodged at Verneuil with Monsieur de Metz; and the next day went in his coach to Clermont, intending there to take post, and to be that night at Abbeville where he should meet with his equipage and Servants. But as he came to the gate of Clermont, he met one whom he had sent before to provide post horses for him, who told him, that Lockart Cromwell's Ambassador was there, and lodg'd at the post house, it being the best Inne of the Town: upon which the Duke sent the same person again before him, with order, that the horses should be ready brought to the door of the post house. When he came thither, he commanded the Coach to stop, and got on horseback where he was, in the open street, continuing on his way without making the least stay in that place, but only to gett on his boots which he had in the Coach. And as he was much surpriz'd to find Lockart there, so was Lockart no less at his R. H. coming thither, as apprehending what might happen to him on the Duke's account, and being sensible how kind the generallity of the common people, as well as those of better quality, were to him, and what hatred and aversion they had to the English of Lockart's party. The allarm which Lockart took from this consideration, caus'd him to assemble all his Servants in the Inne where he was, with their swords and pistols, and all their horses were order'd to be ready Saddled, and bridled: As for himself, he stood at the 1656.

P A R T III.

The Duke obeys the King's commands going to him wth all speed, but he thought fitt to carry Sr John Berkley along with him.
O^r: MEM:
P. 3: p. 20.
The Duke sets out from Paris
y^e 10th X^{ber}.
Ibid.

He meets Lockart Cromwell's Ambass^r at the Post House at Clermont, his R. H. prudent behaviour and conduct on this occasion.
O^r: MEM:
P. 3: p. 21.

P A R T
III.

1656.

window in the inner part of the Inne which look'd just upon the gate, with the cheif of his Retinue about him. His hatt was off, and, for that reason, all the rest of them stood uncover'd ; 'tis probable he chuse to haue it so, therby to avoid the putting it off on the one hand, and to shun censure on the other, in case he should not uncover. His footmen, and a good Company of sturdy fellows, stood within the Court at the bottom of the Stairs. And it so happen'd, that the Coach wherein the Duke was, stopping just before the gate towards which the window fronted where Lockart stood, his R. H. saw him there: And it was not without reason, that he was apprehensive of what might happen to him, for before the Duke could get on horseback, almost all the people of the Town were gather'd together about him ; so that upon the least word or intimation that his R.H.had given, he verily beleev'd they would haue fallen upon the Ambassador.

The Duke arrives at Abbeville.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 22.

But that fright was of no long continuance, for the Duke made no stay when once he was on horseback ; and the Same night, as he had purpos'd, he joyn'd his equipage at Abbeville. And in this it happen'd, as it do's in many other things, that what was done by the Court in civility to his R. H. and to avoid any ill accident, had like to haue prov'd the occasion of one : for Lockart being at Compiègne was sent away to Clermont, which was not far distant from Court, meerly that he should not be present there at the Duke's arrivall ; and his R. H. staying in Paris a shorter time then the Court beleev'd he would, after he had taken his leave of them, was the occasion of his finding Lockart in that place.

His R. H. civilly entertain'd in all the places he passes, at Montreuil, Boulogne, and Calais.
Or: MEM:
P: 3: p. 23.
He is met at Gravelines by the Marq^e of Ormonde, which well-comes him into that Country.
Ibid.

From Abbeville his R. H. went to Montreuil, thence to Boulogne, and so to Calais, at all which places he was very civilly entertain'd. From Calais he went to diner at Gravelines, the first place upon that Coast, then belonging to the King of Spaine. There he was mett by the Marquess of Ormonde, according to the appointment of the King his Brother, and wellcom'd by him into that Country. The same night he went to Dunkerque, and the next day he arriv'd at Bruges, his Ma^{ty} and the Duke of Glocester coming out as far as Furnes to meet him.

P A R T
III.

1656.
He arrives at Bruges; the King and the Duke of Glocester come as far as Furnes to meet him.

Ibid.

Sir John Berkley is treated very coldly at Court, and all the pretences watch'd for to send him away.

Ibid.

And now it was not many days after the Duke's being at Bruges, that he was satisfied he was in the right to bring Sir John Berkley along with him; For thō, as to his own particular, he was us'd with great Civility, yet even his Ma^{ty} himself, as well as those about him, look'd very coldly on S^r John and treated him accordingly. So that it was evidently seen that those who had most credit with the King, were at watch for any pretence of sending him away: and this Storme did not only threaten him, but his Nephew and Henry Jermyn also, against whom there was no occasion to be found, but only their being neerly related to Sir John and the Lord Jermyn, and their being faithfull to the Duke and intirely trusted by him; so that if their design against these three Servants of his had taken effect, his R. H. had suffer'd more then would haue fallen to their share: for in what a miserable condition must he haue been, if he had permitted those in whom he had the most confidence, and for whom he had the greatest kindness, to be torne from him? and to haue had none remaining about his person, but such as he could not reasonably trust, and whom he knew to be the great promoters of these designs? who were so blinded, and carryd away by their private passions, interests, and animositys, that they consider'd not in the least the interests of their Master, if they were put in ballance with their own, to the compassing of which they were wholly bent; of which number were Sir Henry Bennett, and Henry Killigrew, who besides the malice which they had against their former fellow-servants, hop'd together with Sir George Ratcliffe to haue the management of the Duke's

What a hardship it was upon the Duke to haue his best Servants torn from him.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 24.

P A R T mony, and in time his favour also, when the others were once removed.
III.

1636.
To mortify the Duke they talk of an old English Custome, that it was not in his power to chuse his own Servants, which was a mistake.
Ox: MEM:
P. 3: p. 25.

The King presses the Duke to write to S^r Ja: Darcey to come with his Regim^t to Flanders, tho his R. H. assured his Ma^{ty} that it would haue no good effect, but be only a pretext to the Card^l to take away his R. H.^m pension.
Ibid.

And to shew that this was not the only design on foot to mortify the Duke, severall of the King's Servants and Ministers, began to talk of an old English Custome (as they pretended) that it was not in the Duke's power to make choice of his own Servants, but that it belong'd to the King to do it, which was a very great mistake in matter of fact; the case being very different betwixt a father and a brother, and betwixt a child, and one arriv'd at man's Estate.

But that no way might be left untryd to do his R. H. a prejudice, they prevail'd with his Ma^{ty} to press and command him, to write to Sir James Darcey to come into Flanders with his Regiment, notwithstanding that the Duke told his Majesty, he was certain his letter would be of no effect, because he knew very well that Sir James would not do it, thō Muskerri and the other Irish Collonels would obey; That without producing any good effect, such proposition would only make a noise in France, and serue the Cardinal for a pretence to take away the Duke's pension, which would not be very convenient for him, before he knew what would be done for him in the Country where he was; That as yet he had no assurance of serving there, the Spaniards not having yet hearken'd to any overture which had been made concerning it.

But all his R. H. reasons signified nothing, write he must: and that there was some other end in it, then meerely to procure that Regiment to come over into the service of the Spaniards, appear'd plainly enough from the litle care they took of conveying this letter to Sir James Darcey; for he had it not in six weeks after it was written, and had not then receiv'd it, had it not been for Charles Berkley who lay still at Paris, not being quite recovered of his broken leg, so that the Cardinal got notice of such a letter being written, and had time enough to confirm Sir James Darcy in his resolution of staying in France: So that when at length he receiv'd the letter, he not only excus'd himself, but hinder'd severall Officers from coming over, thō the rest obeyd and came away, when Muskerry with the other Collonels left the French Service.

And as the Duke was press'd at Bruges to many things of this nature which were of no advantage to the King, and yet might be of great prejudice to himself; so on the other hand, he receiv'd letters from Paris written to him from the Lord Jermyn, and others, dissuading him from entring into the Spanish Service, as a thing no way proper for him to undertake, having liv'd so long a time in France, and been treated there with so much kindness, and receiving at that time a pension from thence; These and other arguments they us'd to hinder him from ingaging with the Spaniards: But their reasons were so weak, that it was easy to find they were only plausible allurements suggested to them by the Cardinal, who hop'd that if his R. H. could be so managed as not to enter into the Service of the Spaniard, he should be able to retain the Irish still in France.

In short they prevail'd not with the Duke, for he answer'd them, That he look'd not on his obligations to France as such which could hinder him in honour from serving Spain, or any other Crown, in case he should design so to do for his own interest; and that thō he should not find his account in taking armes for Spain, yet if the King his Brother should command him, it was his duty to obey him; So that whither he consider'd himself as a Soldier of fortune, or as a Subject, in either case he could not conceive why it should be ill relish'd in France, whom Soever he Serv'd.

Not long after this, his R. H. accepted of the offers which were made him by the King his Brother, and the Spaniards, and enter'd into their service.

PART III.

1656.

Sr Ja: Darcy receiving the Dukes letter excuses himself, but Muskerry and the other Collonels obey and came away
OR: MEM:
P. 3: p. 26.
Letters are written from Paris to the Duke, dissuading him from entering into the Spanish Service. Ibid.

The Duke's Answer.
OR: MEM:
P. 3: p. 26.

The Duke accepts of the offers of the Spaniards, and enters into their Service. Ibid. p. 27.

PART
III.

1656.
The P^{re} of Orange comes from Paris to Bruges in Nov:
OR: MEM:
P. 3: p. 27.
Troubled to See the Duke ill us'd, she takes his part.
Ibid.

This affaire was but newly settled, when his Sister the Princesse Royall came to Bruges from Paris, about the end of November. She was not a litle troubled to see the Duke us'd in the manner above related, so that she took his part, and us'd all the credit she had for his assistance; which being observ'd by those in favour, and they also perceiving, that they could not prevaile with him by perswasions to part with Sir John Berkley, or any other, went now another way to work, resolving to lay hold on the first occasion, right or wrong, to find fault with S^r John, and then send him away: And what triuiall exceptions they were forced to lay hold on against him, and what just reason the Duke had to be scandaliz'd at their proceeding, will appear in the following instance.

Not many days before Christmas, his Ma^{ty} went to Bruxelles, to settle his affaires of the greatest concernment with the Spaniard, leaving the Duke in the mean time at Bruges, to bear his Sister company.

The Spaniards resolve to put an oath of fidelity to all the King's Subjects, to be true to them.
Ibid. p. 28.

On Christmass eve the King return'd, and the same night the Duke being inform'd by the Lord Muskerry, that the Spaniards had resolved to administer an oath of fidelity to all such as came over to the Kings Seruice, by which they should be obliged to be faithfull to the Spaniards, his R. H. was much scandaliz'd at it, as a hardship which was never impos'd upon the Prince of Condé's troopes, or those of Lorraine, and which might prove prejudiciall even to the King; because it might in reason startle those who were now upon quitting the French Seruice, meerly out of duty to him, if they saw they were to be ingaged in oath to the Spaniards preferably to him, on which termes it was likely they would not come over.

The Duke
scandaliz'd at this hardship put on the King's Subjects contrary to his Ma^{ty} Seruice,

When this was first told to the Duke, he could hardly beleeeve it; but meeting in the presence Chamber with the Earle of Bristoll, who was the person by whom the King had been perswaded to consent to it, the Duke told him of the report and inquir'd of him, what truth there might be in it? Vpon which question, the Earle of Bristoll flew out into a very high passion, saying, That whoever had inform'd the Duke of it, was a Traitor to his Ma^{ty} and a Villain, and that it could be told him of no other end, then to set him against it, which would be ruinous to the King's affaires. He us'd many other passionate expressions, which can scarce (be) call'd arguments, to make it appear a monstrous crime in him who had thus inform'd the Duke; thinking, as he had reason to beleeeve, that this had come from Sir John Berkley, and that he had not only given his R. H. notice of it, but had also given him bad impressions concerning it.

The Earle of Bristoll spoke So loud, that his Ma^{ty}, who was in the same room, and at not great distance, heard all he said; and coming to the Duke, he took part with the Earle of Bristoll, further telling his R. H. that now he might plainly see how ill affected they were to the Spaniards, and to himself, who had inform'd him of that Oath, which must needs haue been represented to him out of an ill intent. After which the King press'd him to name the person who told it him: from which the Duke excused himself, and sayd, He hop'd his Ma^{ty} would pardon him, if he did not name him, after what had been said by My Lord Bristoll, it being now almost as much as to accuse him of high treason; That his R. H. very well saw who was pointed out by the Earle, but it was not the first time he had been mistaken, for that upon his word it was not Sir John Berkley; and that, if the matter were well consider'd, it would be found almost impossible for him to haue had so speedy a knowledge of it; 'That he was about to haue nam'd the person to the Earle, at the very beginning of his discourse, but that he grew into so great a heat, and flew out into such disrespectfull expressions, that afterwards his R. H. thought fitt to say no

P A R T III.

1656.
asks L^d Bristoll what truth was in it?
OR: MEM:
P: 3. p. 28.
The E. of Bristoll passionat and disrespectfull answer to the Duke in the King's presence Chamber.
Ibid. p. 29.

The King
joyns with the E. of Bristoll in his opinion and presses the Duke to name the person who told him of the Oath.
OR: MEM:
P: 3: p. 29.

The Duke
assures y^e King on his word, that it was not S^r John Berkley, but excuses himself from naming the person.
Ibid.

P A R T

III.

1656.

more, but withall he was certain, if he had nam'd the man, no farther noise had been made of it; That for what concern'd the thing it self, it was certainly no crime for any man to tell it him, for that his Ma^y having once resolv'd on it, his R. H. thō his own opinion was against it, did nothing to hinder the thing from being done.

Lord Bristoll finding himself mistaken in the man he aim'd at, grew calm and askd his R. H. pardon.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. P. 30.

When My Lord Bristoll had heard the Duke's answer, and saw he was mistaken in the man at whom he aim'd, he grew calme, and, before the King, ask'd his R. H. pardon, if the Zeal he had for the Kings service had made him forgett himself so far, as to say any thing which was unbecoming the respect he ow'd him: Thus that Conversation ended.

And now as to (the) Oath itself, the Duke verily beleev'd that had it been never so litle opposed, the Spaniards would not haue insisted on it, as they did. And farther, had not my Lord Bristoll (without any such intention) put a jealousy into their heads, as if the King design'd to haue had an Army according to the present example of the Prince of Condé, and the Duke of Lorraine; by proposing first to them the making up of a body of ten thousand men, to be commanded by the Duke with cañon and all other necessary provisions, the consequences of which the Spaniards had already felt to their cost; they had never imposed such an Oath upon all his Ma^{ties} troopes, nor afterwards given them so small encouragement, notwithstanding their promises to the contrary: all which proceeded from their apprehensions, least that body of foot should grow too considerable, and by that means become formidable to them.

Lord Bristoll
after a long preamble of protestations of freindship, advise the Duke to order

And now the day after what had pass'd betwixt the Duke and the Earle of Bristoll, that Lord came to him in his chamber, and desir'd to speak alone with him: After which, he began with a long preamble of the great duty and esteem he had for his R. H. and, if he might presume to Say it, a great kindness for his person, besides what he ow'd him on other accounts; and then he assur'd him, that not only himself, but his two freinds, the Marquess of Ormonde and the Chancellor, would put him at the head of all affaires, if he would please but to follow their aduice, and be kind to them. After much inlarging upon that Subject, he turn'd his discourse, and began to speak to his R. H. concerning Sir John Berkley, proffering to be very much his freind, and that he would be ready to Serve him in all things which lay within his power; for which reason he desir'd his R. H. if he had any kindness for Sir John, that he would be pleas'd to order him to withdraw himself for some time, the King being so much incensed against him, that his longer stay would but increase his displeasure, and make his reconciliation the harder; whereas a litle absence, and his making thos acknowledgments which he ought, might in a short time restore him to his Ma^{ties} favour and good opinion. But when by the Duke's answer, he perceiv'd his Rhetorique could not prevaile with his R. H. to consent to that proposition, he then told him in another kind of tone, That it was the King's absolute pleasure Sir John Berkley should withdraw, and that his Ma^{ty} was so firmly resolv'd on that point, that there was no remedy, but go he must: and besides, That the King had said so much to Don John of his being dissaffected to the Spaniards, and had made such impressions in him by those discourses, that it was now no longer in his Ma^{ties} power, thō he should desire it, to retain him any longer in the Country. At last he concluded with Saying, That he would repeat all this to Sir John Berkley, and advise him as his freind to submitt patiently to it, and use his best endeavours to gain his consent.

To this long discourse, the Duke only answer'd, That he was sorry that such ill offices had been done to Sir John Berkley, both in relation to his Ma^{ty} and to Don John; That it was a

P A R T
III.

1656.
Sir Jo: Berkley
to withdraw.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 31.

Finding the Duke was not to be prevail'd upon by his Rhetorique, he then told his R. H. plainly, it was the King's absolute pleasure.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 33.

The Duke's modest answer to the Earle of Bristol.
Ibid.

P A R T busines of such a nature, that should he give his consent to it,
III. it would lessen him very much in the esteem of the world ;
 1656. for how should he be look'd on in case he abandon'd his innocent Servants, at least so reputed by him, to the malice of their Enemies? And how could he ever expect for the future, that any one would haue any manner of dependance on him, when they should haue such an example of his R. H. weakness before their eyes.

E. Bristoll delivers the same Message to Sir Jo.
 Berkley.

OR: MEM:

P. 3: p. 33.

The P^{re}Royall troubled at this affaire, for the sake of both her Brothers, yet advises the Duke to stick firm to his old Servant.

Ibid.

The same Counsell given him by all his freinds and by every body but Lord Bristoll
 and his faction.

Ibid.

In this difficult juncture, to avoid coming to heats wth the King, his R. H. resolves to withdraw privatly into Holland.

OR: MEM:

P. 3. p. 33.

With this answer, the Earle went from the Duke and deliver'd his message to Sir John Berkley : And now the matter was no longer a Secret, for it had taken wind, and was the common discourse of the Family ; so that before night the Princesse Royall tooke notice of it to the Duke, as being very much troubled at it for the sake of both her Brothers, and very apprehensive of what might be the issue: However she advis'd him upon the whole to stick firm to his old Servant, and not to consent to his departure. The same Counsell his R. H. had given him from all his freinds ; there was the old Lord Balcarras, and others, and indeed every body, excepting my Lord Bristoll and his freinds, sayd the same thing to him.

Wherupon seeing that it was not in his power to keep Sir John any longer with him, and that if he should dispute the matter any further, it might occasion some heats betwixt his Ma^{ty} and him, which for his own part he was resolved by all manner of ways to avoid, he thought the best thing he could propose to himself in so difficult a juncture, was to withdraw privatly to Holland, hoping to obtain while he was absent, what he was certain would be denyd him, remaining there. Having then consulted with Sir John Berkley, Harry Jermyn, and Charles Berkley, concerning the manner of doing it, it was resolv'd, that in order to facilitate the Duke's design, his R. H. should consent to the absence of Sir John Berkley, and that two days after he had withdrawn himself, the Duke should follow as privatly as he could,

After this resolution was once taken, the Duke declared his consent that Sir John Berkley should go; which surprized all his freinds exceedingly, they not knowing his private intentions: and particularly he was much reproched by his Sister for it, and blam'd by all the rest, which he bore as patiently as he could, not telling them the true reason why he gave his consent to the departure of his Servant. And that which help'd the better to disguise his intention of leaving the Country, was the trouble which was apparent in his countenance; which every one interpreted to be caus'd by his being forced to part with S^r John Berkley, when indeed it was for being constrain'd in a manner to withdraw himself, as having no other way remaining, to preserve to himself the right he had to be master of his own family, and to keep his reputation.

There was also another consideration which fortifyd very much the resolution his R. H. had taken, which proceeded from the Stories the Earle of Bristoll had told him, concerning the ill opinion which Don John had conceived of Sir John Berkley, and how far he was unsatisfied with him for being so much a Frenchman, which caus'd the Duke to apprehend, that he might have the same opinion concerning himself; which if so, he was certainly to expect no extraordinary good usage in that Country. And therefore all things consider'd, his R. H. was fully determin'd to persist in the resolution he had taken to withdraw; and accordingly every thing was prepar'd in order to the putting his design in execution, in the manner following, as it is related by the Duke himself in his Originall Memoires of the ensuing year.

P A R T III.

1656.

Having concerted his retreat with S^r Jo: Berkley, Char: Berkley and Harry Jermyn, the better to cover his design, he declares his consent to let the first go.

Ibid. p. 34.

He bears patiently the reproches of his Sister and blame of all his freinds, for abandoning his Servant.

Ibid.

E. of Bristoll's Stories of the ill opinion Don John had of S^r Jo: Berkley, and the apprehension that Don John might have the same opinion of himself, confirm'd his R. H. in his resolution of withdrawing.

OR: MEM:

P. 3. p. 35.

PART
III.

1657.
Sir Jo: Berkley parts from Bruges the 2 or 3 of January, and 2 or 3 days after, the Duke follows him.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 35.
He is alarm'd by a message from his Sister, the morning of his departure.
Ibid.

The Duke imparts nothing of his design to his Sister, and why.
OR: MEM:
P. 3 p. 36.

ON THE two or three of January 1657, Sir John Berkley went from Bruges, with order to stay for the Duke at Flushing, and within two or three days after, his R. H. follow'd him. On the morning of his departure, rising somewhat earlier then his ordinary houre, he call'd up his Brother the Duke of Glocester, as if he had intended to go out a shooting: But before he was ready, his Sister sent up to him to desire, that ere he went abroad, he would come and speak with her; which alarm'd him not a litle, and caus'd him to imagine, that she had some suspition of what he intended to do, and would endeavour to dissuade him from it. With this beleef he went to see her, and had not the room been somewhat dark (she being in bed) she could not but haue taken notice of the disorder in which he was, when he first enter'd into her chamber, and by it haue suspected his design. But so soon as she began to speak to him, he was freed from his apprehensions; her busines being only to advertize him of a quarrell which she beleev'd was betwixt two of their Servants, that so his R. H. having notice of it, might prevent their fighting. After this he went out from her, not having said any thing to make her suspect the least part of his intention; for thō he was assured that she was too much his freind to haue hinder'd his departure, in case she could not haue prevail'd upon him with her arguments to stay; yet even for her own sake, he would not acquaint her with his design, as being apt to beleieve that she would haue had her share in the advising part of it; so that if she should now happen to be question'd concerning it, she might be able to affirme with truth, that she was wholly ignorant of his purpose to go away.

Before the Duke gott on horseback, he went and waited on his Ma^y, and from thence after a short stay, he and his Brother

He waits on
the King
before he go's.
Ibid.

the Duke of Gloucester went out of the Town, taking their way towards Sluyce, for his R. H. pretended to shoot in that side of the Country. He took along with him Harry Jermyn and Charles Berkley, with two or three of his under servants, in whom he had the greatest confidence, leaving behind him Sir Henry Bennett and Harry Killigrew, whom he durst not trust, with all the rest of his family. And being come to a Village near Sluyce, he pretended to his Brother, that (he) was to meet some body who was come out of England about affaires of great importance, and had appointed to speak privately with him at Sluyce; That if he would go to the Downes, and shoot for an hour or two, he would return and find him out; but that in case he came not according to the time he nam'd, he desir'd he would stay no longer for him, but return to Bruges, where he intended to be also before the shutting of the Gates.

His R. H. having thus parted with his Brother, he went to Sluyce, where he made no stay; but passing directly through the Town, went over into the Isle of Cassant, where leaving his horses, with orders to follow him, he reached Flushing before night. There he found Sir John Berkley, and went on the same night to Middlebourg. Being in that Town he resolved to make what hast he could to Vtrecht, having at that time a purpose of going into France by the way of Germany, to avoid passing through any of the Spanish Dominions. But it then happening to freeze very hard, he was forced to take his way by Tervere, Ziriczee, Bommene, Sommerdyke, Helvoet Sluys, the Briel and Maesland Sluys; the ordinary (way) being all shutt up with yce.

To Tervere therfore the Duke came next morning, where finding a lusty French Ship which was ready to set sayle for France, Sir John Berkley propos'd their embarking upon her, that by venturing that way they might save so great a journey

P A R T III.

1657.

He pretends to go a shooting and carries the Duke of Gloucester abroad with him.

Having parted with his Brother near Sluyce, he went that night to Flushing wth Harry Jermyn and Ch: Berkley, where he joynd S^r John Berkley and went on to Middlebourg. Ibid. p. 37.

Next Morning to Tervere, where he's advis'd to profite of a French Ship that was there

P A R T
III.

1657. ready to Snye to France, but is dissuaded by Charles Berkley.
OR: MEM:
P. 3: p. 37.

as they had to take by land. But Charles Berkley oppos'd this Counsell, by representing the danger of the Sea at that time of the year, and the hazard his R. H. should run, in case they mett with any English man of Warr; whose custome it was to search any stranger's Ships, to see if they had any English Seamen on board of them, and if they found any such, to take them out: and thō it might so happen, that they should not know the Duke, yet they might carry them all away, as being their Countrymen.

The Duke continues his journey to Holland.
Ibid. p. 38.

In crossing in an open boat to Helvoet Sluys, he is in great danger, and like to be driven out to Sea with the ycc. Ibid.

Sir Jo: Berkley is sent from Maesland Sluys to the Hague, to know if his R. H. might stay privatly in the Country for some few days.
OR: MEM:
P. 3: p. 39.
The Duke continues his journey to Vtrecht. Ibid.

These reasons prevail'd with his Royall Highness, and so he continu'd on his journey; and imbarking there on an ordinary passage-boat, he got that night to Ziricksee, and from thence by waggon to Bommene: And the same night going on board again of a small passage-boat, he landed next morning on the Island of Sommerdyke, and crossing it in waggons, embark'd once more at the Town it self for Helvoet Sluys. He went in an open boat which was the last that ventur'd over, the water being then almost chock'd up with yce; and the hazard was thought to be so great, that all the people of the Town came out and stood upon the shore to see them go: And indeed there was so much yce, that they had great difficulty in getting over, and they once fear'd they should be driven out to Sea; But at length after much struggling, they landed about a league below Helvoet Sluys, and the same day reach'd the Brill. The next day they pass'd over to Maesland Sluys, from whence his R. H. sent Sir John Berkley to the Hague, to know if he might haue the liberty of staying privatly in the Country for some few days, without having any notice taken of him. Sir John, when he was sent on this busines, had directions to follow the Duke to Vtrecht, whither his Royall Highness continued on his way; and they (then) after his arriuall there, Sir John Berkley came thither to him, and inform'd him, that he might stay in safety according to his desire.

P A R T
III.

The Duke continued in that Town a day or two ; during which time, considering again what resolution it were best for him to take, at length he concluded on writing to his Ma^{ty}, to inform him of his reasons for absenting himself, and to continue therabout, till the Messenger he sent with his letter should return ; and not to pursue his intended journey into France, in case he should receive a good answer. In the mean time that he might be more privat, he went to Zuleystein, where he was very kindly entertain'd by the master of it ; who was a very honest Gentleman of the Duke's acquaintance, and a natural Son to Henry Prince of Orange, who had marryd Mrs. Killegrew a maid of honour to the Princesse Royall, some years before. Having stayd with him a week, he was invited by another acquaintance Mr. Vandernatt to Dieren, where he was housekeeper to the Prince of Orange.

1657.
From Vtrecht he writes to the King, and resolves to wait his Ma^{ty}'s answer, before he pursu'd his intended journey into France. Ibid.

He is invited to Dieren by Mr. Vandernatt.
ON: MEM:
P: 3. p. 39.

From Dieren hego's with Mr. Vandernatt to see a wedding at Amsterdam. Ibid.

While the Duke was there, Mr. Vandernatt was invited to a wedding at Amsterdam ; and his R. H. taking only Harry Jermyn along with him, went thither in his company, being sure that nobody there would know him, and having a desire to see that Town again, and to haue the divertissement of seeing the ceremonys of a wedding in it, which are very formall, and continue for severall days : But having seen enough to satisfy his curiosity in two days space, he return'd to Dieren, and from thence to Zuleystein, where he had the first account of what had pass'd at Bruges, on the occasion of his departure thence.

So soon as they saw the Duke of Glocester return'd, and that his R. H. came not back by the shutting of the ports, they presently suspected the truth of the whole matter. Vpon which his Ma^{ty} the next day dispatch'd away the Marquess of Ormonde after him into Zealand ; who, upon his arriual there, finding the Duke was gone forward into Holland, return'd and gave his Ma^{ty} an account of it. Some days after, the King

P A R T
III.

1657.

hearing that his R. H. had thoughts of going into France by the way of Colen (Cologne) sent Coll. Blague to meet him there, and perswade him to return, with offers of giving him all sort of Satisfaction. But afterwards, finding by the Duke's letters that he had then no such intentions, but was still in Holland, his Ma^{ty} again dispatched the Marquess of Ormonde to him, to offer severall things in order to his return; but not with proposals altogether so satisfactory, as those which had been sent before by Collonell Blague.

The Duke receives the King's letters by My Lord of Ormonde at Zuleystein, and is so well Satisfied with them, that he presently took his resolution to return to Bruges.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 41.

My Lord of Ormonde found the Duke at Zuleystein newly return'd from Dieren; and, delivering his Ma^{ties} letters to him, gave his R. H. so much satisfaction, that he told him he resolv'd next day to go so far in his way to Bruges, as Breda. The substance of the message was, That his Ma^{ty} assur'd him, if he would return, not only himself but all his Servants should be treated with all kindness, so that he should haue no further occasion to complain; That as to Sir John Berkley, for the present he should stay in Holland, but that within a month, he might haue free leave to come and wait upon his R. H. again, and that things past should be forgotten.

His R. H. returns to Bruges, and is receiv'd very kindly by the King.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 41.
He dismisses Harry Kille-grew and Sr Hen: Bennett from his Seruice. Ibid.

Being come to Breda, his R. H. made no stay in that City, but the next day continued on his journey for Bruges, where he was received very kindly by the King. And now immediatly after his return, being inform'd how disrespectfully Harry Killegrew had spoken of him, and how ill he had behav'd himself during his absence, he dismissed him from his seruice; and also Sir Henry Bennett, who soon after was sent Enuoye into Spain by his Ma^{ty}, to make him amends for the place of Secretary, which he had lost with the Duke: so that now his R. H. had none left in his family, but such as were absolutly his own.

Sir Jo: Berkley returns to

About a month after this Sir John Berkley return'd to Bruges, according to what had been agreed, and not long afterwards, at the Duke's request he was made a Lord. About the same time the Princesse Royall left Bruges, and went for Holland, and at the beginning of the Spring, his Ma^{ty} and all his Court remov'd to Bruxelles. Where when the Duke arriv'd, he found that to be true which had been told him before by Father Peter Talbott a Jesuite, who was then very intimate with Don Alfonso de Cardennas, which was, That Don John had never said any such things to the Earle of Bristoll, concerning his R. H. and the Lord Berkley, as the said Earle had reported to him; That it was true, ill offices had been endeavour'd to be done to both, which at first had made some impression; but that Don John, and more especially the Marquis of Caracena, and Don Alfonzo de Cardennas, were soon satisfied of the untruth of those suggestions, which consequently had prov'd of advantage both to his R. H. and to the Lord Berkley, and had done no good to the Earle of Bristoll.

P A R T
III.

1657.
Court, and at the Duke's request is made a Lord. Ibid.
The P^{re} of Orangereturns to Holland, and the King and Court remove to Bruxelles. Ibid.
The Duke at Bruxelles finds out the falsehood of some of the E. of Bristoll's stories. Ibid.

This with other indiscretions of his, caus'd the two Spanish Ministers not only to loose the opinion they had formerly conceived of him, but also to be very much unsatisfied wth him, and that not without occasion. For at his first coming into the Country, being very perfect in the Spanish tongue, and exceeding dextrous in all the arts of insinuation, and gaining the favour of great men (thō not of keeping them) and being also employd by his Ma^{ty} about most of his affaires, he wrought himself very far into the good opinion and favour of Don John, and into the esteem of the other two. Which he finding, was not yet satisfyd; but by flattering Don John, and feeding his humour, (who was somewhat curious in Astrology) by casting his nativity, and talking perpetually to him of Crowns and Scepters, by which pleasing kind of discourses, he suppos'd his credit to increase with him, and his interest to be greater

E. Bristoll by his indiscretions loses himself with the Spanish Ministers, and how.

P A R T then really it was, So that he endeavour'd to advance himself
III. to the management of the affaires of that Country, even to 1657. the other Ministers ; which, they perceiving, soon put an end to those his vain imaginations, and made so true a picture of him to Don John, that he also, either out of prudence, seeing the jealousy which the other two had of him, or that he was really convinced of the character which they had given of him, gave over his conversation, and would haue no more to do with him.

Thus the Earle of Bristoll fell again, as he had done before in other Countries, from the hopes he had conceived of being at the head of affaires, into his first circumstances. And now since wee haue mention'd this particular, wee shall also relate here, how the Earle lost himself in France according to the account the Duke had thereof at the first bound.

A particular
 account of the
 E. of Bristoll's behaviour in France, and how he lost himself there also by his im-prudence, and ingratitude to the Cardinal.
 OR: MEM:
 P. 3: p. 43.

At his coming into France, which was about the first warr of Paris, or somewhat before it, in the year 1649 ; he, as became one who was obliged to quitt his Country for the sake of his Loyalty, follow'd the Court, and in a skirmish against the Parisians, where the P^{ce} of Condé was present, neer the Bois de Vincennes, very fortunatly for himself, receiv'd a shott through the thigh, upon which accident more notice and care was taken of him, then otherwise had been : and being a man of quality, and recommended by the Queen of England, he had an Employment given him in the Army ; about the year 1651 he was made a Lieu^t Generall, and somewhat before the breaking out of the Second Warr of Paris in 1652, when the Duke of Nemours had brought some troopes out of Flanders to joyne the Princes Army, passing the Seyne at Mante, the Duke of Sully for giving passage to them, was turn'd out of that Government, and the Earle of Bristoll put into his place : which sufficiently shew'd the great trust and confidence which the Cardinal repos'd in him, by giving him so considerable and so profitable

a Command. P A R T
III.

That summer, in July, the Court went to Pontoise, and continued there, and at Mante, for the most part, till their returne to Paris. And soon after their arrivall to Pontoise, the Cardinal went from thence out of France: Not long after this, some of the Court who were desirous of keeping him away, endcavour'd to set up a third party, the better to satisfy themselves in that design, and gave themselves the name of True Frenchmen; pretending they were against the returne of the Cardinal for no other reason, then that they were sensible that whenever it happen'd, it would be of exceeding prejudice to the King's affaires. This pretence being very plausible, many considerable persons of the Court, and more particularly those of the long robe, were concern'd in it; and amongst the rest, the Earle of Bristoll, forgetting not only that he was a Stranger, but also the obligations which he had to the Cardinal, ran along with those people, and was so indiscreet as one day to give the Queen this very advice, Of not permitting the Cardinal ever to return: Upon which he wholly lost himself both with the Queen and Cardinal; wheras had he continued steady in their interests, as he ought in reason to haue done, and only obeyd, without taking upon him to advise, he had certainly in a short time been made Marshell of France: in stead of which, upon the Cardinal's return, at the end of that long Campagne, his Government was taken from him, both his Regiments (for the raising of which he had received mony in the summer) were reformed, and no recompence given to him, as was to others. And upon occasion of an indiscreet action done by him, either out of the love which he had, or thought he had, for the Duchess of Chatillon, he retir'd soon after into the South of France; but whither of his own free motion, or by order of the

P A R T Court, is uncertain. There he liv'd privatly till the Campagne III. of the Seige of Pavie in the Milanoise, at which Seige he 1657. seru'd as Lieu^t Generall under the Duke of Modena, Generall of the French troopes in that Country, and the next year went to his Ma^{ty} in Flanders.

But to returne where wee left. The Time was now drawing on for the next Campagne, which was his R. H. first Campagne in the Spanish Service, wherof he himself gives the following Account.

THE DUKE'S FIFTH CAMPAGNE, AND THE FIRST HE SERV'D IN THE SPANISH ARMY.

AMONGST the preparations for this CAMPAGNE, that which the King my Brother and I did cheifly labour for, was the making up of his Ma^{ties} six Regiments of foot; wherof one was English, one Scotch, and the rest Irish, which were compleated to above two thousand men, all of them drawn out of France, which was a double service to the Spaniards. And if they had thought fitt to perform what they had promis'd, which was but a pistole a head, and armes for every man that came over, with good usage afterwards, these troopes would certainly haue increased to twice that number at their going into the feild. But notwithstanding this peice of Service in bringing them from France, and the facilitating the Spaniards retaking St Guilain at the latter end of winter, while the King was yet at Bruges, by the intelligence which his Ma^{ty} had there with the Irish Regiments garrison'd in that Town, without which, it had been impossible to haue taken it at that Season of the year; yet they had conceiv'd such jealousy that the King's troopes were too numerous, that they gave them all manner of discouragment: for which reason their numbers could not be increased, and indeed it was all could be done, to keep them as strong as when I march'd them into the feild at first, to joyne the Spanish Army.

P A R T
III.

1757.

Two thousand of the King's Subjects Serve under the Duke in Flanders this Campagne.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. P. 45.
They had been double that number, if the Spaniards had not given them all manner of discouragment. Ibid.

P A R T
III.

1657.
The jealousy of the Spaniards fomented by the P^r of Condé.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 46.

This jealousy of theirs was fomented by the Prince of Condé, who had so lately gott the better of Mons^r. de Lorraine, and procur'd him to receive the usage which was known to every one, therby to make himself more necessary to the Spaniards: so he apprehended, that if the King's troopes should become too considerable (foot being what the Spaniards wanted most) he himself might in his turne receive the same usage; and therefore thō he liv'd in all appearance well with the King, yet he endeavour'd all he could to increase the jealousy of the Spaniards, and to hinder by all other means the growing of our troopes.

These jealousies occasion'd in part by the unreasonable proposalls of the E. of Bristoll.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 47.

There was also another motive to their jealousies, which was, that the Earle of Bristoll had made unreasonable propositions to them, when he was first imployd by his Majesty to negotiate with Don John, concerning the forming of a body of men for him in Flanders: For he, being sent from the King who was then at Bruges to treat of that affaire, talk'd of nothing less then an Army of ten thousand horse and foot, with a train of Artillery proportionable; which so allarm'd the Spanish Ministers, as would haue render'd it altogether impossible to be effected if design'd, And by this extravagant proposall, he was so far from advancing his Ma^{ties} affaires, that he gave the Spaniards occasion to be jealous of our growth.

The Duke
disabuses the Spanish Minister, concerning all the Stories rais'd of him. Ibid.

While I stayd at Bruxelles, I satisfied them so well, concerning all the Stories which had been rais'd of me, that Don John and the Ministers had no ill opinion of me, and the Prince of Condé liv'd with me very civilly. And now before my going to the Army, the Earle of Bristoll procur'd his Ma^{ty} to do a thing, which in itself was plausible enough, but the intension of it was to do me a displeasure: It was the ingaging Mons^r. de Marsin into his seruice, and making him Lieu^t Generall of all his forces, which either were or should be rais'd; with an intension, that he should be immediatly under me both

E. Bristoll
procures of the King, to make
M^r. de Marsin Lieu^t Gen^l of all his Ma^{ties} forces, and in Flanders and in England, in case any opportunity should call us thither : So that the King being above me, and Mons^r. de Marsin the next under me, I might haue the less power and authority, or rather be made a meer Cypher. And to make him the more absolutly his, the Lord Bristoll prevail'd also with his Ma^{ty} about the end of that year, to recompence him before hand for seruices to be done in England, by making him Knight of the Garter: And had not the Chancellor hinder'd it, he had also obtain'd for him (himself) the quality of an English Earle, which had yet been more extraordinary then the first. Thō truely the man of himself was a very good Officer as any I knew, and had the reputation of being so both in France and Flanders, and in all places where he had serv'd ; yet rewarding him before hand with such extraordinary marks of honour, was a thing unusuall.

P A R T
III.

1657.
Knight of the Garter, in view of future seruices. Ibid.

The season of the year now call'd us into the feild ; and the beginning of this Campagne prov'd very glorious to the Prince of Condé, For as he was at la Bussiere upon the Sambre, which is distant about sixteen or eighteen leagues from Cambray, being the place appointed by him for the Rendezvous of all his horse, where he was to view them before their coming to the generall Rendezvous ; he had word brought to him, that the French Army under the command of Mons^r. de Turenne and Mons^r. de la Ferté, had beseiged Cambray, which place he knew was very ill provided of a garrison ; wherupon he immediatly marched away, to endeavour the releeving it before the French could haue intelligence of his coming, or haue So perfected their Lines, as to hinder him from entering into the place and releeving it. And he order'd his march So exactly, that he came thither in the night, and found a very litle opposition : For thō the French were on horseback, and ready to receive him, yet he charg'd vigourously throw the two Lines of horse which he encounter'd in his way, who were

A braue action of the P^{ce} of Condé in releeving Cambray, be-seig'd by M^r. de Turenne, and la Ferté.
ON: MEM.
P. 3. p. 48.

P A R T
III.

1657.

not able to resist so great a body as he had with him; especially considering that it was his business only to break through them, and force his passage into the Town. Which he soon perform'd, and with very little loss got to the Counterscarpe, and so was received into the Town with great joy by the Count de Salazar the Governour; who so little expected such a relief, and was so much surpris'd at it, that the Prince stood waiting at the Palisade for a long time before he was admitted. And indeed the Governour had reason to be overjoyd at this succour, for besides that he was no great Soldier, his garrison, as I said, was very weak; in so much that if it had not been releived in so criticall a juncture, he had abandon'd the Town and only maintain'd the Citadell.

Reason why Cambray was so ill provided.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 49.

I beleeve this was the only time, when that place was so ill provided of men; and the reason of it was, That the Spaniards having had notice, that Cromwell was to send six thousand foot that year to the Service of the French, they expected that some maritime Town of theirs would be attacked in that Campagne; which caus'd them to fill such places with their men, and consequently to leave their more inland Townes but thinly man'd: of which the Cardinal being advertis'd, he thought it now a proper time to attack Cambray, which he had more desire to take then any other, having, as I haue been inform'd, a kind of longing to be made Prince and Bishop of it; and therefore order'd the two Marshalls to undertake that Seige, well hoping they would haue better fortune in that attempt, then the Count d'Harcourt had some years before. And they had certainly carryd it, but for this accident: For had not the Prince of Condé been at the Rendezvous before mention'd, but continued at Bruxelles, none of his Officers durst haue undertaken it without him; and the Spaniards would haue consum'd so much time in considering, and debating the methods of releiving it, that the French would haue leasure to haue finish'd their Lines, and then the place had certainly been lost.

P A R T
III.

1657.

And as the Count Salazar was surpriz'd to find himself thus unexpectedly releived, so were both the French Generalls, especially Mons^r de Turenne; who depending on the usuall delays of the Spaniards, and their slow execution of what they so leysurly resolve, thought it not possible to haue had any of their troopes upon him So Suddainly: But having learn'd from the confession of some prisoners then taken, both the number and quality of their troopes, and who commanded them, he thought it not convenient to make any longer Stay; but rais'd the Seige the next morning, and sent to the Court to give them notice of what had happen'd, and to receive their directions for what was next to be attempted.

M.deTurenne raises the Seige of Cambray.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 50.

So soon as Mons^r de Turenne was drawn off from Cambray, the Prince reinforced it with such a number of men as was sufficient to secure it from running the like hazard that year, and then return'd himself to Bruxelles; sending the rest of his troopes to the generall Rendezvous, which was near Mons in Haynault.

The P^r of Condé having reinforced Cambray, returns himself to Bruxelles, and sends his troopes to the generall Rendezvous near Mons.
Ibid. p: 51.

This action of his obliged the French to alter their measures, and caus'd them to divide their Army, and lay aside the thought of undertaking any considerable Seige in that Campagne. They sent the Mareshall de la Ferté to take in Montmedy in Luxembourg, which thō it was but a litle place, yet was strong and of great importance: And for Mons^r de Turenne, he with the other part of the Army drew down towards the Sea side, that the English foot might joyn him the more easily; which when they had done, he march'd back again to obserue the motion of our Army.

M^r. de la Ferté besieges Montmedy.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 51.
M.deTurenne observes the motion of the Spaniards' Army' Ibid.

Wee were by this time drawn to our generall Rendezvous near Mons: and on the 19th of June wee march'd with all our Army to Mierpottry upon the Sambre, somewhat above Thuin.

The Spanish
Army marches from their general rendezvous the 19th of June.
Ibid.

P A R T
III.

1657.

They order their marches as to make believe they intend to relevee Mont-medy. Ibid.

But their intention was to fall back and Surprise Calais.
Ibid. p. 52.

The project of Surprising Calais, carryd on with great Secrecy and conduct and all probability of Success.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 52.

Don John, P^{ce} of Condé, and Caracena, march before with the horse;
the Duke
and M. de Marsin follow with the foot.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 53.
The P^{ce} de Ligny pitch'd

On the 22^d wee pass'd that River, and the next day wee camp'd by Philippeville ; and marching that way through our own Country, as if our design was to releive Montmedy, Mons^r. de Turenne with his Army made great hast to get thither before us : but wee had no such intention, our design being only to amuse him and beget in him that opinion ; and by that means to get the Start of him, and marching backward suddainly to fall on Calais, which he (we) hop'd to carry in few houres, having knowledge of a weak part of it by which wee thought wee should easily be masters of it.

It was not only at this time that the Spaniards had taken that Enterprize into their consideration ; for they had being long designing it even before the Arch Duke left Flanders, who in his time had sent Engeneers disguis'd thither, and they had discover'd this weak part of it ; but at this time they had layd their project so well, that nothing could be better design'd, So that they had all the probability imaginable of effecting their purpose ; for it was manag'd and carryd with so much secrecy and conduct, that the Enemy had not the least suspicion of it. When wee march'd from Mons wee had left such a body of horse behind, that with drawing out some foot from the neighbouring garrisons, they were sufficient to perform the first part of the undertaking : And now being advanc'd so far on our way towards Montmedy as Philippeville, and seeing by M^r. de Turenne's march, that he believ'd wee would endeavour to releive that place, Wee alter'd our Course, and on the 26th began our march directly towards Calais.

Don John, the Prince of Condé and Caracena, march'd away with the horse the nearest way, and left me and Mons^r de Marsin with the foot to follow after as fast as wee were able, the baggage and cannon being order'd to march more within our own Country. The Prince de Ligny was the man pitch'd upon for the execution of this Enterprize, and to haue the first and maine part of it. In order to which, he was sent away the day before to those troopes wee had left behind for that seruice.

The first night of my march, I reach'd Tilly with the foot, the next day being the 27th the Suburbs of Mons; the* 28th Briffeuil, the 29th, passing the Schald at Tournay, I came to Pont a Tresin, from whence on the 31st wee march'd by the walls of Lisle, and passing the Lys at Armentieres, wee quarter'd at Nieperkerk. The next day being the first of July, wee went to Hasebrouck, and the 2^d to Arques, which is within a league of St Omer; where when I arriv'd early in the morning, thinking yet before night to haue reach'd Calais, I receiv'd a letter from Don John which gave me notice of the miscarriage of the Enterprize, with orders for me to stay at Arques till I should hear farther from him: The account of which ill Success in short is this.

The Prince de Ligny march'd from Gravelines as soon as it was night, to put in execution the design which had been so well contriv'd for the surprise of Calais; which he was to attempt at low water, by seizing first that part of the Town without the walls, adjoyning to the Key: for had he been once master of it, the place could not haue held out above twelve hours, the garrison being weak, as well as the Town on that side of it. But he coming half an hour too late, the water was then so high that it was impossible for him to pass, so that he was constrain'd to draw back; having done nothing, but only given the Town a hott alarm, and by his coming along by the Sea Side to the very place where he should haue enter'd,

P A R T
III.

1657. upon to execute the Enterprize.
Ibid.
The Duke's
severall marches with y^e foot.
OR. MEM.
P. 3. p. 53.

Account of the manner how Calais was to have been Surpris'd; and how it came to miscarry.
Ibid. p. 54.

* It is extremely difficult to follow his Royall Highness, and the Secretary in their orthography of the Names of Places, so as to preserve any thing like correctness. The Duke's line of March is thus described in the French Memoir which James the Second sent to the Cardinal de Bouillon: Le vingt-huit à Bruxelles, le vingt-neuf ayant passé l'Escaut à Tournai, il vint camper à Pont-à-Bowvines: le trent-un il marcha le long des murailles de Lille, passa la Lys à Armentieres et campa à Nieukerke. — EDITOR.

P A R T

III.

1657.

The Severall marches of the Spanish Army, from the 4th July to the 10th of August.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 54, 55,
and 56.

therby discover'd to the Governour the weakness of that part ; who being sensible how narrowly he had escap'd, immediatly put that side into such a condition as never to be surpriz'd again : And thus wee fail'd of our design, having made so great a march to so litle purpose.

About the 4th of July, our horse and foot came together at Quiernes (Querne) within a league of Ayre, and within a day or two after, our cannon and baggage came also up to us. On the 6th wee march'd to Bouré close to Lillers, where wee continued for some days. About the 12th wee went to Broüay, the next day to Lens, and the day following to Roeux (Reu) upon the Scarpe, a litle below Arras. On the 15th to Sauchy-Cauchy betwixt that and Cambray. At this quarter wee stayd till the 21st, and then march'd to Marcoin.

All this while that wee were marching up and down to no manner of purpose, Mons^r de la Ferté continued his Seige at Montmedy ; which being a place of strength, and having good men in it, made a brave defence, and held out longer then was expected by the French. In the mean time, Mons^r de Turenne was either observing our motions, or not far from Montmedy, to hinder any releif from being put into it : So that wee had no action during the forepart of this Campagne, but wee had marching enough ; for from Marcoin, wee march'd to le Catelet on the 27th, the next day to Feruaques, and the 29th to Origny upon the Oyse ; where staying but one day wee march'd to Wadencour (Eglancourt) near Guise, and there wee camp'd till the 8th of August, when wee march'd to Feron, the next day to Macon near Chimay, and the 10th to Amblain (Aublin) about a league short of Marienbourg.

At that place wee had notice of the taking of Montmedy (which had been so well defended that they began not to parley, till the Enemy had lodg'd themselves in the Bastion and rais'd a battery of six guns to batter the cutting off) and that Mons^r.

Montmedy
after a generous defence, is surrender'd to the French about the 10th of August.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 57.

de Turenne was march'd towards Flanders, there to undertake some Seige. Vpon which intelligence, wee began our march that way on the 14th, and never stop'd till wee came on the 20th of the same month to Calonne upon the Lys, which is within a league of S^t Venant, before which place Mons^r. de Turenne was sat down, ere wee could arriue thither; and had so advanced his Lines, that both in consideration of their strength, and our own weakness, it was not expedient for us to attempt the relieving of that Town, by attacking their Lines, but to try what wee could do by cutting off their provisions, and endeavouring to hinder four or five hundred waggons, which were at Bethune, from bringing them bread and ammunitiion for the carrying on of the Seige; of which waggons wee had notice, that they were to march with their Convoy the next day from Bethune to their Camp, which were distant from each other about three leagues.

Vpon this intelligence, it was resolv'd that wee should march the next morning with our whole Army, and post ourselves at Montbernenson, (by which Village the Convoy was of necessity to pass) that thereby wee might hinder its passage to the Enemys Camp: And because the place where wee then lay, as well as the formost part of the ground, over which wee were to march the following day, was an inclos'd Country, wee had commanded men appointed to march with tooles at the head of each Regiment, to make passages for them; so that when wee came out upon the plaine, which was within cannon shott of the Enemies Line, wee might soon be put in battell. The next Morning, being the 22^d, wee were in a readiness to march presently after Sun rise, in pursuance of what had been determin'd the day before; yet wee sett not forwards till almost noon: What was the reason of this delay I cannot imagine, it being a thing easy enough to be foreseen, that by our Stay wee might run the hazard of losing our opportunity, and give leisure

P A R T
III.

1657.

M.deTurenne
besieges
S^t Venant.
Ibid.

The Spaniards being too weak to attempt the relieving of y^e Town, endeavour to intercept a Convoy of 4 or 500 waggons.
Ibid.

A particular account of this attempt, and how it miscarried by the ill conduct of the Spaniards.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 57.

The Army tho ready to march at Sun rise marches not till noon. Ibid.

P A R T
III.

1657.

Order of the march of the Spanish Army.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 58.

The Duke marches at the head of the foot, performing that day the office of Mestre de Camp Generall. Ibid.

The Duke perceiving the Convoy draws up his foot in battell. Ibid.

The Duke
advertises the P^{ce} of Ligny that he had but to march up with his horse, and take all the Convoy.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 58.
The P^{ce} of Ligny answers, that he durst not fall on without Don Jo^e: order.
Ibid.

The Duke gallops up to him and urges him not to lose so faire an opportunity,

to the Convoy to get into the Line. I am sure, some were not wanting to put Don John in mind of it, and myself for one; but wee began our march never the sooner for that advice.

At length somewhat before noon, wee began to march, and in battalia; The Prince de Ligny (Ligne) Gen^l of the horse at the head of the right wing, the Prince of Condé at the left, and myself (whom Don John had desir'd that day to perform the office of Mestre de Camp Generall) at the head of the foot. As for Don John and the Marquis of Caracena, they march'd before with their three troopes of guards, till they came within one Closs of the plaine, and there according to their usuall custom took their Siesta (or afternoon's Sleep). In this order wee march'd on slowly, by reason of the inclosed Country: And when I, who was at the head of the foot, had but one Inclosure more to pass, before I came out into the open plaine, I perceived the Enemies Convoy beginning to come down from Montbernenson, and making what hast they could to get toward their Camp. Having therfore pass'd the last hedge, I began to draw up my foot in order of battell, as fast as they came out of the Inclosures; And seeing that the Prince de Ligne was also gott into the plaine (on my right hand which was neerest to the Enemies Line) with four or five Squadrons, I sent to him to advertise him of the approche of the Convoy, and that it was absolutly in his hands; he having nothing more to do, then to march up to them, and take them all, before they could get to the Line, they having only three Squadrons of horse to guard them: To which he return'd this answer, That he had observ'd all this, as well as myself, and was not ignorant how easy it was to intercept that Convoy, but he durst not fall upon it, without order from Don John or the Marquis of Caracena.

Vpon this I gallop up to him, and urg'd him as earnestly as I could, not to lose so faire an opportunity, by being so scrupulous: but he replyd, That I knew not how punctuall the Spaniards were; for should he attacque the Enemy without order, it might cost him his head; especially if he should not succeed in his attempt, or should receive any little affront. To which I answer'd, That he had no reason to apprehend any ill success: for thō M^r. de Turenne should happen to draw out some horse, yet he would never venture his foot from the Line; and that in case he should be question'd by the Spaniard for this action, I consented to take all the blame upon myself, and he might justly excuse himself by saying, He did it in obedience to me, who acted that day in the quality of their Mestre de Camp Generall. But notwithstanding all the Arguments I could use, I could not prevail with him to charge them. Thus that opportunity was lost; for, while this dispute lasted, the Convoy made what diligence they could, as perceiving the greatness of their danger, and past by us.

At length when the busines was past retrieving, and that the foremost of the waggons were already enter'd within the Lines of the Enemy, the three Troopes of Guards came up to the Prince de Ligny, with orders to him to fall upon the Convoy, which immediatly he did; adding to them only his own Troop of Guards, and I likewise sent mine along with them. The four first went on so fast and so disorderly (having at their head the Count de Colmanar, a young unexperienc'd man, nephew to the Marquis de Caracena) that had the Enemies three Squadrons which brought up the reer of their waggons stood their ground, they must have beaten them. But Berkley the Captain of my Guards with his Troop, seeing their errour, follow'd them in good order, which sav'd them from receiving an affront: for when our men had charg'd and beaten those Squadrons, they pursued them as disorderly and with as much heat as they had before done, when first they advanced against them; so that some of them were enter'd into the Enemies Line, and ingaged pell mell amongst them, they having not had

P A R T III.

1657. offring to take the blame on himself: but could not prevail on him to charge. Ibid.

Orders are brought at last to the P^{er} de Ligny, to fall on when it was too late.
ON: MEM:
P. 3. p. 61.

The Duke sends his Troop of Guards along, who by their good order Save the other 4 Troopes from receiving an affront. Ibid.

P A R T

III.

1657.

time to shutt their barriere; But they came off as fast again as they came on, and stop'd not till they were gott behind my Troop of Guards, which by that time were advanced within muskett shott of the Line, and there they rallyd. After they had put themselves in order, they were grown cool enough to let my men bring up the Reer, without offering to take the post of honour from them, as they might haue done.

In this manner they all drew off and joyn'd our Army, which by that time was all gott out upon the plaine, and drawn up in battell, within cañon shott of the Enemies Line; where having stayd some time, wee drew a litle back, and camp'd upon Montbernenson. And so escap'd the Convoy, getting into their Camp, without the loss of one single Cart or Waggon, only losing some few men, who were kill'd or taken by the Guards; of which number was the Marquis de Renty, a man of quality, who dyd of his wounds some few days after, and one Tiernen or Quirnen (Quierneux) who commanded the Regiment de Gesures.

The Conuoy escapes and gets into the Enemies Camp without the loss of a single waggon.
ORIG: MEM:
P. 3. p. 61.

The Duke talks wth the Marq.
d'Humieres and others with the French Officers upon parole.
OR: MEM.
P. 3. p. 66.

The same evening after the Convoy had escap'd, and that wee were drawing off to Montbernenson, I talk upon parole with the Marquis d'Humieres, and some other Officers of the French Army, who came out of their Lines on purpose to find an occasion of speaking with me. There happen'd to be with me one Tourville, who commanded a Regiment of horse in the Prince of Condé's troopes, who was to haue the guard next morning with a Spanish Regiment of horse, at the foot of the hill which I haue mention'd, and which was within cannon shott of the Lines; who having been shewn where his post was to be, and beleaving the cannon would begin to play at them as soon as day should break, ask'd an acquaintance of his what Officers of the Artillery were in the French Army? Who having nam'd them to him, Tourville desir'd that Gentleman to remember him to one of those Officers, who was his particular freind, and to intreat him that next morning, when he should see two Squadrons at the bottom of the hill, he would levell his guns at that which should be on the right hand of the highway, (which was a Spanish Regiment) and not at the other on the left, that being his Regiment. And accordingly when the morning came, they playd their cannon altogether at the Spanish Regiment, killing several men and horses, before they were order'd to draw off, and plac'd not so much as one single shott into his Squadron.

P A R T
III.

1657.

I haue been since inform'd by one who knew it very well, that upon our coming to Calonne, Reynolds who commanded the English, which were sent by Cromwell, offer'd to M^r. de Turenne, that in case he would let him haue only two thousand horse, he would with them and his own six thousand foot fall upon our Army where they then lay; thinking that number of horse sufficient in that inclos'd Country, and relying on the bravery of his English foot, who had been accustom'd to hedge fighting, to supply their want of numbers: But Mons^r. de Turenne refus'd to give him his consent, as not judging it practicable to hazard so great a body as they were, on so desperate an undertaking.

Reynolds offers to M. de Turenne to fall upon the Spanish Army with his 6000 English foot, letting haue but 2000 horse, but his offer is rejected.
Oa: MEM:
P. 3. p. 62.

And now having fail'd of intercepting the Convoy, and not thinking ourselves strong enough to force their Lines, wee consider'd what course wee should take to oblige the Enemy to raise their Seige, or what place wee should attempt our selves, which wee might probably take before they could make themselves masters of S^t Venant: And at length it was resolv'd, That wee should immediatly march and fall upon Ardres. This was concluded at a Council of Warr the next morning, after wee came to Montbernenson; but the putting it in execution was delayd till the 25th, upon very weak reasons, at least such in my opinion: For it seems they fear'd least the Enemy not having yet begun their approaches, might raise their Seige, and

The Spaniards failing of their Enterprise upon the Convoy resolve to attack Ardres. Ibid. p. 67.

The march to Ardres delayd till the 25th of Aug: upon very weak reasons.
Oa: MEM:
P. 3. p. 67.

P A R T
III.

1657.

The Spanish
Army arrives before Ardres
the 27th
August. Ibid.

coming after us ingage us to fight against our will. Tis certain that this deferring our design, prov'd very prejudicial to us ; for Mons^r. de Turenne lost no time, but open'd the Trenches the same night that wee came to Montbernenson, from whence wee mov'd not till the 25th in the morning, and on the 27th wee came before Ardres.

Had they begun their attack that night, they had carried the place, but they lost time with an useless Line of Circumvallation.
Ibid.

Coming thither in the forenoone wee made hast to secure our severall quarters, so as to hinder any releif from being put into the place, there being then in the Town not above three hundred Soldiers. Wee immediatly fell to work on our Line of Circumvallation, in making which wee spent that day and night, which in the opinion of most men was only losing so much time, as in effect wee found it ; for had wee begun our attack the first night, in all probability wee had carryd the place.

The Spaniards apt to flatter themselves with assurance of Success, a particular instance hereof. Ibid.

And here I cannot forbear to mention one particular passage, to shew how apt the Spaniards are to flatter themselves with assurance of success ; for the Marquis de Caracena's Trumpetter being come from the French Army before S^t Venant, had given account to his Master, that the Town was not really so press'd by the Enemy as wee had thought, and as indeed it was, which the Said Marquis us'd as an argument, against our making so much hast in our Seige of Ardres: And thō I gave them an account from a footman of mine, who had been in their Camp for severall days, and who came from thence with the same Trumpetter, having also been in the Trenches, That the French were already so far advanced, that on that very day, or at farthest on the next, they would be Masters of the place, yet neither Don John nor the Marquis de Caracena, would beleieve it, but said it was impossible. This passage is So perfectly of a peice with their former negligence, in letting the convoy pass by them at S^t Venant, which they might with so much ease have taken, that I could not chuse but be very much scandaliz'd at the conduct of the Spaniards on both the occasions, as not being yet accusom'd to their methods, that being the first year I serv'd amongst them: And I remember, that complaining to the Prince of Condé of the first of these errours, the night after the Convoy was gotten into the Enemys Line, I was answer'd by him, That he well saw that I was Stranger to the proceedings of that Spanish Army, but that I was to prepare myself to see more and grosser faults committed by them, before the end of that Campagne; And so it prov'd, as the Reader will haue occasion to observe.

P A R T
III.

1657.
The Duke
very much Scandalis'd at these methods of the Spaniards, complains of them to the Prince of Condé.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 63.

But that the reason of all these miscarriages may be more evident, it will not be amiss to take some View of their way of living. As for Don John, he observ'd the same formes of gravity and retir'dness in the feild, as he us'd when he was at Bruxelles; as it was full as difficult to get access to him abroad, as at home: for as I observ'd before, at that very time when the Convoy above mention'd was passing by, he and the Marquis de Caracena were taking their Siesta within a feild or two of the Plaine; and thō they who were about them saw the Convoy coming down the hill, yet they durst not awake them to give them intelligence of it, which had it been done, the Convoy must of necessity haue been taken: And it appears yet more strange to me, that men of so much bravery and good sence as both Don John and the Marquis de Caracena were, should let themselves fall into those formes, which they could not but understand must occasion the loss of many opportunitys, and prove very prejudiciall to their Master's service, as well as to their own particular reputation.

A View of the Spanish way of living with the Character of Don John and Marq. de Caracena.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 63.

The Marquis was certainly a very good Officer, had serv'd long, and pass'd through all the degrees, in so much that by his own merite he had advanced himself to the post which he then enjoyd. And had not Don John had the misfortune (as I may call it) to be educated as a Son of Spain, he had undoubtedly

P A R T

III.

1657.

prov'd an extraordinary man, being endued with very good naturall parts, as well as courage: But, as I sayd, neither he nor the Marquis alter'd their way of living in the feild, from what they had practis'd when they were at Bruxelles. When the Army march'd, they were never at the head of it, unless perhaps in presence of the Enemy; But by that time half the Army was march'd out of the Camp, they gott on horseback, and went at the head of their three troopes of Guards straight forward to their quarters; never so much as once minding the Army, nor going before to see wher the Camp was mark'd out for them, nor to view the place which was chosen by the Generall Officer: so that in case of an allarme or approche of an Enemy, they knew nothing of the ground, nor so much as where the main or the advanced guard were. As for Don John, he for the most part went directly to bed, how early so ever it were, when he came to his quarter; he likewise sup'd in bed, and rose not till next morning; and those days when the Army did not march, he seldom stirr'd abroad, or gott on horseback: so that the Major Generalls, in effect, did all the office of the Generalls.

But to return to our Seige of Ardres. On the 28th of August, a Councill of Warr was assembled at the Marquis de Caracena's quarter, where the resolution was to be taken where wee should begin our attacks: When wee were all mett, wee were conducted up to the top of a Tower which was there, from whence with perspective glasses wee view'd the Town, and without any other help, or information, the Councill resolv'd there of the attacks; and order'd, That the Spaniards should make theirs upon the half moon betwixt the two bastions; That I should make mine upon the bastion of the right hand, and the Prince of Condé his on the left: And no time being to be lost, it was also resolved, That, if it were possible, they should fasten their Miners to the body of the place that night.

These things being thus order'd, I, and the Prince of Condé,

The Spaniards view Ardres from a Tower wth perspective glasses, and therupon resolve their attacks.

OR: MEM:

P. 3: p. 67.

The Spaniards to attack the half moon between the 2 bastions, the Duke y^e bastion of the right, and the P^{ce} of Condé that of the left. Ibid, not thinking what wee had seen from the Tower a sufficient measure for our undertaking, went ourselves, and took a neerer view of our severall attacks. Don John, and the Marquis de Caracena went not in person, but only sent a Major de Battaille, to bring them a farther information of their own attack; it not being the custom of the Spanish Generalls to expose themselves on Such occasions.

P A R T
III.

1657.
The Duke and y^e P^{er} of Condé go in person to take a neer view of the Severall
attacks. Ibid.

And now all things being in a readiness, so soon as it began to be duskish, wee fell on with our attacks, all of us at the Same time, upon a Signall, given from Dom John's quarter, never stopping till wee came to the very edge of the ditch, and indeed finding no resistance in their works, they not having men enough to man them. When wee had thus far proceeded, our men were set immediatly to work, to make them secure lodgments before wee adventur'd to fasten our Miners.

At my attack, it was my own Regiment commanded by the Lord Muskerry that fell on, having a Captain with some commanded men out of each of his other battallions, to strengthen them. I went not on with them to this attack, but stayd behind to see them furnish'd with fascines and what ells they wanted. And when that was done, I went down to them, having the Duke of Gloucester in my Company. I found there to my satisfaction, that the Lord Muskerry had order'd all things in the best manner, and had almost finish'd a lodgement just upon the edge of the ditch, over against the point of the bastion, which commanded into the ditch on both sides of it, and had already lodged the body of the battallion in the ditch of the Raveline, which cover'd the point of the bastion.

In the Duke's attack Lord Muskerry went on first with his R. H.
Regiment.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 68.

After having order'd all things, the Duke himself
go's down to y^e attacke with his brother the Duke of Glocester. Ibid.

Finding all things in so good a posture, I now thought it time to endeavour to fasten my Miner to the wall: but perceiving by moon light, that there was some water in the bottom of the ditch, I sent a Sergeant to sound the depth of it; who brought me an account, that it was very shallow, and would be of no

P A R T

III.

1657.

The Miner being fasten'd to the wall,
the Duke and his brother return to their quarter.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 69.

Don John disapproves the Duke's and y^e P^{ce} of Condé's exposing their persons in going down to their attacks.
Ibid. p. 70.

Vpon intelligence of S^t Venant's being surrender'd to
the French,
the Spaniards
immediatly resolve to raise the Seige of Ardres.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 70.

Great danger in drawing off the men from the attacks.
Ibid.

My Lord Muskerry's conduct in bringing off the Duke's Miners.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 71.

hindrance to the Miners. Vpon which I sent them down with a Sergeant, and some Soldiers, to carry the Madriers, under the shelter of which they lodg'd themselves. This being done, I and my Brother came out from the attacks, and went back to our quarter.

As for what past in the other attacks, I shall not give so particular a Relation, because I saw them not : only this in generall, that both of them had the same good Success in theirs, and that they also had fasten'd their Miners to the place ; so that wee doubted not, but that wee should be master of it in 24 heures. I cannot here omit relating a Saying of Don John's, who, as he and the Marquis de Caracena were sitting in their Coaches at a good distance behind their attack, out of shott from the Enemy, being told that the P^{ce} of Condé and myself were gone down into ours, answer'd, No hazen ben, 'tis not well done of them.

In the morning presently after sun rise, Don John had intelligence that S^t Venant was surrender'd to the French, and that Monsieur de Turenne was marching to us ; Vpon which he assembled the junto, where it was immediatly resolv'd that wee should raise our Seige. Our great concernment then, was to get our men out of the attacks ; wee not having had time to work backwards to make a Trench and haue communication with them. So that when they drew off from their severall attacks, they must of necessity be expos'd to all the great and small shott of the Town. And now, they having receiv'd their orders for it, their first work was to bring off their Miners, which was done at my attack by the care of Lord Muskerry, who before he acquainted any of the Officers with the orders which he had receiv'd, sent one done to his Miners, to let them know, they must endeavour to come off as well as they could ; and that to favour their retreat, he would command his men to fire as fast as they were able, which he perform'd, telling his Soldiers, that he was advertis'd how that part of the wall was contermin'd, and for that reason he withdrew them: And indeed they gave so good fire, that under the protection of it, the Miners gott up to the lodgment to him, without receiving any hurt.

This being perform'd, he told his Officers what orders he had; and commanded them, that when he gave the word, they should draw off as speedily as they could, and rally at the place which he shew'd them, a litle above muskett shott from the Town. While this was doing, I sent a party of horse consisting of about thirty with a Lieutenant, ordering him to get as neer the Town as was possible without exposing his men, till he saw our foot begin to come out from the attack, and then to gallop in amongst them, and if they saw any Officer or Soldier fall, to bring him off; and, having given this order, I follow'd myself to see it put in execution. Where observing, that as my men were coming out of their attack, the Lieutenant had only drawn his party under covert of a hedge, within muskett shott of the Town, but had not follow'd my orders, I gallop'd up to him, and again commanded him to do it; which he obeyd, and went with his men scattering to the very edge of the ditch, by which he made amends for his not performing his first orders. And notwithstanding that (they) fir'd thick and warmly from the Town, there was only Captain Kinf, (Keith) amongst all the Officers who received any hurt, and but very few Soldiers; not one dying of his wounds; which as it was very lucky, so it was also very strange, they having no shelter till they got (out) of reach. Whither they had the same good luck at the other attacks, I know not, only I was inform'd, that some of their Miners were kill'd by the Enemy.

After wee had thus drawn off our Soldiers from the attacks, where our loss was very inconsiderable, it was time for us to send away our baggage for Gravelines; and as soon as that

P A R T
III.

1657.

The Duke sends a party of horse to gallop in amongst the foot as they retir'd, and bring off such of them as shou'd drop.

Or: MEM:

P. 3. p. 71. And he follows himself to see this executed.

Ibid.

The Lieut. not following the orders, the Duke himself gallops up to him and obliges him to perform it.

Ibid. p. 72.

In drawing off from Ardres the Spaniards have a very uncomfortable march.

Or: MEM:

P. 3. p. 72.

P A R T
III.

1657.

was dispatch'd, wee follow'd ourselves with the whole Army, and had a very uncomfortable march : for when wee were come to the skirts of the lowlands, wee were oblig'd to make a halt there, 'till our baggage and cañon were gotten on the dyke, the only one which led to Gravelines from Polincour, (Polincove) and which was almost unpassable by reason of the extraordinary rains that fell. This heavy way, together with the continuation of the rains, and stormy winds, and the darkness of the night (it being almost sun sett before the Van of the Army enter'd upon the dyke) and the frequent Stops wee were forc'd to make, by reason of our baggage which was before us, put our troopes into so much disorder, that the Officers had no command over their men, but every one made what hast he could to gain some shelter for himself; so that ten men were not left together of any one Regiment by the morning, and it was all wee could perform, to get them into a body the next day.

Severall marches and quarters of y^e Spanish
Army.
Oz: MEM:
P. 3. p. 73.

On the 30th at night wee quarter'd at Broukerke; And in the mean time, the French Army was not without their share of those hardships and ill weather, for they were marching towards us all the same night over the plaine of S^t Omer, in almost as great disorder as wee were. On the 31 wee pass'd the Colme, and quarter'd at Drinkam (Dringam) and the Villages about it; the Country being so much inclosed, that it had been very difficult for us to haue camp'd in battalia; and besides there was no necessity of it, the Enemy being then at - - - - - but wee judg'd it necessary for our weary troopes, to give them that refretchment af the fatigue of such intollerable marches, as they had suffer'd during that Campagne.

The French take la Motte au bois, and

Wee continu'd but two days at that quarter, and the 2^d of September wee quarter'd in the Villages under Mont Cassell, where wee remain'd till the 7th. At which time having receiv'd intelligence that Mons^r. de Turenne was about la Motte-aux-Bois, wee drew back the same day to Wormhout; where, so soon as wee had notice that the French had taken la Motte-aux-Bois, the news of which was brought us on the 12th, and that they were again marching towards us, wee repass'd the Colme the next day with resolution to defend that Riuer, and quarter'd all along it. The Spaniards were to maintain that part of it from the Fort of Link, which reaches almost to Spikere; I was quarter'd next them, and had under my defence from the place where they ended towards Bergue, S^t Vinox; and the Prince of Condé from my quarter to the Town of Bergue.

In this posture wee lay (having broken all the briges and cast up works behind the foords) till the 17th, when wee were advertis'd that Mons^r. de Turenne was marching about, to take us on the flank, having pass'd the Colme above Link: Upon which information most of the Spanish Regiments (I mean such as were Natives from Spaine) were sent with some horse to put themselves into Gravelines. The three Italian Reg^{ts} commanded by Don Tito de Toratto (del Prats) were order'd to the fort of Mardyke; and the rest of the Army drew off, and incamp'd behind the Canal which go's from Bergue to Dunkirk; The Prince of Condé having his quarter in Bergue, Don John his in Dunkirk, and I mine at Coukerke (Oudekerke) a Village in the mid-way betwixt both, planting all our cañon upon batteries, which wee found ready made all along upon the Canal.

A day or two after wee were drawn off from the Colme and posted, as I haue already said, the French Army came before Mardyke and beseiged it; That being the only maritime place, which at that Season of the year they could undertake: And this they did in some measure to comply with the Treaty they had made with Cromwell; for by it they had obliged themselves

P A R T III.

1657. march towards
the Spaniards.
Ibid. p: 74.

The Spaniards
repass the Colme, and quartering along it resolve to defend it.
Ibid.

Their Severall posts.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p: 74.

Upon notice that M. Turenne was marching about to take them on the flank, the Army divides, and most of y^e Spanish Regiments were put into Gravelines.
Ibid.

Three Italian
Reg^{ts}. are sent to the fort of Mardyke, and the rest incamp'd behind the Canal of Dunkirk. Ibid.
The Duke quarters in Coukerk, P^r of Condé in Bergue, and Don John in Dunkirk. Ibid.

The French
beseige Mardyke.
Ibid. p: 75.

P A R T
III.

1657.

to put some Sea Town into his hands before the end of that Campagne. And as for Dunkirk, and Gravelines, they had been so well provided for, all the year, and the last of them had so strong a recruit just then put into it, that it was impossible for them to hope they could succeed against it, especially considering where the remainder of our Army was then posted; so that the fort of Mardyke was the only place they could attack.

The Duke go's out to view
the French Army, just as they were marching to post themselves before Mardyke.
On: MEM:
P. 3. p. 75.

They sat down before it in the evening, and just as they came to post themselves about it, I took our horse Guard, which was without the gate of Dunkirk, to attend me while I went to view their Army, as they were marching up to it. When I was about cañon shott from Dunkirk, I left them behind me to secure my retreat, in case I should be push'd by the Enemy, and went on myself with about fifteen Officers and others in my company, all of them well hors'd, till I came so near the French Army, that, as they march'd, some of their Officers who were at the head of the Reg^t de Picardy, came out at a small distance from the rest, and fir'd at me with their fusils, which they carryd on horseback before them; they being just coming to that ground, and that being the very place on which they were to camp. So soon as their Soldiers had layd down their armes, and those who were appointed, were fallen to work to hutt themselves on the place which was mark'd out for their quarter, severall Officers, both of that Regiment and others, came out again to drive me back; which I seeing, went off towards my horse guard. And as they press'd me, being now come closs with me, some of them took notice of a great greyhound, which they had seen with me while I was in the French Army. Upon which they call'd out, and enquir'd, If the Duke of York were there? and being answer'd, that he was, and I turning about at the same time, they immediatly cryd out, Sur parole, desiring they might speak with me.

Some Officers fire at him with their fusils.
Ibid. p. 76.

Severall
Officers of the French Army coming out to drive the Duke back, and knowing a grey hound of his, they call to speak to his R. H. upon parole.
On: MEM:
P. 3. p. 76.

PART
III.

Here upon I stop'd, and they coming forward, lighted off their horses to Salute me; and there being amongst them severall persons of the best quality, all of my old acquaintance, I also alighted, and wee continued talking together for almost an houre, 'till Mons^r. de Turenne sent to them to come away. There wer at least two or three hundred of the French Officers, amongst whom was the Marquis d'Humieres, the Count de Guiche, Castelnau, and, in a word, almost all the persons of quality. As for my self, I had not above twenty in my company, amongst whom was a Spanish Officer of horse; who seeing me turn about, when I was nam'd and call'd to by the French, ask'd me what I intended to do? I commanded him to keep closs to me, and he should see; assuring him withall, that there was no danger for either of us. I haue related this passage thus particularly, that it may be obseru'd what civilitys pass'd betwixt Enemies in that Country; and that I had as many freinds in the French Army at that time, when I was actually in service against them, as I had when I seru'd under them. And this their civility had such effect upon some of the English who were with them, that it oblig'd them to perform the like, which cost them deer, as hereafter will be Seen.

Whither this conversation of mine with the Enemy gave any umbrage to the Spaniards, I cannot positively say; but after the end of the Campagne, Mons^r de Marsin, as of himself, advis'd me not to practise it so often as I had us'd that year, for the Spaniards were a jealous kind of people, and perhaps were not much Satisfyd with it, though they had taken no notice of it to me. To which I answer'd, That if they harbour'd any suspicions concerning me, or lik'd not those proceedings, they were very much in the wrong: since they could not but see how faithfully I had Serv'd them in that Campagne, and would still continue so to do, as became a man of honour, and that when any occasion of action offer'd itself, I would as freely 1657.

The Duke Stops and has an houre of conversation with these French Officers who were all persons of quality and of his old acquaintance.
Ibid.

The Duke had not above 20 in his Company, and the French were 2 or 300, which allarm'd a Spanish Officer that was wth y^e Duke of York 'till his R. H. assures him ther was no danger.
Ibid. p: 77.

M. de Marsin advises the Duke not to converse So frequently wth the French, the Spaniards being jealous of it.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 77.
The Duke's answer to this advertment.
Ibid.

PART
III.

1657.

charge upon any of my acquaintance in the French Army, as any Spaniard of them all: But that for conversing with them, on a favourable opportunity, I must not refuse so small a thing to my own particular Satisfaction, it being of no prejudice to the Spaniards, for me to preserve the acquaintance which I had in the French Army, with whom I had serv'd so many years. And to let them see, that I intended it for no other purpose, I would not suffer any of the Prince of Condés Officers to go along with me upon such occasions; which I acknowledg'd they had no reason to like, but might justly be jealous of it: And this method I observ'd the year following with great exactness, whenever I spoke with any Officers of the French Army.

But to return where I left. The same night that the French Army came before Mardyke, they began to work at their Line which was towards us, and at their attacks to the Fort also.

The next morning, having great want of forage (wee having eaten it all up while wee lay along the Colme) they came and began to forage in two or three great farmes, which were within half cannon-shott of our Line; that being the only place where they could hope for any, within a reasonable distance of their Camp, because it had hitherto been preserved by Guards, which wee had sett on purpose to hinder our own men from foraging it, by reason that it belong'd to the Relations of some Officers in our Army. Wee had there also at that time a horse guard of about a hundred men (it being the only avenue to our Camp on that side) who seeing the Enemy come up with horse and foot before their foragers, were forced to draw off. And the Officer who commanded them, thō he saw with what intention the Enemy came thither, yet according to the laudable custome of the Spaniards durst not fire the farme, as he might easily haue done, because he had no orders for it.

When the Van of the Enemys Convoy of foragers came within shott of our Line, our cañon began to play upon them.

The French
before Mar-dyke come and forage with in half cannon shott of the Spaniard's lines.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 79.

I was quarter'd within less then half a mile from thence, and hearing our cannon, I went immediatly that way, to inform myself of what was doing. Just at my coming, I found their Van beginning to lodge themselves at the farme houses, and preparing for their own security, as well as they were able, against any attempt which might be made against them, in case wee should endeavour to force them out. At this place I mett the Prince de Ligny (Ligne) who at that time executed the Office of Mestre de Camp Generall. Immediatly I demanded of him, what his intentions were, and whither he would permitt the Enemy to forage quietly before our faces? But he answer'd, as he had done formerly, that without orders from the Marquis or Don John, he durst attempt nothing. To which I replyd, That if he stayd till he could hear from Dunkirk, the French would haue secur'd themselves, so that then it would not be in our power to dislodge them, and burn the forage. To which he again answer'd, That he well saw the reasonableness of the thing, but would not venture upon any thing without express orders. At last I told him, That since he durst not undertake it, I would run the hazard of it with my own men, desiring no other help from him, then only to draw all his foot to the Line: But to this he answer'd, That the bridge being in the Spanish quarters, he could not permitt me to go, because if any thing were to be undertaken, it must be by Spaniards.

After this discourse which produc'd nothing, the Enemy foraged without the least disturbance from us (while wee were expecting orders from Dunkirk) only our great guns continually playd upon them: Soon after this, the Prince of Condé came thither also from Bergue, whom I inform'd of what had pass'd betwixt me and the Prince de Ligny, and he confess'd, That what I had offer'd to do, was faisable, and fitt to be undertaken; but that he did not at all wonder, that the Prince de Ligny refus'd his consent to it, and by that time I had serv'd the 1657.

P A R T
III.

The Duke hearing the Cañon, go's to see what was a doing.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 79.

Meeting the P^{ce} of Ligny, he asks him, if he would suffer the Enemy to forage quietly before their faces?
P^{ce} Ligny's answer. Ibid.

The Duke offers to run the hazard wth his own men, desiring only of P^{ce} de Ligny to draw all his foot to the Line: but is not permitted.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 79.

The P^{ce} of Condé confesses that what the Duke offer'd was faisable and fitt to be undertaken. Ibid.

P A R T
III.

1657.

Spaniards as long as he had done, I should be us'd to their customs of committing many faults of this nature. And now the Enemy having forag'd there, as long as they themselves thought fitt, drew back to their , leaving behind them about a hundred horses which had been kill'd by our cannon : what men they lost wee knew not, so that they must haue carryd them away with them, or buried them where they could not be found, for our men who went thither afterwards found no bodys.

The fort of Mardyke, Surrender'd to the French, is put into the hands of Reynolds pursuant to the Treaty with Cromwell.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 80.

Two or three days after this, the Fort of Mardyke was deliver'd to the French ; who the next day, pursuant to their Treaty with Cromwell, put it into the hands of Reynolds, who commanded the English troopes. And as soon as they had repair'd the Fort, and slighted the Trenches, which took them up but a very litle time, the French Army march'd away, drawing back into their own Country and into forage quarters. As for us, wee continued camped where wee were, giving out still that wee woult attempt the recovery of Mardyke.

The Spaniards continue still in their quarter w^{ch} proves a very unwholsome one, hardly one Officer escaping an ague excepting the Duke himself. Ibid.

The Duke of Gloucester forced to quitt the Army Sick, and the P^{ce} of Condé so ill, that he was given over by the Phisitions.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 80.

The King of England comes to the Army at Dunkirk. Ibid.

This quarter prov'd a very unhealthfull sickly place to us, for few of the Officers or Soldiers, excepting only the naturall Spaniards escap'd agues ; in so much that wee had never half our men together, in a condition of doing duty. It fell the most Severly on those troopes which I commanded ; for excepting myself, there was scarsly an Officer or Volunteer of quality, or any of my servants, who was free from an ague. My Brother the Duke of Gloucester went out of the Army sick of that distemper ; and the P^{ce} of Condé was seiz'd with it to that degree, that he was once given over by the Phisitions, hardly escaping with life. Soon after this his Ma^{ty} came to the Army at Dunkirk, to sollicite Don John concerning his own private affaires, and also to remind him of some promises which he had made him in relation to England.

The English

By this time also, the English who were in Mardyke began to repaire the old fortifications about that Fort, which was the easier for them to do, because the ditches had been left entire, and only a small part of the parapet thrown down. Don John having receiv'd intelligence of this, resolv'd one night to march thither with the whole Army, to destroy in the space of a night, the workes at w^{ch} they had been labouring for a month; which he undertook rather out of ostentation, and to make the people imagine that he had still a design upon that Fort, then out of any reall opinion he had, that so inconsiderable a busines was worth the exposing the lives of so many men.

The evening being now come which was appointed for this undertaking, he march'd out of Dunkirk at the head of the Troopes, the King of England being with him: It was then so very dark, that wee were forced to make use of lights to conduct us in our way thither; which being perceiv'd by the ~~Enemy~~, they prepar'd themselves to receive a storme, as beleiving that wee came thither with that intention, or at least that wee design'd to sitt down before the place, and they presently set up great lights round the compass of the Fort. When wee were arriv'd within less then cañon-shott, wee extinguish ours; and then his Ma^{ty}, Don John, and the Marquis de Caracena, stayd with the horse, and let the foot march before them: The Spanish Infantry commanded by Maresshall de bataille, march'd on towards that part of the outworkes which look'd towards Dunkirk; the Count de Marsin with the Prince of Condé's foot, to the side which regards Gravelines; and I, at the head of my foot, betwixt both. While wee were marching up towards them, they plyd us very hard both with great and small shott from the Fort; and the small Fregatts which lay in the Splinter, playd fiercely upon us with their Artillery. All which did very litle execution on our foot, who, being once gott under shelter of the old out works, lay very safe from all their shott: some of the Squadrons that were behind

P A R T
III.

1657. repair the old Fortifications at Mardyke.
Ibid.

Don John marches out of Dunkirk wth
the whole Army to destroy the fortifications of Mardyke.
The King of England go's with him.

An Account of this Expedition.
On: MEM:
P. 3. p. 81.
The King, Don John, and Caracena stay with the horse.
Ibid.

The Duke, the P^{re} of Condé's foot and Marsin march before with the foot. Ibid.

The cañon from the Fort and from the Fregatts playd hard upon them. Ibid.

P A R T
III.

1657.
My L^d of Ormonde has his horse kill'd under him, as he was coming down with the King to See the foot.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 82.

The Spaniards
after having sighted the outworkes of Mardyke draw off in good order by break of day. Ibid.

But one man of the English in the Fort kill'd in this expedition,^{wh} was undertaken by Don John out of ostentation.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 83.

us, scap'd not altogether so good cheap; for the shott which flew over the foot fell in amongst them, killing severall men and horses: And as his Ma^{ty} once came down to see what the foot were doing, My Lord of Ormonde, who was with him, had his horse kill'd under him with a cañon bullet.

So soon as wee had posted ourselves with our foot, every one of the bodys sent over their workmen, with commanded men to secure them; and because the ditch where I was happen'd to be so very deep, that I could not possibly send over my men in that place, I was forced to send them about by the Spanish attack, that they might come to the post assign'd them. And that I might haue a communication with them while they were throwing down their workes, I fill'd up the ditch with fascines, and made a passage over to them, that in case the Enemy had sallyd out I might haue been in a readiness to releev them. So soon as our workmen were placed, the commanded men, who were with them, began to fire upon the Fort, and continued so to do during all the time wee stayd, which was till almost break of day: Then wee drew off in very good order, having sighted those outworkes, and by that time it was brode day light, wee were all come back to Dunkirk.

I am confident the Enemy was much more surprised at our going off, then they were at our coming on: for they so little beleev'd that wee were retir'd, that thō our men ceas'd firing when they began to draw off, yet they within continued to shoot for at least half an hour after wee were gone, as beleeving wee had still been there. I cannot certainly say what loss wee had amongst the horse, but I could never hear of above twenty; and amongst the foot, but one Officer, who was a Captain in the Duke of Glocester's Regiment: of private Soldiers not above three or four were kill'd outright, and about eight or ten wounded. The English in the Fort (as I haue been since inform'd) had but one man kill'd; and they so much beleev'd that wee came with intention to attack them, that upon our first approche they dispatch'd away a Messenger to Mons^r. de Turenne (who was in his forage quarters) to advertise him, they were besieged ; who upon this information began his march, and was coming to relevee them ; but upon other notice given him that wee were gone off, he return'd into his quarters.

Some few days after this, wee made an attempt upon the Small English Fregats, which rode within the Splinter. The first design wee had upon them, was to haue endeavour'd to haue burnt some of them with two fire Ships, which for that purpose were made in Dunkirk : But so soon as they were fitted and ready to go out, the Seamen of the place found difficulties in the executing of that Enterprise ; it not being practicable, but with an easterly wind, during the spring tide, by reason of the Sands ; for which consideration they propos'd in stead of burning, to surprise the two headmost Fregats which lay there, being the Rose and Truelove of six or eight guns each of them : to perform this they were to man out twelve Shallops ; and accordingly one night when the tide Serv'd them, it being very calme, and somewhat misty, they went out, and at the same time Don John call'd his Ma^{ty}, who with the persons of quality and Officers, walk'd along upon the Strand to behold the issue of this attempt : And being come over the place where the Fregats rode, wee heard an English Seaman from on board one of them, ask aloud, What Ship's boat that was ? Upon their not answering, the Seaman at the same time seeing another Shallop coming up to lay him on board, he gave the allarm, and fir'd a gun into one of the Shallops, which took place in her, and shott one of the Rower's legs ; upon which accident, and firing a few small shott more at them, all our Shallops ran away most shamefully without any farther attempt, and so this expedition ended ; after which there was nothing more endeavour'd against either the Fort or Ships.

P A R T
III.

1657.

An attempt made by the Spaniards upon the small English Fregats in the Splinter. Ibid.
2 fire Ships prepar'd to burn them, but the execution found to be impracticable. Ibid.

12 Shallops man'd out to Surprise 2 of the English Fregats.

The King, Don John, and all the persons of quality upon the Strand, to behold the issue of the attempt.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 93.

The Shallops run Shamfully. Ibid.

P A R T
III.

1657.
Reynolds, in imitation of the French, is desirous to convers with y^e Duke.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 83.

But Reynolds, who commanded the English, seeing how the French Officers were us'd to converse with me, and with what civility they treated me upon all occasions, was very desirous to follow their example; and in order to it, sought all opportunitys of speaking with me, or some of my Servants as they rode abroad towards Mardyke, which was their custom almost every day. And once happening to see some of our people therabout, he sent to speak with them. The Lord Newbrough and Coll: Richard Talbott fortun'd to be the men, to whom he sent; the first of which had received great civilities from Reynolds upon some occasions in England, and the latter had his life Sav'd by him in Ireland: so that both of them, being willing to hear what he had to say to them, came up, and enter'd into parlee with him.

After some discourse, he ask'd them, If I did not some times walk that way? And upon their answering, That I did; he inquir'd whither they thought I would be willing, to let him haue the honour of speaking with me, as he did with them, because he was very ambitious of it. They told him, they belcevd I would not refuse it him: and as soon as they came back to Dunkirk, they inform'd the King and me of what had past.

The King and
the Duke being inform'd by L^d Newbrough and Coll: Talbott, of Reynold's desire, rid frequently out that way to give him opportunity of Satisfying his desire.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 84.

Vpon this notice wee went out more frequently on that side, then wee had accustom'd to do, therby to give him the opportunity he desir'd: And about two or three days after, My Lord Newbrough ask'd his M^{ty}s permission to go and speak with Reynolds; which being granted, he took Mr. George Hamilton along with him, and went up to the Enemies horse-Centry, desiring him to tell his Generall, that he was there, and requested to speak with him. Reynolds came out immediatly, taking with him only one gentleman Mr. Crew; Being come up to my Lord Newbrough, he enquir'd of My Lord, who were those whom he Saw at a litle distance from him, under the Sandhills?

He only nam'd me to him ; Upon which Reynolds ask'd, If he might not then go and speak to me? Hereupon My Lord Newbrough sent Mr. Hamilton to the King and me, to let us know what Reynolds desir'd ; and his M^{ty} bad me go.

P A R T
III.

1657.

I took along with me Mr. Hamilton, and Berkley the Captain of my Guards : As soon as Reynolds saw me coming, he came on to meet me, and was going to alight from his horse, and salute me on foot : But Mr. Crew dissuaded him from it ; yet in all other things he behav'd himself with great civility and respect to me.

Reynold's Interview with the Duke.
Ibid. p: 85.

He began his discourse with great compliments, desiring me (to whom he us'd the Title of Highness) not to look on him as one sent over by Cromwell, but as one serving the King of France ; and that he should be as ready, as any of the French, to pay that respect which was due to me : To which I answer'd as obligingly as I could, considering him as a man of whom good use might be made, when occasion should serve. And truly by the whole manner of his discourse, it was easily to be seen, that he had somewhat to say which he was not willing Mr. Crew should hear : But he keeping very close to him, he only let fall some dark expressions, implying that he hop'd a time might come wherein he might be serviceable to me ; and thus after wee had been about half an hour together, wee parted very well Satisfied of each other.

But, however, this Interview and some other Civilities which he shew'd the King and me, cost him dear : for besides the order he gave to the Ships in the Splinter, not to shoot when either of us were abroad on that side (which was punctually observ'd) he sent severall presents of win to My Lord Newbrough, desiring him to dispose of them to those, for whom My Lord knew he had a great respect : All which proceedings gave such jealousies to some of the English Officers who

This Enter-view and other Civilities of Reynolds to the King and y^e Duke, give jealousy to y^e English.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 85.

P A R T

III.

1657.
 Coll: White hir's a Vessel to go over to accuse Reynolds.
 OR: MEM:
 P. 3. p. 86.
 Reynolds
 imarks in the Same Vessel to justify himself. Ibid.

The Vessel cast away and every man in her lost. Ibid.

serv'd under him, that they writt to Cromwell to give him notice of what had pass'd. And one Coll. White hir'd a small Vessel, on purpose to go over into England and accuse him; of which he being advertis'd, imbarc'd himself on the same Vessel with White, with intention to justify himself: But both of them mett a fatall disappointment of their purpose; for by the carelesness of the Master, notwithstanding that by a Fregatt which he mett, as he was standing over for England, he was advertis'd, that by the course he took he must be stranded on the Goodwins, and that severall guns were accordingly fir'd from the fregatt to warn him of his danger; yet he either not heeding, or not understanding those signs, kept on his course, by which means both the Vessel and every man in her, were lost upon those Sands.

I haue since been inform'd, that Cromwell had so much resented what had past at Mardyke, that he was resolv'd to haue sent for Reynolds; and, if he could not haue satisfied his jealousy concerning him, to haue depriv'd him of his Command, but his unfortunate accident put an end to all.

Coll: Lockart is sent to command in Reynolds stead.
 OR: MEM:
 P. 3. p. 86.
 The King
 returns to Bruxelles,
 Don John and Caracena to Ghent. Ibid.
 And the Duke is left to command the Army at Dunkirk.
Ibid.

Soon after this was sent over Collonell Lockart a Scotsman, who had married one of Cromwell's Relations, to Command in stead of Reynolds. And not long after the enterview, his Maty return'd to Bruxelles, having perform'd all he had to do at Dunkirk. Don John also and the Marquis de Caracena went for Bruges, and from thence to Ghent, leaving me behind at Dunkirk to command the Army. The Country was still cousen'd by them into a beleef, that so soon as the French Army were gone into their winter quarters, they intended to beseige Mardyke, for by spreading this report, they hop'd to get some mony from the Province of Flanders; and the more to keep them in this opinion, great magazins of fascines and gabions were made, with all other things necessary for a P A R T

III.
Seige.

In this expectation they kept the Army together at Dunkirk, till new year's day : At which time I receiv'd orders for sending all the troopes into their severall winter quarters ; Which having distributed to them, I went to Bruxelles, where Don John and the Marquis were arrived some days before me.

^{1657.}
The Duke having distributed the troopes into their winter-quarters, return'd to Bruxelles the 1st Jan. 1658, and So put an end to this Campagne.
Ibid. p: 87.

1658.

P A R T
III.

1658.
The Duke
go's to Breda to see his Sister.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 88.
Comes back with his Sister and the Duke of Gloucester to Antwerp to meet the King.
Ibid.

Reports of some undertaking to be made in England and preparations made for it.
Ibid.

BEING now come to Bruxelles in the begining of January, 1658, I made no long stay in that City; for so soon as I had dispatched my small affaires, I went to my Sister who was at Breda, where my Brother the Duke of Glocester had been already for some time to recover of his ague, which at my arriuall had just left him. After I had remain'd there till the midle of February, wee went all three together to Antwerp there to meet his Majesty.

While we resided in that place, there were strong reports of something to be undertaken in England; and that all things were in such a readiness, that at the breaking of the frost, when the Six flutes which were brought in Holland could come to Ostend, Soldiers should be put immediatly on boord them, who together with some men of war, which lay ready there and at Dunkirk, were to be landed in some part of England, where it was also said wee had intelligence of forces which would joyn ours at their arrivall: But at the same time there were others who were so far from giving credit to those rumours, that they were of opinion nothing could be done: for looking more deeply into the matter, they saw that both the King and the Spaniards, by these reports, aim'd on either side to excuse themselves for non performance of the Treaty made betwixt them; thō'tis true the Spaniards by not performing their part, render'd it impossible for the King to comply with his engagements, at least to do what otherwise he might haue done.

And now while this discourse was at the hottest, the Earle of Bristoll having almost quite lost himself with the Spanish Ministers, was endeavouring his utmost to ingratiate himself with the Prince of Condé; who at that time also, had neither any great esteem nor kindness for him. Being full of his design, he came one day to me in the Princesse's chamber, and began a discourse with me concerning the busines of England: After a long conversation with me upon that subject, he sayd, That thō he doubted not but our designs there would meet with the desired success, yet he (it) would not be amiss to think before hand, what wee should do in case of a miscarriage; and that one of the things which he thought most necessary to be look'd after (which also more immediatly concern'd me) was to consider of some meanes to preserve the troopes which wee had already, and to increase their numbers by all the meanes wee could imagine; which if done, would render me more considerable with the Spaniard, besides the common advantage which would redound to the Royall party; That for the present he had nothing to propose towards the compassing of this design, but desir'd me to take it seriously into my thoughts, and he would also do the like; and that in case I would permitt him, he will speak with me again, when he had any thing in a readiness to offer: Thus wee parted, and he spoke no more to me upon that Subject during two or three days.

In the mean time this discourse had given me a very hott allarm, not doubting that I should haue some extraordinary proposition made to me, which would not be to my advantage: and that consideration put me upon gheasing of what nature it might be: It happen'd as I was rowling over these things in my imagination, one of my Servants told me of a discourse, which an Officer belonging to the Prince of Condé had held with him some days before; by the relation of which, I immediatly gheess'd what would be propos'd to me, and accordingly

P A R T
III.

1658.
The E. of Bristoll lost with the Spanish Ministers, endeavours to ingratiate himself with the P^r of Condé.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 89.
his discourse
with the Duke.
Ibid.

The Duke is allarm'd at what L^d Bristoll had said to him, and guessing at his design, he advise with his Sister.
Or: MEM:
P: 3. p. 89.

P A R T gave my Sister the knowledge of it ; advising with her, what
 III. answer I should make when it should be offer'd to me.

1658.

Lord Bristoll's proposall, that
 the Kings troopes under the Duke's command should joyn to those of the P^{ce} of Condé.
 Or: MEM:
 P. 3. p. 90.

A day or two after this, the Earle of Bristoll came again to me, and after another eloquent preamble, and a protestation that what he was going to propose to me was not only for his Maties Service, but for my particular advantage ; in short his proposition was, That his Ma^{ty} should joyn his troopes to those of the Prince of Condé, by which means they would be So considerable, that the Spaniards must be forced by necessity to comply with the promises, which they had made to the King for the recruiting of his forces, which it was apparent they had no inclination to do, having no great care or consideration of those which he already had ; That as to what concern'd the command which I should haue, there might be care taken to accommodate it, the Prince of Condé being very easy to live withall, and having a great esteem of me.

E. of Bristoll
 endeavours to perswad the Duke to be of his opinion.
 The Duke's
 answer.
Ibid. p: 91.

He us'd these and many other arguments to perswade me to be of his opinion : To which I answer'd, That it was a busines of great importance, and ought to be Seriously weigh'd, before any resolution could be taken in it ; that accordingly I would consider of it, and speak with him again. I say no more to him at that time, that he might not perceive the dislike I had of it. When he was gone, I not a litle troubled how to govern myself in this affaire ; for I saw very well it was a snare layd for me: If I should haue approv'd the proposition, I had certainly lost my self with the Spaniards, who would haue taken it very ill, that I should haue put them upon the hardship of refusing any thing to the Prince of Condé, who was then So Strong, and So necessary to them ; And I my self could not but be unwilling to consent to a thing, which would haue been prejudicialle to my reputation : for thō I had serv'd in Severall capacities under Mons^r. de Turenne, I did not think that after

The Duke Sees the Snare layd for him in this affaire by L^d Bristoll, and is troubled how to govern himself in it.
 Or: MEM:
 P. 3. p. 91.

having served so long, and commanded the King my Brother's forces the year before, it became me to come under any other person. On the other side, if I had openly discover'd any aversion to it, I should haue expos'd my self to the ill offices, which might haue been done me with his Ma^{ty} upon that account; by their representing to him, that for a punctilio of my own, I was willing to obstruct what was intended for his Service, and also I should haue had the Prince of Condé my Enemy: all which considerations, together with the confidence I had that the Spaniards would never consent to such a proposition, whensoever it should be made to them, strengthen'd me in the resolution of appearing wholly passive in the matter, so as neither to put it forward nor obstruct it.

Some time after this his Ma^{ty} went to Bruxelles, and I with my Sister return'd to Breda, where having stayd with her three or four , I went back to Bruxelles to waite on the King: So Soon as I was return'd, they began again to talk with me concerning that affaire; And one day particularly, the King call'd me and My Lord Bristoll into the Chancellor's closett, where the matter was debated; And I who since my return thither, was more then ever confirm'd in my opinion, that the Spaniards wou'd never be induced to suffer it: Accordingly I spoke but litle, and at length it was concluded amongst them, that the Earle of Bristoll should conferr with the Lord Barklay, (Berkley), how to propose it to the Spaniards, and after what manner the whole affaire was to be conducted. In order to this, they two had a meeting once about it, and no more; for by this time My Lord Bristoll began to see, that it was a matter not to be effected: because the Prince of Condé, having consider'd that it woulg give great umbrage to the Spaniards, and withall finding that it could not possibly be compass'd, went himself to Don John, and acquainted him with the proposition which the Earle of Bristoll had made to him, at the same time shewing

P A R T
III.

1658.

The Duke resolves to be passive in the matter.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 92.

The King calls the Duke and L^d Bristoll, and the proposall is debated in the Chancellor's closett. Ibid.

The P^{ce} of Condé acquaints Don John with L^d Bristoll's proposall, which puts an end to this whole affaire.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 93.

P A R T

III.

1658.

The affaire proves of advantage to the Duke with
the Spaniards, but do's him harm with the P^{ce} of Condé.
Ibid.

The Six flutes prepar'd in Holland, for an attempt to be made in England, are taken by y^e English. Ibid.

Preparations at Bruxelles for the Campagne
of 1658, wh^{ch} is the Duke's last Campagne.
Ibid.

The King having intelligence from England that Dunkirk would be besieged, acquaints the Spaniards and presses them to recruit it.
O^{ra}: M^{em}:
P. 3. p. 94.

his own dislike to it. That Conversation made an end of the whole affaire, and of the Small remaining credit of My Lord Bristoll with Don John and the Spanish Ministers: But on the other side, gave them a very good impression of me; for inquiring into the bottom of it, they easily found the great aversion I had to it: But as it prov'd of advantage to me in relation to the Spaniards, so he (it) did me harm with the Prince of Condé, who ever afterwards quite alter'd his way of living with me; and on the contrary liv'd much better then he had done the year before with all those, whom he knew to be no freinds to me and to my concernments.

In the begining of the spring, as soon as the frost was broken, the Six flutes above mention'd were taken by the English, betwixt Holland and Ostend; and so a conclusion was put to all the discourse of attempting any thing in England for that year.

All our thoughts at Bruxelles were now taken up with our preparations for the ensuing Campagne; and, as the time of action was approaching, the Spaniards applyd their greatest care in providing for those places, which they judg'd were in greatest danger of being beseiged by the French Army: for all our Intelligence agreed, that this year the Enemy would undertake some considerable Seige. The thought of this gave great perplexity to the Spaniards; for not having a body of foot sufficient to man their important fronteer towns, as they ought to haue been furnish'd, they were forced to leave some of them very slightly guarded.

His M^{ty} press'd them very much to recruit Dunkirk with a strong garrison, letting them know, that he was assur'd by his letters from England, and by others which he had found means to intercept from thence, That the first thing the French would undertake would be to beseige that Town, they being press'd to it by Cromwell; and that accordingly both in France and England all things were preparing for it: And this was not only once said to them, but repeated every week, as the letters which were sent from England still confirm'd it: But all these advertisements wrought no effect upon the Spanish Councells; they giving little credit to them, as being perswaded that the intelligence was false, and that such reports were contrived artificially by the Enemy, to oblige them to leave Cambray, or some other of their inland Towns, unprovided of defence; what had happen'd the year before, at the place last mention'd, had rais'd such apprehensions in them as outweigh'd all the reasons which had been given them by the King: And besides, they believ'd, the Cardinal had still a longing to that Town, so that neither his Treaty with Cromwell, or any other consideration, would hinder him from undertaking that Seige, unless it were so well provided for, and secur'd against him, as to render it too difficult a peice of work: With these and other reasons, rather plausible than strong, they flatter'd themselves into a beleeve, that Dunkirk was not in any danger of being attacked that year. Wherupon they did not only leave it very slenderly guarded, but also without furnishing it with such a proportion of ammunition as was requisit; at the same time disposing most of their foot into the Towns of Artois, as Ayre and S^t Omer, and into the fronteer places of Haynault, and reinforcing the garrison of Cambray with a considerable body of horse and foot; but as for Dunkirk, they added nothing to the ordinary garrison. Neither was this all, for they neglected the finishing of two Forts of four bastions each, which they had begun upon the Canal betwixt that and Bergue, which if they had once perfected and man'd, would haue render'd the Seige of Dunkirk a much more difficult peice of work; for the Enemy must of necessity haue master'd one of those two Forts, before they could haue begun a formall Seige.

P A R T
III.

1658.

They neglect the advertisement given them, and why.
Ibid.

The Spaniards reinforce Cambray and other Towns, but neglect Dunkirk, and leave two forts upon the Canal unfinish'd.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 95.

P A R T
III.

1658.
The Duke's remarque upon the Spaniards' fortifying of Rivers with his opinion y^t works of this nature ought never to be relyd upon by a Generall.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 96.

I cannot forbear upon this occasion, to make this remarque, arising from what I haue observ'd when I was either in the French or Spanish Army ; That of all the Fortifications of this nature, or Intrenchments for the defence of Rivers, I never Saw any which the Spaniards made, that were of great advantage to them ; for either they were not finish'd time enough to defend them, or were render'd useless by the French marching about, and falling into their flank, as I haue already mention'd in the year 1655, when Mons^r. de Turenne endeavour'd not to force the great retrenchment which they had made all along the River betwixt Condé and S^t Guislain, but fetching a compass about, went to Condé and tooke it, thereby making frustrate all the great labour they had taken. And indeed 'tis very difficult in such Countrys to make any works which will prove of use ; for an Army which is once Master of the feild, will with a litle time and patience find the means, either of forcing their passage over such a work or river, or, by marching about, get into the Enemies Country some other way : So that in my opinion, thō it may be necessary on some occasions to make them, yet a Generall never ought to rely upon them.

The French draw first into y^e feild.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 97.
They took the Duke of Glocester's
Reg^t of foot 400 men, prisoners of warr at Cassel in their way to Dunkirk.
Ibid.

The French, according to their custom, drew first into the feild this year ; and in their way to Dunkirk, at Cassel, took prisoners of warr the Duke of Glocester's Regiment of foot, which consisted of four hundred men ; they having been very unadvisably sent thither by Mons^r. de Bascourt a Mareshall de bataille, under whose command were all the Troopes which acted on that side of the Country, it being a place not possibly to be defended : And at the same time he sent my Regiment of about five hundred men, with some other small foot Regiments which were quarter'd at Hondescote, with some few horse, into S^t Omer, thinking the French would haue sate down before it. But when, by their passing by him, he saw their design was upon Dunkirk, he endeavour'd, thō too late, to haue cast some men into it; and only made a shift to get in himself with some few horse. Much about the same time the Marquis de Leyde (Léede) Governour of that Town, gott in also with great difficulty, he being at Bruxelles soliciting for supplys of men and ammunition, when the first intelligence arrived, that the French were marching thither: At which time, and no sooner, they order'd all the troopes, which were in Nieuport, Dixmuyde, and Furnes, (of which they were jealous thō without reason, because they were all English, Scots, and Irish) to march for Dunkirk, (reserving) only the King's Regiment of foot, which was upwards of four hundred, and then lay at Dixmuyde; but these also came too late, the Town being block'd up already. So that the Marquis de Leyde found himself besieged in a place, the main strength of which consisted in the outworks, which were very large, all of earth, and very easy to be approached. To all this great extent of ground which was to defend, his garrison was no ways answerable, for it consisted but of a thousand foot, and eight hundred horse, and his provisions of powder and other necessarys were very scanty, even with reference to the Small number of his men.

The certain intelligence of this Seige being come to Bruxelles about the end of May, gave no small trouble to the Spaniards, especially when they saw all hopes of putting succours into the place by Sea were wholly vanish'd, by reason that the English Navy under the command of Generall Montague was now come before it; So that the only prospect which they had of releiving it, was by the Army: And therefore it was immediatly resolved in a Councell of Warr, (where were present all the Generall Officers) that the Army should draw together at Ypres with all imaginable hast; pursuant to which, the orders were immediatly dispatch'd for all their troopes to meet at the Rendezvous appointed.

P A R T III.

1658.
Dunkirk besieged by the French, the Governour with much ado gets into it.
Ibid.

Troopes ordered at last to reinforce Dunkirk but too late, the Town being block'd up by the French so that they could not get in.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 97.

The garrison of Dunkirk only 1000 foot and 800 horse strong.
Ibid. p. 98.

About the end of May.

No prospect left of Succoursing Dunkirk but by the Army.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 98.

The Rendezvous of the Spanish Army at Ypres. Ibid.

P A R T
III.

1658.
They meet y^e 7th of June and march Strait to Furnes.
Ibid.

M.d'Hocquin-court, lately come from France, joyns
the Spanish Army near Furnes. Ibid.

Accordingly on the 7th of June all the Army and the Generall Officers were there. At their first meeting they resolv'd to march to Furnes, and on the 9th they camp by Nieuport; On the next day betwixt Odekerk and Furnes, whither came to us the Mareshall d'Hocquincourt, who was lately come out from France by the way of Hêdin a Town in Artois, of great importance, upon the River of Canche; which upon the death of the Governour, by means of the Lieutenant du Roy and his Brother in law, revolted from the obedience of the King their Master, and call'd the Spaniards to their assistance, with whom they finally agreed to deliver the Town up to them, in consideration of a Summ of mony; and accordingly having receiv'd it, the Spaniards were put into possession of the place.

As for the said Mareshall, he had all along maintain'd a secret correspondence with the Lieut du Roy, as having designs at the same time of flying out into Rebellion, and of alluring most of the Noblesse, and Commonalty of the Vexin, and lower parts of Normandy, to haue joyn'd with him: But his contrivance being discover'd before he was fully in a readiness to put it in execution (a fate which for the most part attends such undertakings) he was forced to consult his own safety, by flying as speedily as he could. Notwithstanding which it was beleev'd by many, that had not this instant Campagne prov'd So very unsuccessfull to the Spaniards, some disturbance would haue follow'd in those parts.

To return again to our main business. On the 11th it was resolved in a Councill of Warr, at which were present Don John, the Prince of Condé, the Marquis de Caracena, the Mareshall d'Hocquincourt and the P^{ce} de Ligny (Don Estevan Gamarra and myself being accidently not there) That on the 13th, wee should march with the whole Army as near as wee could conveniently to the lines of the Enemy, amongst the Resolv'd in a Councill of warr, that y^e Army should march the 13th and camp amongst y^e Sand-hills, as near the Enemies Lines before Dunkirk as they could, and that on the 12th y^e

Sand-hills, and there incamp; that by placing our selves so closs to them, wee might be in a readiness to attack them, when wee saw our proper time; and that on the 12th, the day before our appointed march, all the Generall Officers should go with two thousand commanded foot and four thousand horse, to view the place where they would camp, and themselves pitch upon it.

But before I proceed any further, I shall give a more particular account of what pass'd at this Councell; because that most of those who were present at it, haue since endeavour'd to clear themselves, either from giving that advice which I haue mention'd, or even of consenting to the resolution which was then taken. And this Relation which I am now giving, I had from one of those who was assisting in it, and was desirous amongst the rest to clear himself from the imputation of giving that advice, or consenting to it.

So Soon as the persons whom I haue already nam'd were sett in Councell, Don John inform'd them of the cause of their meeting, That it was to consult on the most proper method of relieving Dunkirk: He let them know the present condition of the place, which was such as requir'd a speedy succour; and after having inlarg'd upon these heads, he propos'd to them that the Army should march to Zudcote, and camping there amongst the Sand-hills, as near as they could to the Enemies Lines, should watch their opportunity of attacking them. After this proposition there was a long silence, and no one arising to oppose it, he said, Since I see you all approve of what I haue proposed, let us now consider after what mañer, and what time, wee shall march thither: Vpon which it was resolv'd, that they should all go the day following to view the ground for incampment, and observe the Line of the beseigers.

I shall not take upon me to accuse or excuse any who were

P A R T
III.

1658.
Gen^l Officers should go and view the place and pitch the Camp.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 99.

The Duke was not present at this Councell of Warr. Ibid.

Most of the persons that were present at this Councell endeavour'd to clear themselves for having advis'd the resolution that was taken in it.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 100.

A particular account of what past in this Councell of Warr. Ibid.

P A R T
III.

1658.

then present at this hasty resolution ; thō I haue read a Relation which was printed and published by a freind of the Marquis de Caracena, wherein the Author endeavour'd to lay the whole weight of that resolution on Don John ; And I haue also read the answer to it, where-in Don John was justified, and it was made to appear, that in case the Marquis had so been pleas'd, he might easily haue inder'd that march, by only declaring himself against it, he having practis'd that very way in things of far less consequence then this ; for his power was such, that he had but to Say he thought it not for the King's seruice to put in execution such a resolution, and Don John must acquiesce in it : in Spanish it is more strongly exprest, No sera de servicio del Rey ; and this power he made use of the year before at la Cappelle.

In pursuance of the Resolution of the Counsell of Warr, the Gen^l.
Officers go to view the Enemies Lines and the place of incampment.
OR. MEM.
P. 3. p. 101.
The Duke and y^e Marq: de Caracena and Gamarra chuse the ground to lodge the Army.
OR. MEM:
P. 3. p. 102.
M^r. de Boutteville viewing the Lines of the Enemy begins a Skirmish wth their horse guards.
Ibid.

But resolv'd it was ; and in pursuance of it, wee went on the 12th, with our four thousand horse, and the commanded foot, with intent to view the Enemies Line, and chuse the place for our incampment. Being advanced as far as Zudcote, wee halted there, and first made choice of our ground to lodge the Army, before wee went nearer to discover the Enemy : This was done by the Marquis of Caracena, Don Estevan de Gamarra, and my Self, who taking some horse along with us, went a cross the Sand-hills, till wee came to the Strand. In the mean time Mons^r. de Boutteville was gone with our Cravatts along the hight way betwixt the Sand-hills, and the meadow ground, advancing towards the Enemies horse guard so far, that he began to Skirmish with them, and forced them to give back a litle ; by which means he had the opportunity of coming within a convenient distance of their Lines, and viewing them.

As he was returning to give the Generalls an account of what he had observ'd, he met the Mareshall d'Hocquincourt, who earnestly desir'd him to turn once more, Saying, he would charge the Enemies horse guards ; and notwithstanding that M^{ons}^r.

de Boutteville us'd many arguments to dissuade him (as having already done what he intended, and brought back a prisoner or two with him, which he had taken amongst the Sand-hills) yet the Mareshall continued obstinate, and over-perswaded him to go back, by which he did not only ingage himself, but almost all the reste of the Generall Officers at a great distance from their troopes: for the Prince of Condé Seeing him go that way, walk'd after him, and Don John, hearing the Prince was gone on towards the Line, did the like: and last of all, I, having observ'd all that could be Seen where the Marquis and I had been together, and coming that way, where I heard that those whom I haue already mention'd were gone before, put on at a large gallop after them, and came up to them just as Mons^r. d'Hocquincourt had forced the Enemies horse guards to retire. In performing which, Henry Jermyn on our side, and the Marquis de Blanquefort, at present Earle of Feversham nephew to Mons^r. de Turenne, on the other, were both of them shott through the thigh.

The Mareshall d'Hocquincourt was now come within muskett shott of a redoubt, which the Enemy had advanced upon a heighth, somewhat before their Lines; when at the very moment that I came up to him, he received a shott in the belly from the S^d Redoubt, of which presently after he dyd: Vpon this wee drew off, the Enemy at the same time beginning to advance upon us; and the Prince of Condé with his people, being very busy in taking the papers out of the Mareshall's pockets, not knowing whither they should be able to bring off his body, a Gentleman who belong'd to the s^d Mareshall came to me, and desir'd me to face about, to give them the leysure of bearing off his Master's corps; which at his request I did, and so with some difficulty the body was brought away. But had the Enemy press'd hard upon us, wee had not only been forced to haue left it behind, but all the Generall Officers there present had 1658.

P A R T III.

M. d'Hocquincourt obstinate obliges Boutteville to return with him and charge the Enemy a Second time. Ibid.

The Duke coming that way and hearing Don John and the P^r of Condé were gone towards the line, he did the like. OR: MEM: P. 3. p. 103.

E. Feversham and Henry Jermyn both shott throw the thigh. Ibid.

M. d'Hocquincourt at the moment the Duke came up to him, receives a shott in the belly, of which he dys. Vpon this the Spaniards drew off, and the Enemy advance upon them. Ibid.

The Duke faces about, to give time to carry off M^r. d'Hocquincourt's corps. OR: MEM. P. 3. p. 103. All the Generall Officers in

P A R T run the hazard of being made prisoners, they having no other III. horse with them besides Cravatts, who were not capable of sustaining a vigourous charge, and being distant from their own troopes above a mile. But at length when all was over, up came the Marquis de Caracena with three troopes of Guards to our assistance, who chid us all for having expos'd ourselves as wee had done.

1658. danger of being made prisoners.
Ibid. p. 104.
 Marq. de Caracena chides them, for having so rashly exposed themselves with a few Cravatts, at so great distance from their troopes. Ibid.

June, 13, the Spaniard's Army removes to the appointed Camp amongst the Sand hills.
Ibid.

Posture of y^e incampment of the Spanish
 troopes. Ibid.

After this wee return'd to the body of our Army, but so disorder'd by the fatall accident which had happen'd to the Mareshall d'Hocquincourt, that wee march'd back to our Camp by Furnes, without viewing any part of the Enemies Line or taking any other consultation about our going thither. The day following wee remov'd to the place which wee had chosen for our incampment; having our right to the Sea, and our left to the Canal of Furnes. Wee lay with our foot upon one Line before our horse, which reach'd from the Sand-hills next the Sea, as far as the ditches, which are nearest to the foremention'd Canal: our horse were on two Lines behind our foot, and as for our baggage, wee left it behind at Furnes; for our traine of artillery, by good fortune, it was not yet come to the Army:
 so that wee had neither cannon nor tooles, nor hardly powder enough for our foot; without all which necessarys wee came and camp'd within less then twice cannon shott of the Enemies Line.

Wee came thither with the Van of our Army about eleven of the clock in the forenoon. And, as I have been since inform'd, it was evening before Mons^r. de Turenne could be drawn to beleieve, that wee were there with our whole Army, or that wee came with a design of camping in that place: But about that time a prisonner was brought, who assured him of both. Wherupon, without consulting one moment with any person, he immediatly took the resolution of marching to us the next morning, and fighting us.

M.deTurenne
 without consulting with any person, resolves to march next morning and attaque the Span: in their Camp.
 Or: MEM:
 P. 3. p. 105.

Accordingly he gave out orders for all his troopes to be in a readiness at that time : And sent for the English, that were quarter'd at Mardyke, to march up to him ; which they immediatly obeyd, and march'd all night, having a great compass to take, and were by day-break at his quarter : But while the French were preparing to come out upon us, the next morning, wee took no measures in our Army as if any Enemy were to be expected ; for when the orders were given in our Camp at night, there was no prohibition made to our horse of going out to forage, till the pleasure of the Generall should be further known, as is usuall in the like cases : But they were permitted to go abroad, as if no Enemy had been near us. And that it may be seen, how litle some of our Generall Officers beleev'd the French had any such intention (or at least would haue it thought that they so beleev'd) happening myself to be at supper that night with the Marquis de Caracena, and the Company falling into discourse on the Subject of our coming thither, and what the French might probably attempt against us, I said, That for my own particular I lik'd not our being there upon such termes as wee were then, having no Lines nor any thing to cover us from the Enemy ; and that it was my opinion, if they fell ~~not~~ upon us that very night, I was very confident they would give us battaill the next morning : To which both the Marquis and Don Estevan de Gamarra answered, that it was what they desir'd : To which I reply'd, That I knew Mons^r. de Turenne So well, as to assure them they should haue that Satisfaction.

The next morning about five of the clock, our horse guard brought us intelligence, that they saw some horse drawing out of the Enemies Lines, which they suppos'd came with design to beat them in ; upon which our whole Army tooke the alarme, and stood to their armes, and the Generalls went out to discover what the Enemy was doing. I was the first who came to our horse guard, and going as far as the outmost Sentries, I

P A R T

III.

1658.

The Spanish take no measures to Secure themselves.
Ibid.

An instance to prove how litle y^e Gen^l.
Officers expected to be attack'd here by the French.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 106.

The Duke who all along disliked y^e conduct of this affaire, tells plainly to Caracena, y^t he was confident
M. de Turenne would either y^e night or next morning fall upon them.
Ibid.

14 June, the French drawing out of their Lines at 5 in the morning,
the whole Spanish Army takes the alarme. Ibid.
The Duke is y^e first of the Gen^l that comes to y^e

P A R T
III.

1658.

outmost Sentrys, where he discovers the Enemies whole Army coming up to them.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 106.

Returning back to y^e Camp, he meets Don John, who would not beleeve that y^e French intended to give battell.

Ibid. p. 107.

plainly saw that their whole Army was coming out of their Lines ; Their horse, with four small feild peices, advancing along the high way betwixt the Sand-hills, and the meadow grounds, and the French foot drawing out on their left hand, having thrown down some peices of their Line that they might march out at least a Battailion a front; and farther on their left hand, which was nearer to the Sea, the English were drawing out, whom I easily knew by their redcoats : Of all which having taken a distant view, I went back to give an account of it, and before I reach'd our Camp, I mett with Don John, who asking me, what were the intentions of the French ? I answer'd him, That they were drawing out to give us battell ; which he seeming not to beleeve, said, their design was only to drive in our horse guards. I replyd, That it was not the custom of the French to march out with such a body of foot, as I had seen, compos'd of the French and Suisse Guards, the Regiments of Picardy and Turenne, all which I knew by their coulours, as well as the English by their redcoats, and with so great a body of horse as those I had observ'd with their cañon before them, with a bare intention of forcing in our horse guards.

The P^{er} of Condé give the same account of the Enemy that y^e Duke had given. Ibid.

The P^{er} of Condé assures
the Duke of Glocester, that within half an hour he should See a battell.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 107.

The Gen^l.
Officers go each to their respective posts, and attend the coming of the Enemy. Ibid.

Before I could add any other arguments for the confirmation of my opinion, or Don John had the leysure of replying, the Prince of Condé came up to us, who had also been at one of our horse guards, and gave the same account which I had done; and seeing the Duke of Glocester there, ask'd him, If he had ever seen a Battell ? who telling him, he had not ; the Prince assured him, that within half an heure he should behold one : And now, there being no farther room to doubt of the Enemies intention, all the Generall Officers parted from each other, and went to their respective posts; with resolution to attend the coming of the French, and to fight them where wee were, having the advantage of the ground, which wee must haue lost had wee advanced towards them.

Our Army was drawn up after this following manner: Our Foot, which were about six thousand, were divided into fifteen Battalions, and were all upon one Line, excepting two of them; They reach'd from a high Sand hill into the meadows adjoyning the Canal of Furnes: The naturall Spaniards had the right hand of all, who consisted of four Regiments; Don Gaspar Boniface his Regiment was plac'd upon the high Sand hill, nearest to the Strand; Behind which was that of Francisco de Meneses, facing towards the Sea, to be in a posture of opposing any which should offer to fall into their flanck: On the left hand of the first which I haue mentiond, was that of Don Diego de Goni, commanded by Don Antonio de Cordoua, on whose left hand was placed the Marquis de Seralvo at the head of his Regiment; next to whom were the King's and the Lord Bristoll's Regiments, both which made up one Battalion alone, and was commanded by the Lord Muskerry; And for a reserve behind those two Battalions, Coll: Richard Grace with the Lord Newbrough's Regiment, making likewise one Battalion. On the left hand of the Regiment of York, were three Walloon Battalions, after them one of Germans, composed of four Regiments; Next to which upon the last Sand hill, towards the Canal of Furnes, was plac'd Guitaud's Regiment of Germans, being the first of the Prince of Condé's foot: The rest of them, which were three Battalions, were drawn up betwixt the Sand-hills and the Canal, by the high-way side and in the meadows.

On the Sand hills, where our Foot was drawn up in this order, wee had a great advantage of the Enemy, there running a ridge from one side to the other, upon which they were posted; so that the Enemy must be constrain'd to charge us up the hill, which every one knows is a greater disadvantage on the Sand, where the footing is loose, then on firm ordinary ground. As for our Horse (which should haue been eight thousand thō at that time they were scarcely half so strong, the greatest part of

P A R T
III.

1658.
The Spanish Army how drawn up in Battell.
Ibid. p. 108.

P A R T

III.

1658.

The order of Battell of the French Army.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 109.

them being gone out to forrage and not returning till after wee were beaten) the Spanish Horse were drawn up in two Lines behind our Foot, amongst the Sand hills; The Prince of Condé's in more Lines behind his Foot, betwixt the Sand hills and the meadow-grounds; in many places there being not room for above three or four Squadrons a front: so that I am not absolutly certain, in what number of Lines they were drawn up.

In this order wee stood expecting the Enemy, whose Army, according to my best remembrance, were marshall'd in the manner following. Their Foot were drawn up in two Lines of seven Battalions each: The first Line was commanded by a Lieu^t. Generall Mons^r. de Guadagne, and compos'd of one Battalion of the French Guards which had the right hand, and march'd along under the Sand hills by the high way side; Next to which was one Battalion of the Suisse Guards, which went along by the top of the Sand hills, next the high way; On whose left hand was the Regiment de Picardy makin one Battalion; and then on the same front that of Turenne, which was the last of the French Battalions on the first Line; on whose left hand were three of the English Regiments, each of which made a Battalion, the last of them reaching as far as the Sand hills next the Sea: And before each Battalion of this first Line, they had commanded Musketeers (which was the only time that ever I knew forlorne hopes us'd beyond the Seas in any battell) But as Monsieur de Turenne advanced, seeing wee had some foot in the meadows, he took the right hand Battalion of the second Line, and made it march on the right hand of his Horse in the meadows; this Battalion was commanded by Mons^r. de Montgomery one of his Nephews. As for their second Line of Foot, it consisted of the same number of Battalions, three of which were English, and the rest French.

For their Horse, they had about five or six Squadrons betwixt their two Lines of Foot; and their right wing came along the high way, just beneath the Sand hills, commanded by the Marquis de Crequi, a Lieu^t Generall, having as many Squadrons a front as the ground would bear, which in divers places was not above three or four; before whom march'd four feild peices. Their left wing commanded by Mons^r. de Castelnau a Lieu^t. Generall, came along the Strand, with feild peices attending them; and severall of the English small Fregatts having the advantage of the tyde of flood, stood in as near the shore as possibly they could see amongst the Sand hills. This was the order of the French Army: And in this manner they advanced upon us, while wee only stood our ground, and expected them.

The first who engaged us were the English led up by Major Generall Morgan; their Generall Lockart (for what reason I know not) being with Mons^r. de Castelneau at the head of their left wing. But immediatly before their falling on, Don John sent me, and desired me to go to our right hand, and take a particular care of that part, where he saw the Englis were advancing; Which I did, taking no troopes along with me from the middle of the Line, where I then was, excepting only my own Troope of Guards, and a hundred commanded men, with two Captains, and Officers proportionable out of my next Battalion, to reinforce the naturall Spaniards. Which Foot I joyn'd to Boniface, where I judged they would make their greatest effort, and which was (of) the greatest importance to be maintain'd, it being the highest of the Sand hills on that side, and advanced somewhat farther then any of the rest which were thereabout, commanding also those which were nearest to it.

This was all I had leisure to do, before the English attack'd us; who came on with great eagerness and courage: But their heat was such, that they outmarch'd the French, so that had the opportunity been taken, they might haue paid deer for their rash bravery, But they, whose busines it was to haue

P A R T
III.

1658.

The Cromwel-ian English are the first that fall on.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 110.

The Duke is desired by Don John, to go to the right wing to take care of that part where the English are advancing.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 110.

He carries only his own Troope of Guards and 100 commanded men with him, and joyns Boni-face's post where the greatest effort was like to be made.

Ibid. p. 111.

The English come on with great heat and courage. Ibid.

P A R T
III.

1658.

taken that advantage, either tooke no notice of it, or had some other reason, unknown to me, why they sent not some Horse to fall into their flanks ; Whatsoever the occasion was, the opportunity was let slipp, and the English came up without the least disturbance to make their charge.

Lockart's Regim^t. is the first that charge.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. P: 111.

Boniface, as I haue already said, was posted on the highest Sand hill, which was somewhat advanced before any of the others, so that the battell began there. It was Lockart's own Regiment which charged those Spaniards, and was commanded by Lieu^t. Coll. Fenwick ; who so soon as he came to the bottom of the hill, seeing that it was exceeding steep, and difficult to ascend, commanded his men to halt and take breath for two or three minutes, that they might be more able to climb and do their duty.

Fenwick, L^t.
Coll: of Lockart's Reg^t, Kill'd. Ibid.

The Major leads on the Regiment.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 111.

They come to push of pyke with the Spaniards, and drive them from the hill.

Ibid.

of 11 Spanish Captains, 7 left dead upon the spott.
Ibid. p. 112.

. While they were thus preparing themselves, their commanded men opening to the right and left, to give way to their main body which was to mount the high, were continually firing at Boniface; and as soon as the body were in a condition to climb, they began their ascent with a great shout, which was generall from all their foot. But while they were scrambling up in the best manner they were able, the Lieu^t. Coll: fell in the middle way, being shott through the body ; which yet hinder'd not the Major, who was called Hinton (since a Captain in the Duke of Albemarle's Regiment) from leading on his men together with the rest of their Officers, who Stopt not till they came to push of pyke ; where notwithstanding the great resistance which was made by the Spaniards, and the advantage they had of the higher ground, as well as, that of being well in breath, when their Enemies were almost spent with climbing, the English gain'd the hill and drove them from off it: The Spaniards leaving dead upon the spott, seven of eleven Captains which commanded in the Regiment, together with Slaughter and Farrell, two Captains whom I had joyn'd to that Regiment just before; besides many of their reform'd Officers (their stands of Pykes being for the most part made of such) Yet this ground had been so well disputed, that the English, besides their Lieu^t. Coll: lost Severall Officers and Soldiers.

P A R T
III.

1658.

And now, having thus far carryd on their busines successfully, so soon as they had put themselves again in order, and recover'd breath, they came down the Sand hill, which I observing, went to charge them with my own Guards and those of Don John; but being come up almost within reach of their pykes, I found the ground to be such, as render'd it almost impossible for me to break into them: notwithstanding which I was resolv'd to endeavour it, and accordingly charg'd them thō to no purpose: for what with the advantage of the ground, and with the stout resistance they made in that first charge, I was beaten off, and all who were at the head of my own Troope, were either killed or wounded; of which number I had been one, had not the goodness of my armes preserv'd me. The cheife Officers of my Troope escap'd better then those belonging to Don John; for of mine, only Charles Berkley the Capitaine of my Guards was hurt, and of the other, only the Count de Colmenar who was Captain of it, came off unwounded, amongst all the Officers: neither did their common men fare better, the loss falling so heavily amongst them, that thō I endeavour'd all I could to rally them, it was not possible for me to perform it. But I had better fortune with those of my own Guards, for I gott all of them together who were yet in a condition of doing duty, which were not above forty.

The Duke at the head of his own Guards and Don John's charges Lockart's Regim^t. but with the advantage of their ground and their Stout resistance, he is beaten off. Ibid.

All those that were at y^e head of y^e Dukes Troop either kill'd or wounded. And the Duke himself receives a shott in his Armour. OR: MEM: P. 3. p. 112. Charles Berkley Captain of the Duke's Guards wounded. Ibid.

When I had rallyd this small party, I went to Boniface, where first Don John, and after him the Marquis de Caracena had been endeavouring to rally them, but not being able to do it, were gone off. When I came up to that Regiment, I was not able at first to make them stand; but while I was trying my authority amongst them, I saw there one Elvige a Lieutenant

The Duke having rallyd the remainder of his own Guards, endeavours also to rally Boniface Reg: which neither Don John nor Caracena had been able to do. Ibid.

P A R T
III.

1658.

An Officer of the King's Regiment crying out, that y^e Duke was there, all the English of that part face about and joyn his R. H.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 113.
The Spaniards
follow the example of the English, and draw up in good order.
Ibid.

The Duke's answer to Caracena, who ask'd him why he did not charge again.
Ibid.

Lockart's Regim^t. advancing towards the left hand, comes even upon a line wth the Duke's rallied party. Ibid.

of the King's Regiment, who had been commanded along with the hundred men whom I had sent to strengthen that Battalion; and asking him, what was become of his Captains? he answer'd me, they were both slaine with most of their Soldiers; and that he was the only Officer of that party that had escap'd unhurt. Upon which I commanded him to stay with me, and call his men together, which he did, and crying out aloud to them, That the Duke was there, those who heard him faced about immediatly, and came up to us. At the same time seeing the Major of that Spanish Regiment, I call'd to him, That he should make his men follow the example of those few English, it not being the custome of Spaniards to run when any others stood; and upon the Major's reproching them with that, they stopt, and drew up in good order. And now the Marquis of Caracena coming back once more, demanded of me, Why I charg'd not the Enemy with my Horse? I answer'd him, I had already done it, and (been) worsted for my paines; farther telling him, That considering the present posture of the Enemy, it was impossible to be done, and at the Same time shewing him, what I had affirmed, from behind the next Sand hill.

Presently after this (the Marquis being gone again) Lockart's Regiment, which, as I haue already said, had beaten off our Horse, advanced not directly forward, but bent a litle towards their left hand; and wee lost sight of each other, by reason of the unevenesse of the ground (a Sand hill being interpos'd betwixt us) so that by that time I had got the Regiment of Boniface in order, and those few Horse which I had with me, this English Battalion was come even upon a line with us, just upon my right hand, a Sand hill only being betwixt us: Wher-upon I faced towards the Sea, and marching at the head of my Foot, as I came up to the top of the Sand hill, I perceiv'd the English coming up on the other side to me: upon which I gott from betwixt them, commanding the Major who was with me at the head of Boniface, to charge them in the front, whilst I with my Horse would fall into their flank.

When I had given this order, I put myself immediatly at the head of my forty Guards, and charg'd that Battalion So home, that I broke into them, doing great execution upon them, and driving them to the edge of the Sand hill next the Strand. As for the Battalion of Boniface they did not charge, seeing I had already broken the English ; but discovering from the top of the Sand hill, where they were, that our whole Army was in route, they scatter'd, and every man endeavour'd to gett off, which few of them were so lucky as to perform.

'Tis very observable that when wee had broken into this Battalion, and were gott amongst them, not so much as one single man of them ask'd quarter, or threw down his armes ; but every one defended himself to the last : so that wee ran as great danger by the butt end of their musketts, as by the volley which they had given us. And one of them had infallibly knock'd me off from my horse, if I had not prevented him when he was just ready to haue discharg'd his blow, by a stroke I gave him with my sword over the face, which layd him along upon the ground.

The Duke of Gloucester, who during the action of all that day had seconded me, and behav'd himself as bravely as any of his Ancestors had ever done, had his sword either struck out of his hand by one of the Enemy, or it flew out of his hand by a blow which he had given ; but which of the two I remember not : It happen'd that a gentleman, one Villeneuve, Ecuier to the Prince de Ligny, who was next him; saw this accident ; wherupon he leap'd down immediatly from his horse, took up the sword and delivered it to my Brother, who with his pistoll in his hand, stood ready to secure him till he was remounted. But immediatly after, the same gentleman was shott through

P A R T III.

1658.

The Duke charges them with his 40 Guards, breaks into them, drives them before him and do's great execution upon them.

OR: MEM:

P. 3. p. 113.

The Battalion of Boniface Seeing y^e whole Spanish Army routed, they scatter and leave the Duke.

Ibid. p. 114.

Lockart's Battalion, tho broke, not one single man of them ask'd quarter.

OR: MEM:

P. 3. p. 114.

One of them going to knock the Duke from his horse, with y^e butt end of his muskett, is prevented by y^e Duke with a Stroke of his Sword over the face which layd him on the ground. Ibid.

The Duke of Gloucester's bray behaviour, he has his sword struck out of his hand, w^{ch} is taken up and given back to him by a querry of y^e P^r de Ligny. Ibid.

P A R T
III.

the body ; notwithstanding which it was his fortune to gett off, and to recover of his wound.

1658. a French Squadron, falling into the Duke's flank, he and his small party had undoubtedly been cutt off, if the French had not been at the same time charg'd by the P^r de Ligny.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 114.

The Duke takes this opportunity, and gets off, and the P^r de Ligny escapes another way.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 114.

The Regiment of Boniface is all cutt in pieces, and the rest of the Spanish Regiments taken in their posts.

Ibid. p. 115.

Account of what had past in the left wing.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 115.

I had no sooner made this charge, but I was obliged to make what hast I could to get away ; for a Squadron of the French Army from the Strand, had gott up amongst the Sand hills, just as I was charging, and had into my flankue ; So that they had undoubtedly cutt me off with my small party, had they not been charg'd themselves, at the same time, by the Prince de Ligny, who thō he did not defeat them, yet he gaue them a litle stop ; which opportunity I took to get off, and the Prince, after he had made his charge, escap'd another way.

By this time not only all the Regiment of Boniface was cutt in peices, but the rest of the naturall Spanish Regiments were all taken in their Severall posts by the Horse ; for they were not charg'd by the English as they ought to haue been, had our Countrymen march'd directly onwards : but so it happen'd, that when the other two Regiments of them, saw the resistance which was made by Boniface, they all bent that way, marching by the flankue, only firing at the other naturall Spaniards as they pass'd along, and marching up the Sand-hill after Lockart's Regiment.

While these things were passing on our right hand next the Sea, our left wing received as hard measure from the Enemy as wee had done ; for the four feild peices, which, as I sayd, advanced along the high way, under the Sand-hills, terribly gaul'd both our Horse and Foot which were before them : So that the Foot Guards and the Regiment de la Couronne (the last of which was commanded by Mons^r. de Montgomery, and having been taken out of the Second Line by Mons^r. de Turenne, as I haue said, was placed on the right hand of the Guards in the meadow grounds) seeing that wee had three small Battalions betwixt the Sand-hills and the Canal, they advanced against them, but our Battalions making a very fainte resistance ran away. Upon which the French horse advanced before their foot, as many Squadrons a front as they could march, commanded by the Marquis de Crequi, a Lieu^t Generall, and were charg'd so vigourously by the Prince of Condé's horse, that they were beaten back behind their foot: yet at length, notwithstanding all he could do, they having horse and foot against horse alone, they forced him from his ground, and oblig'd him to run for it, as fast as his neighbours had done before him; thō he did what was possible to be done, in both capacities, both as a Generall, and as a Soldier; in so much that at the last of the three charges, which he made with his horse, he was in great hazard of being taken.

As to what pass'd on the right wing of the Prince of Condé, upon the Sand-hills betwixt him and the place where the naturall Spaniards were drawn up; The Regiment de Guitault (de Guiscard) (which was posted upon the Sand hill next to the high way along which came the right wing of the French Cavalry) did not Stay for a charge from the Suisses, but fir'd at too great a distance and presently ran away: The four next Battalions did the like, none of them Staying to be thoroughly charg'd; which cowardise of theirs, and the defeat of Boniface his Regiment, who were beaten from their ground, strook such a terrour into our horse, which were drawn up behind our foot on the Sand-hills, that the greatest part of them, especially those of the Second line, ran away without being charg'd, or even without seeing an Enemy, thō most of their Officers were not wanting to their duty, in endeavouring to stop them: Those few who had courage enough to Stay, perform'd their parts like men of honour, as shall be mention'd in its proper place.

The next to these three Regiments, of which I haue spoken, was my own, which stood a litle longer then their neighbours on the left hand; But a voice coming behind them, that the

P A R T
III.

1658.
M. de Crequi advancing the French horse against the Spanish foot that were running away, the P^{er} of Condé charges him with his horse and beats him back behind his foot. Ibid.

On the P^{er} of Condé's right wing the Reg^t de Guitault, with the 4 next Battalions, fire at a distance and run immediately away. Ibid.

which the horse behind this foot seeing, the most part of them run without seeing an Enemy. Ibid.

The Duke's Regim^t. stand their ground, till a voice from behind advertising the foot to

P A R T

III.

1658.

Save themselves, made them also break and run with their neighbours.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 116.

Coll: Grace marches off his Reg^t. in good order, without losing one man.

Ibid. p. 117.

The French horse overtaking the Dukes Regim^t. not one of it Soldier or Officer escap'd, but My lord Muskerry.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 117.

Michel and Roc, the only two Coll: of the Spanish Horse that behav'd well in this battell.
Ibid. p. 118.

The Duke incompass'd on every side wth the French horse, and none of his own men standing, foot should save themselves, that Battalion broke also, the Soldiers leaving their Officers, and running away; which Coll: Grace seen (seeing) who was drawn up behind them, thought it was high time for him to endeavour to save his Regiment, and march off in good order at a round rate in three divisions; by observing of which discipline, and keeping them together, he had the good fortune to gett off a cross the high way, to the Canal of Furnes, along which he made his retreat without losing a man. But my Regiment was attended with worse luck; for thō Mons^r. de Roc with his Regiment of horse went up and charg'd the Cardinal's Gensdarmes, killing with his own hand Mons^r. du Bourg who commanded them, and beating that Squadron; yet they who should haue seconded him being gone, and more horse coming on to charge him, he was forced also to make the best of his way, and shift for one. Those horse which he had beaten soon overtook my Regiment, so that excepting My Lord Muskerry, who was fortunate enough to get a horse accidentally, not a Soldier or Officer escap'd.

Much about the Same time, one Michel an old German Collonel, with his Regiment of horse, charg'd the Battalion of Turenne after they were march'd down from the hill, on which our Foot had been drawn up; but he was not able to break them, they receiving his charge in so good order, that they kill'd him with the greatest part of his Officers, and beat off his Regiment of horse without any loss but of the Lieu^t Collonel Betbesé, who was slain at the head of the pikes with a pistoll shott. Besides these two Collonels, I know not of any Spanish horse that behav'd themselves well in this battell, or if they did, it never arriv'd to my knowledge.

I must go now a litle back to give a further account of my own fortune: As soon as I came off from charging and breaking that Regiment of English, I thought it but reasonable to endeavour my own escape, the French horse having already incompass'd me on every side, and none of our men standing : But not knowing what success wee might haue had in our left wing, where the Prince of Condé was, I resolved in the first place to go thither, and see in what posture our affaires were there. I had not now above twenty horse remaining with me ; the rest of my Guards which were with my Lieutenant, being parted from me as I came from amongst the English : The Smalness of my number prov'd my best security ; for with those who still continued about me, I was strong enough to deal with any loose men, and yet was not so considerable as to provoke any bodys to disband after me : And by Some of the Enemys wee were taken for one of their own partys ; for as I was coming off, I saw four or five of their Troopers falling upon an Officer of mine, on Lieu^t Victor, since a Captain at Tangier : I went up to them, taking them indeed for some of our own horse, and call'd out to them in french, That they should let him alone, for he was one of our own Englishmen : Accordingly they dismiss'd him, giving him his sword which they had taken from him, and went off themselves, mistaking me for one of their own Officers : Thus both I and they were in an errour, and I knew not my own mistake till Victor told me of it afterwards.

I continu'd my way forward, and made a shift to pass through the French, trotting in good order, 'till I overtook Coll: Grace and his Regiment before they gott out from amongst the Sand hills ; going by the Regiments of Picardy and Turenne, which were then as far advanced as where our men had been incamped the night before ; and coming down into the high way, under the Sand hills, I found all the Prince of Condé's Troopes already beaten, he having then made his last charge ; So that he was constrain'd to run with them, and as I sayd, with great difficulty escap'd. The throng being very great in the Village of Zudcote, through which the high way went, and the Enemy pursuing us with great eagerness, I had

P A R T
III.

1658. escapes with 20 horse and go's to see how matters stood on the left wing. Ibid.

The Smalness of the Duke's number prov'd his best Security.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 118.

The French mistaking the Duke for one of their own Officers, at his desire they dismiss an Officer of his whom they had taken.
Or: MEM:
P. 3. p. 119.

P A R T
III.

1658.
The Duke escapes narrowly being taken at the village of Zudcote.
Or: Mem:
P. 3. p. 119.

He overtakes Don John, the P^{ce} of Condé
and Caracena, on the other side of Zud-cote, wher all make a litle stand and face about to give Don John time to change his horse, and then all sett spur again till the Enemy left pursuing.
Ibid. p. 120.

All the Gen^l.
Officers except Don Stevande Gamarra behav'd well, and exposed their persons very much.
Or: Mem:
P. 3. p. 120.
Don John and Caracena very near being taken. Ibid.

P^{ce} de Ligny charg'd very handsomly.
Ibid. p. 121.

no other meanes to avoid being taken, then to disingage myself from the crowd, and to take another way, which was round about the Village leaving it on my right hand. And to shew how near I was to be made prisoner, a Collonel under the Prince, one (de) Morieul, meeting me just as I came down the Sand-hills, and not following my example of taking round the Village, but mingling with the crowd, immediatly after he was parted from me fell'd into the hands of the pursuers, and was made a prisoner. As for me I gott safe into the way again on the other side of the Village, wheré Don John, the Prince of Condé, the Marquis de Caracena, and others, were already gott before me. Soon after which, wee were obliged to make a litle stand, and face about, to give Don John de leisure to change his horse, his own by some accident being fallen lame; which being done, wee sett spurrs again to our horses, and did not stop, 'till the Enemy had left pursuing us.

I shall not take upon me to give a particular account of what was done in this engagement by our Generall Officers, because I haue received no particular information of it: Only this I know in grosse, that all of them behav'd themselves very bravely, excepting Don Estevan de Gamarra; the rest of them so far exposing their persons, that they escap'd not without great hazard. For the Prince of Condé, and myself, I haue already given a Relation of our fortunes: And concerning Don John, I haue been inform'd, that he stayd so long, that he was in danger of being taken: And the Marquis de Caracena was so near it, that before he gott out from amongst the Sand hills, a horseman of the Enemys had layd hold on his bridle; but the Marquis at the same time striking him over the face with his cane, (having nothing els in his hand) so stun'd him, that he let go his hold, and so the Marquis had leisure to escape. To what concerns the Prince de Ligny, I haue already mention'd how handsomly he behavd himself when he charg'd; but how he gott off, I am not certain : But for Don Estevan de Gamarra who commanded as Mestre de Camp Generall, and was at the head of the foot, he went away at first, and never stopt till he came to Nieuport.

I haue not yet given an account of the Battalion, which was compos'd of the King's Regiment and the Earle of Bristoll's, and I should be very injurious to the first of these two, if I should pass them by in silence. They were posted, as I haue said, next the naturall Spaniards ; and notwithstanding that they saw all on the right and left hand of them already routed and gone off, yet they continued firm (I mean that part of the Battalion which was compos'd of the King's Regiment) for they were all English ; As for the other part of it, which was form'd of My lord Bristoll's men who were Irish, they indeed went away, when they saw all their freinds about them beaten ; neither was it in the power of their Officers to hinder them, thō they endeavour'd it ; but seeing their paines were to no effect, they ran for company, excepting Captain Strood (Stroud) an English Gentleman, who was Captain Lieu^t. of that Regiment ; for he came and put himself at the head of the remaining part of the Battalion, with his own Countrymen : But this was not the only discouragement which these English had, for both the Lieu^t. Collonell and Major had forsaken them before the Irish, the first upon pretence of going for orders, and the other upon an account which was not a jot more honorable. The Lieu^t. Coll: was rewarded for his paines as he deserved ; for being mett by some of the lose French horse, who were then gott behind them, he was shott into the face, somewhat below the eye, and the bullet came out behind his neck ; of which wound he narrowly escap'd with life : he was also unhors'd, and being in this condition, one of my Guards, the only man amongst them who behav'd himself ill and who was not an Englishman, accidentally found him, and help'd him off.

P A R T
III.

1658.

Don Estevan de Gamarra ran away at first, and never stopt till he came to Nieuport.

OR: MEM:

P. 3. p. 121.

An account of the gallant behaviour of the King's Regim^t. all of them English.

Ibid.

These see all on their right and left hand routed. Ibid.

Lord Bristoll's men, who were Irish, run likewise and forsake them.

Ibid.

And their Lieu^t. Coll: and their Major abandon them.

OR: MEM:

P. 3. p. 121.

PART
III.

1658.
Notwithstanding all which discouragements, they stand firm and maintain their ground in the middle of the Enemy.
Ibid. p. 122.

When offer'd quarter by the Enemy, they answer, That they had been posted where they were by y^e Duke, and would maintain their post as long as they could. Ibid.
They are told that y^e whole Army is routed, but they refuse to believe an Enemy, hearken to no capitulation till they are assured by two of their own Officers, that none of their Army was left standing but themselves; upon which they at last Surrender upon very honourable termes.
ON: MEM:
P. 3. p. 122.

But none of these misadventures did at all daunt the King's Regiment: They continued to stand firm, and maintain'd their ground, thō they beheld the first Line of the French passing by them on their left hand, and the Cromwellian English on their right, till the second Line came up to them. It was the Regiment of Rambures which advanced to charge them (their Collonel commanding that Line, and being at their head.) This Officer seeing not a man standing of all our Troopes, excepting this small body which was before him, went up to them himself, a litle before his men, to offer them quarter; To whom they return'd this answer, That they had been posted there by the Duke, and therefore were resolved to maintain that ground as long as they were able: He replyd, That it would be to no purpose for them to stand out, their whole Army being already routed, and having left the feild. They answer'd again, That it was not their part to beleieve an Enemy: Upon which he offer'd them, that if they would send out an Officer or two, he would himself carry them up to a Sand-hill which was behind them, and then they should perceive, that what he affirm'd was true: Accordingly they sent out two Officers, Captain Thom: Cooke and Aston, whom he conducted as he had promis'd to the Sand-hill which he had nam'd; from whence they could easily discover, that none of our Army was left standing excepting only themselves, after which, he brought them down again to their own men. Wherupon they told him, That in case he would promise they should not be deliver'd up to the English, nor be stripp'd, nor haue their pockets search'd, they would lay down their armes and yeeld themselves his prisoners; to which he immediatly agreeing, and giving his word for the performance of those Articles, they accordingly yeelded, and his promise was exactly kept to them: by which their honorable carriage, they far'd much better then the other Regiment which deserted them ; some of whom were slaine, and the rest taken and stripp'd afterwards.

I haue now given the best account I am able of the whole Action, and it remains, that I should say something of the number of the Slaine on both sides and of the Prisoners. As for the Slaine, they amounted not in all to above four hundred ; amongst which on our side there fell the Count de la Motterie and of the Spanish troopes, Collonel Michel, with most of the Captains of Boniface, one of Seralvo, and another of Goni, (Gomez) as also Don Francisco Romero Governour of the two Troopes of Guards, with two or three more of his Officers : Of those whom I commanded, there were kill'd three Captains, Slaughter of the King's Regiment, ——— of my own, and Farrell of the Lord Bristoll's, besides some Lieutenants and Ensignes, and two Brigadeers of my Troope of Guards. Of the P^{ce} of Condé's Troopes, I remember none of quality but the Count de Meille a Lieu^t. Generall, with some few Captains. Of the Spanish Officers, were taken the Marquis de Seralvo, Risbourg, Conflans, Belleveder, the Prince de Robec, Don Antonio de Cordoua, Don J. de Toledo y Portugal, Don Joseph Manriques, Don Luis de Zuniga, Le Baron de Limbeck, Darchem, Baynes, all Collonels of horse or foot, and M^r. de Montmorency, Captain of the Guards to the Prince de Ligny. Most of these were abandon'd by their men, and were taken, because they would not make such hast away as their Soldiers had done : I cannot say what Captains and other inferiour Officers were made Prisoners, only, that of the naturall Spanish Regiments of foot, few or none escap'd, because they behav'd themselves very honorably ; But of the horse, the number of Captains and Officers under them, was no way proportionable to the number of Officers in my Troopes. Of my own Regiment, not an Officer escap'd taking, excepting My Lord Muskerry who commanded it ; and of the private Soldiers, not twenty. As 1658.

P A R T III.

The number of the Slaine on both sides at the Battell of Dunkerque not above 400 men.

OR: MEM:

P. 3. p. 123.

Name of Several of the chief Officers that were killd on the Spanish Side. Ibid.

Names of those that were taken Prisoners.

Ibid. p. 124.

P A R T

III.

1658.

for the King's Regiment, it was intirely broken. The Earle of Bristoll's Regiment had the same fate with mine, few or none getting away; but of his Guards not above five or six were taken. As for the cheif Officers under the Prince of Condé, Mons^r. de Coligny et Boutteville, both Lieu^t Generalls, were made Prisoners with Meille (who dyd of his wounds) and Mons^r. des Roches Captain of his Guards: He lost no many of his foot, for they not doing their duty as became Soldiers, and being near the Canal, had an easy opportunity of escaping; his horse, thō they fought bravely, yet lost fewer then the Spaniards, and amongst them all not one Collonel.

The loss on y^e French side very inconsiderable, names of some of their Officer's that were killd.
On: MEM:
P. 3. p. 125.

How many of the Enemy were slain, I know not certainly, only in generall, that their loss was very inconsiderable both as to the number and the quality; for I haue not heard of any other Officers who were kill'd on their side, then Mons^r. de la Berge (who had been Captain of M^r. de Turenne's Guards, and was then Major Generall of the Foot, which is less then either a Lieu^t Generall or a Mareshall de Camp) Mons^r. de Bebsey Lieu^t Collonel of Mons^r. de Turenne's Regiment of Foot, and Du Bourg Lieu^t of the Cardinal's Gensdarmes: Of the English sent by Cromwell, Fenwick Lockart's Lieu^t Collonel, with two Captains, four Lieutenants, and four Ensignes; Of the English common men about a hundred; and the Major of the Same Regiment, with two Captains, and some Lieutenants and Enseigne's hurt.

The Spaniards had no cañon nor baggage to lose.

They rally their beaten Army at Furnes. Ibid.

A generous action done in behalf of y^e Duke, by Mons^r. de Gadagne a French Lieu^t.
Generall. Ibid.

As for baggage and cannon, wee had none to lose, our traine by good fortune not being come up to us; and our baggage being left behind at Furnes, at which place wee rally'd our beaten Army.

And here I must not forgett to mention, what Mons^r. de Gadagne a Lieu^t Generall in the French Army, and who commanded the French Foot that day, did on my behalf, when our Army was intirely routed, and none left standing on the feild, hearing that I was taken prisoner by the English, he took two or three Squadrons of the French horse along with him, whose Commanders were his particular freinds, and went with them across the feild to the place where the English then were; fully resolv'd, in case my fortune had been such, to haue rescued me by force out of their hands: But coming amongst them, and after a diligent inquiry finding there was no truth in that report, he return'd back with that satisfaction to his own command.

P A R T

III.

1658.

At our first coming to Furnes, and for some days after the Battell, wee thought our loss had been more considerable, then afterwards it prov'd; for most of our foot Officers, as well as our common Soldiers, gott off, some by making their escape from the Enemy, others, and especially the Officers, by giving small summs of mony to those who (had) taken them; of which number was Don Antonio de Cordoua, with many other Collonels and persons of note: So that by that time wee came to Nieuport, which was about the 26th of the same month, all our Regiments of foot, excepting the King's and the naturall Spaniards, were almost as strong as when they came into the feild.

As for Mons^r. de Turenne, so Soon as he had beaten us, he march'd back into his Lines, and continued his Seige, So that within days afterwards, Dunkirk was surrender'd to him; which had not been so soon given up, if the Marquis de Leyde the Governour, had not been wounded, of which hurt he dyd with in few days.

Wee remain'd at Furnes till the 26th, about which time the news was brought us, that the Town was to be deliver'd up, and then wee drew back to Nieuport. So soon as wee came thither, wee had another Junto, to consult what wee should do when the Enemy were masters of Dunkirk. Vpon which it was proposed by Don John, that wee should put our Selves all along

After y^e Battell, M. de Turenne marches back into his Lines and continues the Seige of Dunkirk, which in a few days after is Surrender'd. Or: MEM: P. 3. p. 126.

Jun 26. The Spanish Army draws back to Nieuport, where a Junto is held to consult what was to be done after y^e loss of Dunkirk. Or: MEM: P. 3. p. 126.

P A R T
III.

1658.
Don John proposes to defend the Canal betwixt Nieuport and Dixmude.
Ibid. p. 127.
The Duke
declares his opinion against this proposall, and gives his reasons. Ibid.

the Canal betwixt Nieuport and Dixmude, and endeavour to defend it. Some who spoke after him, agreed to this, and others did not directly oppose it. But when it came to my turn to speak, I declar'd my opinion against it, and gave my reasons, because wee had not a sufficient strength of foot to maintain that post against a Victorious Army, ours being also dishearten'd by their late defeat: I also desir'd them to consider into what miserable condition wee should be reduced, in case that passe should be forced upon us; for then it would be too late, and perhaps impossible to think of securing our great Towns, since the Enemy would haue their choice of attacking, and also of mastering which of them they pleas'd; besides what other unknown mischeifs might arise from so hazardous an undertaking.

The Duke proposes dividing the Army, and Securing the chief Towns.
Oa: MEM:
P. 3. p. 127.

Having us'd these and other arguments against it, I propos'd that wee should divide our Army, and disperse it, as wee should judge most convenient, amongst our great places on that side of the Country where wee were, a particular regard being had to those Towns, which in probability wee might expect to be next beseiged; That this provision being made for their Security, what place soever should be attack'd, might be in a condition of making a vigourous resistance, or at least defend itself so long, that when it should be taken it would be too late for the Enemy to sitt down before another; That during this Seige, wee might haue leasure to draw the rest of our Troopes together, and withall might watch our opportunity of attempting somewhat against the Enemy.

The Duke's motion is approv'd of, and tis resolv'd the Army Should
divide.
Ibid. p. 128.
The Duke and Caracena are left wth 4000 horse and foot in Nieuport, which was the place most likely to be attack'd. Ibid.

Vpon this motion of mine the whole affaire was again brought under a debate, and it was resolved at last, to divide our Army. Myself and the Marquis de Caracena were left in Nieuport, which place wee beleev'd would be next attempted: Wee had with us about two thousand foot, and as many horse. The Prince of Condé went to Ostend, with a sufficient body of men for the defense of that strong place; Don John with some foot and a considerable body of horse put himself into Bruges; and the Prince de Ligny with the remainder went to Ypres. At our coming out from this Junto, the Prince of Condé ask'd me, Why I would venture to contradict Don John, as I had done? To which I answer'd him, Because I had no desire to be forced to run again, as wee had done so lately at Dunkirk.

This resolution being thus taken, the troopes began their march the same day to the severall posts which were assign'd them: And within days after, Mons^r. de Turenne with the body of the French Army came to Dixmude, and the Marquis de Crequi with the Van came and camp'd within litle more then canon-shott of Nieuport, betwixt that place and Dixmude, intending the next morning to haue pass'd the Canal which runs from Nieuport to Ostend, and to cutt off all our communication with that place; at the same time also the whole Army was to haue come up to him, with intention to besiege us. But the next morning as they were ready to haue march'd, Mons^r. de Turenne receiv'd orders from the Cardinal, not to attack till further directions from him, nor to undertake any other action, the King his master being fallen desperately ill of a fever at Calais: By which accident wee escap'd a Seige, and a most evident danger of being taken; for so careless had the Spaniards been, that when the Marquis de Crequi was come, and camp'd within our neighbourhood, wee had not amunition sufficient for fifteen days; So that notwithstanding the great strength of our garrison, wee could not haue defended the Town long.

But within a day or two after, wee were plentifully furnish'd with powder and shott from Ostend: So that if wee had been attacked, wee should haue been able to haue made a good defence. And to inable ourselves the better to sustain a Seige,

P A R T
III.

1658.
The P^{ce} of Condé go's to Ostend.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 128.
Don John go's to Bruges, and P^{ce} de Ligny to Ypres. Ibid.

The King of France desperately Sick at Calais, is y^e occasion that Nieuport escapes a Seige.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 129.

P A R T
III.

1658.

The Duke and Caracena make some new outworks at Nieuport, and prepare to Sustain a Scige. Ibid.

They open the Sluces. Ibid.

M.deTurenne wth the body of y^r French Army at Dix-mude. Ibid.

A new meeting of the Spanis Generalls at Planquendal.
OR: MEM:

P. 3. p. 129.

Resolv'd that Don John,
P^{ce} of Condé,
and Caracena, should draw a body together to observe y^r motions of
M.deTurenne.
Ibid. p. 130.

And that the Duke wth another body shou'd remain at Nieuport, and Secure it, Ostend, and Bruges. Ibid.

The Duke and Caracena going back from the meeting to Nieuport, have a hott alarm for fear of being intercepted. Ibid.

Caracena
go's to the wee began a new Conterscarpe, and five half moons, with a langue de Serpent without the Canal, which incompass'd the old outworkes, which wee finish'd in the space of eight days, and then open'd our sluces to drown the Country round about us; but it had not the effect which wee expected, the ground about the Town being higher then it was suppos'd to haue been, however it did us some Seruice.

As for the French Army, the body of it continued about Dixmude, and Mons^r. de Crequi lay within cannon shott of us, during all the time that the King of France was in danger by his fever. In this intervall our Generalls had a meeting at Planquendal, a Village which lys upon the Canal betwixt Bruges and Nieuport; where it was resolv'd that so soon as the French Army should march from Dixmude, Don John, the Prince of Condé, and the Marquis de Caracena, should draw together to Bruges as many men as could be spar'd out of the other Towns, into which they had put their Army, with which body they should observe the motions of Mons^r. de Turenne; and that I should still remain at Nieuport, with another body of horse and foot, thō of a less proportion then the former, to secure and take care, as well as I was able, of that place, Ostend, and Bruges.

This was the summ of their resolutions at that meeting; and as myself and the Marquis were going back to Nieuport, wee had a hott alarm, and were obliged to trott for two or three miles riding, for fear of being intercepted, before wee could reach that Town; Mons^r. de Varennes a Lieut. Generall of the French, being come down to the Side of the Canal to view it, and having pass'd some of his Horse over it, which gave us that allarm. Soon after this, the body of the French Army remov'd from Dixmude, but Mons^r. de Crequi was left with the Troopes under his command, at the place where he then was incamp'd: Vpon notice of which, the Marquis de Caracena, in pursuance of what had been concluded at the last meeting, went from Nieuport, taking with him some Squadrons of Horse, and such Foot of the naturall Spaniards, as having been taken in the late Battell, and had made their escape out of the French Army, or bought themselves off, and with them march'd to the Rendezvous appointed, to joyn with Don John, and the Prince of Condé.

I think it not materiall enough, in this place, to make a relation of all the petty skirmishes, and driving in of each others Guards, which pass'd betwixt us and Mons^r. de Crequi; nor of the litle stratagems and deuices which were used, to take or beat the advanc'd Guards on either side, both of Horse and Foot, which wee were obliged to keep within muskett-shott of one another; So that there hardly pass'd a day without action, thō not considerable enough to be related.

Not many days after the Marquis de Caracena had left Nieuport, Mons^r. de Crequi drew off from his post in our neighbourhood, to go and joine Mons^r. de Turenne who lay near - - - ; And had not an accident interveen'd, in all probability he had not march'd away so quietly: for about noon, I had intelligence from my out guards, that the Enemy was preparing to remove, and that already their baggage was going out of their Camp: Wherupon I went immediatly to see whither that report was true, and at the same time gave order, for six hundred commanded Foot to be drawn out of all the Regiments, and to come to me with what expedition they could make: As also, that all my horse should get ready with the same diligence, and draw into the Conterscarpe, on that side of the Town which was next to the Enemy; my intentions being to try what could be done upon their reere, in their going off.

Being come to my outworkes, I found the intelligence to be true, and that not only their baggage was gone out, but that

P A R T
III.

1658.
Rendezvous appointed, and
the Duke remains Sole Chief Commander in Nieuport.
O^a. MEM.
P. 3. p. 130.

Dayly Skirmishes betwixt
the Duke's advanced Guards at Nieuport and those of Mons^r.
de Crequi.
Ibid. p. 131

M. de Crequi drawing from Nieuport, the Duke resolv'd to fall upon his reer. Ibid.

PART

III.

1638.

But the Foot coming too late, nothing could be attempted, only Some light Skirmishes past, in one of which a page of the Duke's was taken prisoner.
 On: MEM:
 P. 3. p. 132.

What was the occasion of the Dukes Foot coming up too late, which ruin'd this design.
 On: MEM:
 P. 3. p. 133.

the troopes already were beginning to march: I therefore sent again for the Comanded Foot, as also for my own Troop of Guards, and two or three Squadrons more, to come immediatly to me: The Horse came accordingly, but not the Foot; for they linger'd so long, that before they were with me, the Enemy was drawn off at so great a distance from the Town, that I thought it not safe to attempt any thing upon them. So that there pass'd nothing betwixt us, but only a slight Skirmish of Some loose Foot on either side, and one charge of Horse which was given by Some of our Volunteers, without order, to a small party of the Enemies Horse who brought up their Reer upon the dyke, in which a mettled page of mine, one Littleton, charg'd so home, that he was taken.

The slowness of the Foot, which ruin'd this design, was occasion'd by the loss of a small Vessell, which happend to be cast away that morning closs by the Town, having run on ground before day at high water, so that when the tyde went off, she was left dry upon the Sands; which being seen by our men, they went to plunder her, and the Ship being laden with wine and brandy, most of our foot Soldiers had made themselves so drunk, that when they were commanded to their armes, it was not in the power of their Officers to take them from their liquour, et gett them together time enough to come to the place where I expected them.

As for the remainder of this Campagne, I shall not give a particular account of it, because I was not present in the feild; Only this in short: The Prince de Ligny, with the body which he commanded about Ypres, was defeated by Mons'. de Turenne, who accidentally lighted upon him with the Van of his Army near - - -, where he expected not to find him; And having cutt off all his Foot, followed him to Ypres, and beseig'd that place which he took within few days, and then march'd to Oudenarde, which he also master'd, it being a place

M.deTurenne defeats the P^{er} de Ligny; cutts off all his Foot, and follows him to Ypres, w^{ch} he beseiges and takes in a few days. Ibid.
 M.deTurenne takes Oudenarde, and of great importance, thō at that time of litle strength, Scituated upon the Scalde. In this Town he left a strong garrison, as also in Dinse, and most of the places on the Lys: So that this blow given to the Prince de Ligny, prov'd to be of worse consequence to the Spaniards, then the defeat which wee receiv'd near Dunkirk; for had it not been for this last misfortune, in all probability the French had done litle during the rest of the Campagne, besides the taking of Gravelines, after the time which they were obliged to loose, while their King lay so disperatly sick at Calais: But the defeat thus given to the Prince de Ligny, put into their hands the opportunity of taking in so many Towns, as otherwise they durst not haue attempted.

This I speak knowingly, having been inform'd of the whole matter since that time, by one who could give me the best relation of it. But to return to my own affaires at Nieuport: Not long after the Marquis de Crequi had left his quarters near that Town, Mons^r. de Turenne being marchd toward - - -, I drew out the troopes which remain'd with me, and march'd with them to the Suburbs of Bruges, governing my motions by the intelligence I had of those which were made by the Enemy, and still keeping behind one of the Canals, that I might avoid the hazard of engaging upon unequall termes, or of receiving the least affront: by this means also taking care, that the Enemy might not get betwixt me and any of the Towns which were intrusted to my particular inspection.

About the 16th of September, I march'd back to Nieuport, where I received the wellcome news of Cromwell's death; which I sent immediatly to Don John, at the same time desiring him to send Some other who might take upon him my command; it being of absolute necessity for me to go to Bruxelles, and attend the King my Brother upon this new alteration of affaires in England.

P A R T
III.

1658.

leaves a strong garrison in it, as also in Dinse and in most of the places on the Lys.

On: MEM.

P. 3. p. 133.

Upon M. de Turenne's marche, The Duke draws his Troopes out of Nieuport, and marches to Burges, governing his motions by those of y^e Enemy. Ibid.

Sept. 16. The Duke marches back to Nieuport, where upon the news of Cromwell's death, he sent immediatly to Don John, to desire him to send Some body to take his command upon him, that he might go and attend the King his Brother upon this new alteration.

On: MEM:

P. 3. p. 135.

P A R T
III.

1658.

Sept: 21.

Mons^r. de Marsin is Sent to Nieuport to releve the Duke, who go's to Bruxelles to the King, and returns no more to the Army; the Season being too far spent before he could leave his Majesty.
Ibid.

Monsieur de Marsin was he that was order'd to releve me; who arriving at Nieuport on the 21st of September, I immediately made what hast I could to Bruxelles, and return'd no more to the Army, the Season of the year being too far spent before I could leave the King; so that there was not any need of my presence at the place of my Command: And when the French Army was march'd back into their own Country, and our Troopes dispos'd into their winter-quarters, I went to Breda to the Princesse my Sister, where I continued for some time.

Thus ends the account given by his R. H. of the year 1658; which was the last Campagne he made in the Spanish Service.

1659.

THE DEATH of CROMWELL, and the disturbances which most men foresaw would ensue upon it (his Son Richard having neither the parts nor vigour of his Father to govern and keep in order the Army) had rais'd the spirits of the Royall Party, which before were very low, by having so often attempted and so often miscarried in their endeavours to restore the King: So that now forgetting all the hazards which they had already run, and dispising those to which they were again to expose their lives and fortunes, they fell to work afresh; and by the Severall changes which happen'd afterwards in a litle space of time amongst their Enemies, had the opportunity of carrying on their design with a greater liklyhood of success then ever: for they had not only provided themselves with armes and mony for a rising, but had engaged in severall parts of the Kingdom many considerable men of the Presbyterian Party; and besides them, divers other persons whom either their interest, or their misled judgment, had hurryd into actuall Rebellion either against the then present King, or his Father: In the West of England, Collonel Popham, In Wales, Mansfield, In Chesshyre, Sir George Booth, In Lincolnshyre, Collonel Rossiter, In Norfolk, Sir Horatio Townshend; besides Sir William Waller, and many other men of great interest in the Countries where they liv'd: Of the Army, Coll: Charles Houard, Coll: Ingolsby, and others who by the death of Cromwell, and the laying aside

P A R T
III.

1659.

The Death of Cromwell
raiseth the Spirits of the Loyall Party.
On: MEM:
P. 3. p. 136.

They provide armes and mony for a rising, and ingage many considerable men in the King's interest.
On: MEM:
P. 3. p. 136.

Names of Severall of the chief persons ingaged in the Royall Party.
On: MEM:
P. 3. p. 137.

P A R T
III.

1659.

Names of the persons in England who were particularly intrusted with the managment of his Ma^{ty} affaires called The Select Knott.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 137.
The 1st of August appointed for a generall rising, and the King and y^e Duke to be there in person to head them. Ibid.
This great affaire upon the point of being executed, is brought to nothing by the treachery of one man, S^r. Richard Willis.
Ibid. p. 138.

Willis discovers the affaire but not the persons.
Ibid.

of his Son, had either lost their commands or were in fear of losing them ; such especially as had been of that Party which advised Cromwell to take the Crown upon him : In the City, Major Generall Brown, and in the Navy, Generall Montague. As for Gen^l Monk, who commanded in Scotland, it is doubtfull whither at that time he had it in his thought to perform, what afterwards he brought So well to pass.

Most of these whom I haue nam'd, were so far ingaged by those whom his Majesty intrusted with the managment of his affaires in England (who were these following Lord Bellasise, Col: John Russell, Sir William Compton, Coll: Edward Villars, Lord Loughbourov, and Sir Richard Willis) that the first of August was appointed for a generall rising through all England : And his Ma^{ty} had resolv'd to be there in person to head them, together with the Duke, at their first appearing in the feild. Every thing was accordingly prepar'd, and the King had already taken his measures, how and at what place he should land, and from thence to go where the risings were to be : But being in this readiness, and the time almost come for the embarquement to put this great affaire in execution, it was all dash'd and brought to nothing by the treachery of one man.

This person was Sir Richard Willis, as it was afterwards discover'd to his Majesty by the means of M^r. Moreland, he being one of those who was intirely trusted by the King in the managment of this design, and of THE SELECT KNOTT (as they call'd them) and having been so all along, was corrupted by Cromwell for some before he dyd ; and constantly betrayd to him during his life, and after his death to those who succeeded him, our whole affaire, thō not the persons of any of his freinds (for such was the agreement he had made with that Party) undertaking either to frustrate any of the King's designs, or at least to advertise them so early, that they might secure themselves from any such attempt : And he never fail'd them in any thing he promis'd; nor was ever press'd by Cromwell or others after him, to discover any particular persons who were carrying on his Majesty's Service; neither did he betray any of them in this present juncture, thō he had it in his power to haue put the Duke of Ormonde into their hands, when he was privately in England.

And now, according to his former practises, he set upon it to break this whole design: which he compass'd, by perswading. THE SELECT KNOTT, when all things were in a readiness and the day appointed just at hand, to deferr the rising for ten days longer; using such arguments to work them into his opinion, as indeed were plausible enough, thō not convincing, if they had been throwly consider'd. But there was no room left for suspicion of such a man, whom they look'd upon as one firm to his Master's service, and to be as forward as the best of them for such an undertaking; So that his advice prevailing, orders were accordingly dispatch'd to all who were ingag'd, that they should not take up armes till farther directions were sent them: Only Sir George Booth had no notice given him of this countermand, of whose intentions to rise, Willis accidentally knew nothing; But at the same time he sent over to Bruxelles, and advertis'd the King that the busines was put off, when both the King and Duke were just ready to haue come for England.

This journey being thus deferr'd, his R. H. thought he had time enough before him to make a visit to his Sister, who was then at Honslarcdyke near the Hague, and to be back again with his Ma^{ty} before he should sett out from Bruxelles: But it prov'd otherwise; for the day after his R. H. departure from that place, the news was brought thither, that Sir George Booth was up in Chesshyre, with a considerable body of men. Vpon which intelligence, his Ma^{ty} beleevving his freinds might also rise in other parts, as encouraged by this example, thō the last day appointed was not yet come, thought it proper for him to go

Willis perswads
The Select Knott.
to defer the rising for ten days.
OR: MEM.
P. 3. p. 138.

The rising in England being deferr'd, the Duke go's to visit his Sister at Honslarcdyke.
OR: MEM.
P. 3. p. 139.

P A R T
III.

1639.
Upon the news of Sr George Booth's rising up in Ches-shyre, the King parts privatly from Bruxelles and Sends notice to the Duke to follow him. Ibid.

The Duke overtakes the King neer
St. Omers.
ORIG: MEM:
P. 3. P. 139.
'tis resolv'd y^e King should go to Calais, and the Duke to Boulogne to provide a Vessell. Ibid.

over into England by the way of Calais ; at the same time sending the Duke notice of it, that he might follow him : And the next day he sett out privatly from Bruxelles, taking along with him of his Servants only the Duke of Ormonde, Lord Bristoll, Daniel O'Neale, and Titus.

As for the Duke, so soon as he had received the King's letter, he came away for Bruxelles without stopping any where: He enter'd privatly into the Town and went immediatly to M^r. Secretary Nicholas' lodgings, from whence he sent word to the Chancellour, that he should come thither to him, that he might know from him what farther directions his Ma^{ty} had left for him ; which were only these, that he should make hast after him to Calais, where he should know more, and that the Duke of Glocester should still remain at Bruxelles till farther orders. Having received this short account, he made no longer stay then just to put on his disguise, in which he was resolved to go to England ; and taking with him only Charles Berkley and a Trumpetter, he travell'd day and night till he had overtaken his Majesty at Hazburck, short of St. Omers, where it was concluded that the King should go to Calais, and the Duke to Boulogne ; where he was to provide a Vessell which might be in a readyness to transport him into England, but not to stirr till the King sent his commands from Calais. Thus they parted, and his Ma^{ty} arrived that night at his journys end, as he had design'd ; but his R. H. got not to Boulogne till the next morning.

The Duke has been since inform'd, that from the very time his Ma^{ty} left Bruxelles, the resolution was taken of his going to Fontarabie, he not having any opinion that Sir George Booth's business would succeed, But that however he thought it not amiss to go by Calais, that in case some others of his freinds should rise, and new hopes be given him, he should be in a readyness to go over : if not, then to continue on his journey to Fontarabie. Whither this was true or not, is uncertain ; but if it was true, the Duke was not made acquainted with it : for he did so firmly beleeve that he should pass over into England, that the same day he arriv'd at Boulogne, he sent Charles Berkley to the Lieu^t. Governour, to desire his assistance in procuring a boat for his passage into England, pretending that he had obtain'd leave from the Duke to go over privatly about some concerns of his own ; and that the Lieu^t. Governour might have no suspicion of the Duke's being there, his R. H. writt a letter to him, dating it from Bruxelles, which letter M^r. Berkley deliver'd to him, and according to his desire he was immediatly furnish'd with a small Vessell ; and now the Duke stayd only for his Ma^{ties} further orders for Calais, beleeving he should receive commands for his passage.

P A R T
III.

1659.
The Duke knows nothing of the King's intention of going to Fontarabie.
Oa: MEM:
P. 3. p: 140.

He gets a Vessell ready.
Ibid.

Within a day or two, the King came himself to Boulogne, in his way to Abbeville, and told the Duke, That by the last letters which he had received at Calais, he had heard of no other rising, then only that of Sir George Booth ; for which reason he thought it not convenient for either of them, as yet to adventure over the Seas ; That, for himself, his intentions were to go along the Coast towards Dieppe and Rouen, and if he heard any better news, then to pass over into the West to Popham, or into Wales to Mansfield : But for the Duke, he was order'd to hover about those quarters where he then was, and had permission given him to receive and open all letters which should be directed to the King ; and, for the rest, it was left wholly to him to govern himself as he thought fitt, according to the intelligence which he should receive : Notwithstanding which, some few days after, Doctor Allestree refus'd to give him a letter, which he brought out of England with him, for the King.

The King comes to Boulogne, tells the Duke it was not convenient yet for either of them to venture over.
Ibid. p: 141.
his Ma^{ty} go's along the Coast, and orders the Duke to hover about where he was, and open all letters from England to the King.
Oa: MEM:
P. 3. p: 141.

After these directions, the King left his R. H. and went on to Rouen, from thence to St. Malo, and so by Rochelle to

P A R T
III.

1659.
The King go's to Fontarabie.
Ibid.

The Duke go's with Titus to Calais to get news from England.
Ibid. p. 142.

The Duke is inform'd there by one Dawson, that a Troop of Horse was waiting to seize the King
and the Duke, at the place they were to land at, Line-court.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 142.

Willis the person that discover'd this secret landing place to the Rebells. Ibid.

A Huguenot Captain informs y^e L^t. governour of Calais that y^e Duke was there in disguise, and that he had seen him.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p. 14.

The Gates are shutt and the Duke sought after, but y^e Informer found to be mistaken.

Ibid.

Thoulouse; from thence to Sarragossa, and then back again to Fontarabie, hearing the conference at that place was not yet ended betwixt the French, and the Spaniard. His Ma^y at his departure from Boulogne had left M^r. Titus with the Duke, and within few days after they went together to Calais, there to informe themselves more particularly of the news from England; where Titus mett with M^r. Dawson newly arriv'd out of Kent, who told them, that the very day wheron he expected the King and the Duke at Linecourt, a Troop of Horse came thither, thinking to haue found them there, and that it was not without great difficulty he escap'd from them, and gott over into France: This accident being related to the Duke, surpris'd him very much, knowing how few were intrusted with the secret of their designing to go to that house; But afterwards when the practises of Sir Richard Willis came to light, he was known to be the person who had discovered that design to the Rebells.

There happen'd likewise another accident, while the Duke was then at Calais, which had like to haue given him some trouble, and might also haue been of bad consequence to others. It happen'd that an over-officious Captain, a Huguenot, who was in the Garrison of that Town, advertis'd the Lieu^t. Governour, Mons^r. de Courtebonne, that the Duke was there in a disguise, and that he himself had seen him, knowing him very well, as having been in the French Army while the Duke serv'd there, and withall he gave notice where his R. H. was lodg'd: Upon which the Lieu^t. Governour commanded the gates to be shutt, and taking a Guard along with him went to the place, conducted by the Huguenot Captain. It was a blind ale-house in a by-part of the Town, where he was led with an opinion of finding the Duke: But coming thither, he found the Informer was mistaken, for the person prov'd to be Mr. Edward Stanley, Brother to the Earle of Darby, who was newly come to Calais, as were also many English gentlemen ; P A R T who hearing of the rising in England, came from all parts III.

with intention to go over and serve their King.

1659.

But the Lieu^t. Governour not content with this, and being told by the same person, or some other, that the Duke was in Town, went on with his inquiry, and search'd the house of one M^r. Booth an English-woman, where commonly her Country-men us'd to lodge, leaving no part or corner of the house unsearch'd ; but thō the Duke lay not there, yet by accident he had like to have been found there : for he was going to that very place, when Titus met him in the street, and told him that the gates were commanded to be shutt, and that a search was actually making for him ; for which reason he refrain'd from going thither, and gott into a house where the Lord Berkley and the Lord Langdale were, and there he continued till night, and then return'd to the Inne where he had taken up his lodging.

The Lieu^t. Governour after this, made no further inquiry, but caus'd the gates to be open'd again an hour before night. Of all this the Duke was soon advertis'd ; and some advis'd him to go out of Town the same night before the gates were shutt, that he might be so much taker (farther) on, in his way to Boulogne ; but he refus'd that Counsell, because perhaps there might be a trap layd for him, and the gates on purpose left open to apprehend him as he returned out. He therefore judg'd it not secure for him to give them such a mark of knowing him, as they would haue, if he went out so hastily at so undue an hour. But betwixt twelve and one he had a hott alarm at his lodging, and verily beleev'd they were come to take him ; for he was waken'd with great knocking and bouncing at the door of the Inne, and going to the window, he heard, as he thought, the noise of Soldiers ; neither was he mistaken in that opinion, for so they were : But their busines

The Duke
advise'd to go out of the Town in the night, but thinks is not fitt. Ibid.

The Duke had another hott alarm in his lodging at midnight.
Oz: Mem:
P. 3. p. 144.

P A R T

III.

1659.

The Duke
returns to Boulogne next morning.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p: 144.

He receives letters from the Queen w^h commands to find out his Ma^y whom
M. de Turenne desired to Speak with.
Ibid.

The Duke go's Abbeville, and sends Cap: Cook in further quest of the King to Dieppe and Rouen.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p: 145.

Having no account of the King, his R.H.
go's himself privately to
M. de Turenne
at Amiens.
Ibid.

Mons^r. de Turenne generously offers to y^e Duke, of furnishing him with troopes, armes, provisions, transports, ships, &c. to pass over into England. Ibid.

was not to search for the Duke, it was only to bring home the master of the house, who was dead drunk and brought home betwixt four of them.

The next morning his R. H. in pursuance of what he had resolv'd, went away for Boulogne, and return'd no more to Calais during all the time of his residence in those parts. Some time after, Captain Thomas Cook came thither from Paris, with letters to the Duke from the Queen his Mother, and commands to find out his Ma^y. These letters likewise inform'd him, that Mons^r. de Turenne who was then about Amiens desir'd to speak with the King in reference to his affaires in England. Upon which the Duke went immediatly to Abbeville, hoping there to have found the King; But his Ma^y was departed from thence, and all his R. H. could hear of him, was that he was gone towards Dieppe, and thither he sent Captain Cook after him; who missing of him there also, went in quest of him as farr as Rouen, but his Ma^y was gone from thence also on his way to St Malo: Whereupon Cook return'd to the Duke, and gave him account of his fruitless diligence.

The busines was of too great importance to be neglected, and therefore his R. H. resolv'd on going himself privatly to Mons^r. de Turenne: when he was come to him at Amiens, Mons^r. de Turenne told him, He had desired to speak to the King his Brother, but since his Ma^y was not to be found, he would do him the same service in the Duke's person: Therupon he offer'd him his own Regiment of foot, which he would make up twelve hundred men, and the Scots-Gendarmes, to carry over into England with him; That besides this, he would furnish him with three or four thousand spare armes, six feild peices with ammunition proportionable, and tooles, and as much meale as would serve for the Sustenance of five thousand men for the space of six weeks, or two months; and farther, would furnish him with Vessels for the conveyance of all this into England, and permitt the Troopes that his Ma^{ty} had in Flanders, to march to Boulogne and there imbarke, with orders to follow the Duke as fast as Vessells could be provided for them; advising his R. H. to send directions to them, that they should march immediatly to S^t Omers where a pass should meet them.

And that all these preparations might be compass'd with more ease and certainty, he offer'd the Duke to pawne his plate and make use besides of all his interest and credit, to make up such a sum of mony as should be thought necessary for the carrying on of the business: Concluding all with this expression, That his R. H. might easily beleieve he had no orders from the Cardinal, who was then at the Conference, to perform all this; but what he did was freely of himself, out of no other motive then kindness to the Duke, and to his family.

Tis not hard to imagine, that his R. H. accepted of this noble Offer with great joy, and that he lost no time in designing where to land with these forces. The place resolv'd on was Rye, and that in case the Country should come in to him, he should march on to Maydstone and Rochester; if not, then to fortify that Town, which by reason of its situation might be made so strong within few days, that Lambert should not easily haue forced him out of it; and he would haue found him work enough in that Seige, to haue divided the forces of the Rebels, and disorder'd all their methods.

These things being thus resolv'd, and order'd, the affaire was put into a forwardness; and Mons^r. de Turenne gave the Duke a letter to (the) Lieu^t Governour of Boulogne, wherein he was commanded to furnish his R. H. with all the Vessells, and Fisher-boats which he could get together in all his Government of the Boulonois. The Duke gave this letter himself to the Lieutenant du Roy, with another from the Marechal d'Aumont his Governour, which the Queen had procur'd and sent to the

P A R T
III.

1659.

M.deTurenne offers also to pawne his plate, and use all his credit, to make up a sum of mony for carrying on this enterprise.
OR: MEM:

P. 3. p: 146.
An all this freely of himself out of Kindness to the Duke and to his Royal family. Ibid.

The Duke accepts the offer wth joy, and Rye is the landing place resolved upon. Ibid.

The Duke gets letters from M^r. de Turenne, and from the Mareshall d'Aumont, to the Lieu^t. du Roy of Calais, ordering him to assist his R. H. wth Ships and all he could desire.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p: 146.

P A R T

III.

1659.

The Duke of Bouillon, and other Nephews of M. de Turenne, were to go Volunteers with his R. H. Ibid. p: 147.

The Duke ready to imbarke the next day, is stop'd by the news of Sir George Booth's defeat. Ibid.

M. de Turenne advises the Duke to haue patience and wait a better opportunity. Or: MEM: P. 3. p: 147.

The Duke fearing the King might be landed in the West and in difficulties, presses M. de Turenne to let him go over to his Ma^{ties} assistance, but could not prevaile. Ibid.

Duke from Paris, by which the Lieu^t was likewise order'd to assist his R. H. with Vessels, and all things he could desire.

The busines was now so far advanced, and in such a readiness, that the Duke of Bouillon, and others of M. de Turenne's Nephews, were to haue gone Volunteers with the Duke; and the next day was appointed for his R. H. and his Soldiers to imbarke at Estape, to which place the Troopes were already upon their march, when letters from England brought the unwelcome news of Sir George Booth's defeat by Lambert. Upon which the Duke, being then at Boulogne, went to M^r. de Turenne who was at Montreuil to informe him of it; who in that juncture thought it not advisable for his R. H. to adventure into England, but counsell'd him to haue patience and expect a better opportunity, which could not be long wanting to him, by reason of the disorders and distractions which must of necessity happen amongst them in England: Notwithstanding which reasons, the Duke press'd him to consent that he might go, telling him that he beleev'd the King might be landed in the West, or somewhere in Wales, and be there ingag'd in difficulties and dangers; and that if his conjecture should prove true, there was no other way of saving his Ma^{ty} and gaining time for him to attempt any thing considerable, but the Duke's going over, and making a diversion: But these arguments could not prevaile on Mons^r. de Turenne to give his R. H. the leave which he So earnestly desir'd; for he replyd, That he was very confident his Ma^{ty} was not gone for England, and that thō he were, it was not reasonable for the Duke to hazard himself, when there was no probability of Success: He therefore counsell'd his R. H. to return to Flanders, and there to expect some news from the King his Brother, and fresh intelligence from England. And when he had concluded with this advice, knowing the Duke wanted mony, he lent him three hundred pistoles, and gave him a Pass. And thus an end was put to this * design; and the Duke return'd to Bruxelles.

In this way he pass'd through Peronne; where he privately visited the Governour of that place, the Marquis d'Hocquincourt, an old acquaintance of his, whom he had known in the French Army, who us'd him with all imaginable civility and kindness. The 11th of September he reached Cambray, and from thence went straight to Bruxelles: where he found, that notwithstanding the Duke of Gloucester had deliver'd to the Marquis de Caracena the letters which his R. H. had written from Boulogne for the marching of his Troopes to St Omer, yet the Marquis would not permitt them to stirr out of their quarters; thō he was sufficiently press'd to it by the Duke of Gloucester: But he still answer'd, he did not beleeeve M^r. de Turenne durst let them pass through any part of his King's Dominions, without order, which he knew he could not haue. Nor would he suffer them to draw down to the Sea-side, to which he was also urged by the Duke of Gloucester, when he found he could not obtain his first point. What his reasons were for refusing these two requests, the Duke could not learn; but as it happen'd, the denyall prov'd to be of no prejudice to his Majesties affaires; Only it gaue opportunity to See what was to be expected from the Marquis, if things were left to his management.

This design being thus blasted, and no hopes left of attempting any thing in England at that time, the Duke past the remaining part of this year at Bruxelles, expecting the King his Brother, who arriv'd thither from the Conference at Font-arabie a litle before Christmas.

P A R T
III.

1659.
M. de Turenne lends the Duke 300 pistoles, and gives him a pass to return to Flanders.
Oz: M^{em}:
P. 3. p: 148.

The Duke arrives at Bruxelles, where he finds that Caracena tho press'd by
the Duke of Gloucester, would not lett
the English Troopes
march as the Duke had orderd.
Ibid. p: 149.

* Here ends the condensed Military Narrative, which was given to Mareshall Turenne's Nephew, the Cardinal de Bouillon, by James the Second.

P A R T

III.1659.

And to shew here, what litle expectation even the most intelligent Strangers had at that time, of those Changes which happen'd so soon afterwards in England ; his Ma^y. as he came back from Fontarabie through France, press'd the Cardinal very earnestly for leave to Stay, thō never so privatly, with the Queen his Mother, which small favour he was not able to obtain ; and therupon was forced to return to Bruxelles much against his inclination, having only Stay'd some few days with the Queen at Colombe (which he tooke in his way) a civility which could not well be refus'd him.

1660.

P A R T
III.

THE hopes concerning England being now reduced to the lowest ebb, in the beginning of the year, 1660, an offer was made to the Duke, of commanding in Spain against Portugal, and also to be their High Admiral with the Title of Principe de la Mare; which office, the Duke has been told, was never given to any but the King's Sons or near Relations, and whoever enjoys it commands the Galleys as well as Ships, and wherever he lands he commands as Vice Roy of that Country whilst he stays in it; he has also the fifts of all Prises, and a great Salary, besides other considerable perquisites: So that this was not only a very honorable post, but also a very advantageous one even as to profit, which was what the Duke then wanted. He therefore readily consented to the offer which was made to him, the King his Brother ratifying it with his free permission.

And now his R. H. was preparing to go for Spain in the ensuing spring, when that Voyage was happily prevented by the wonderfull Changes, which were almost daily produced in England: And when the motion was once begun, it went on so fast, that his Majesty was almost in his own Country, before those abroad, especially the Spaniards, would beleieve there was any Revolution towards it; for even after Sir John Greenfeild was come over to the King from Genⁿ. Monk, they yet beleev'd him as far as ever from his Restoration, and were so possest of that opinion, that they let him go into Holland. And at last when his Ma^{ty} was at Breda not many days before he embarked for England, the Marquis de Caracena endeavoured to perswad him to return to Flanders.

1660.

The Duke is offer'd to command in Spain against Portugal, and to be made high Admiral of Spain, with the Title of Principe de la Mare.

OR: MEM:
P. 3. p: 150.

The Duke preparing to go for Spain, in the Spring, is happily prevented by the wonderfull sudden Changes in England. Ibid.

The King is almost in his own Country, before the Spaniards would beleieve there was a Revolution towards it.
OR: MEM:
P. 3. p: 150.

The King at Breda, the Marq^t. de Caracena endeavours to perswad him to return into Flanders. Ibid.

P A R T
III.

1660.

His Ma^y has no inclination to trust his person into the hands of y^e Spaniards.
Ibid.

Yet not to disoblige Caracena, he sends y^e Duke to him to Bruxelles to hear what he had to impart, which was only an ayry project from Scott.
O^r: MEM:
P. 3. p. 151.

The Duke returns to y^e King who soon aftergo's to the Hague. Ibid.

His Ma^y embarkes for England at Schevelin in May. Ibid.

And arrives with the Duke of York, and y^e Duke of Glocester, in London, the 29. May 1660.
Ibid. p. 152.

He pretended he had busines of importance to acquaint his Ma^y with from England, some persons being come over from thence to Bruxelles, who had great offers to make to him: And he sent the Count de Grammont with letters to him on that occasion, desiring his Ma^y would be pleas'd to give himself the trouble of coming but as far as Antwerp, or at least to West-Wesel, he not being able to wait on him (as he knew he ought) any where out of his Master's Dominions. But his Majesty had no inclination to venture his person in the hands of the Spaniards, not knowing what the consequences might be; And besides he could easily judge, that it must either be a pretence to draw him thither, or indeed a thing not worth his journey, his return to England being then ascertain'd.

But because he would give the Marquis no reason of complaint, he sent the Duke to Bruxelles, and desir'd the Marquis to impart the busines to him; When his R. H. came thither, he found it was only Coll: Bampfieild who was come over with some ayry proposition from Scott, and some of that Party: From whence the Duke concluded, that his Ma^y had done wisely not to stirr from Breda.

When his R. H. had stayd a day or two with the Marquis, he returned to the King his Brother, who some few days after went to the Hague, where he was very well received; and embarking himself at Schevelin about the latter end of May, (23^d) on boord the English Navy, commanded then by Generall Montague, he landed with his two Brothers, The Duke of York and the Duke of Glocester, at Dover, the - - (25th) of the same month, and made his entry into London on the 29th, which happen'd to be his Birth-day.

THE LIFE
OF
H. R. H. JAMES DUKE OF YORK,
LORD HIGH ADMIRAL OF ENGLAND, LORD WARDEN OF THE CINQUE PORTS, &c. &c. &c.

COLLECTED OUT OF MEMOIRS WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

THE SECOND PART.

 By this SECOND PART his Majesty's Private Secretary, who collected the various circumstances of his Royal Master's Life out of his Private Memoirs, does not appear to have intended any reference to those Divisions of the Stuart MSS. which had been referred to by him throughout the preceding Volume, but to mark the respective Volumes, or Tomes, of his Biography of JAMES, of which this is lettered at the back as Tome 2^d. and carries on The Life of H. R. H. The Duke of York from the Restoration of Charles the Second to his death. — EDITOR.

THE LIFE

OF

JAMES THE SECOND,

KING OF GREAT BRITAIN,

COLLECTED OUT OF MEMOIRES WRITT IN HIS OWN HAND.

THE SECOND PART.

1660.

NEVER was greater joy known in England then upon the reception of the King, and never was any people so happy as those of our three Kingdoms were upon the Restoration of his Majesty: To be sensible of it, we need but reflect on their past miserys, and what their sufferings were by a Rebellion which lasted from the year, 1641, to 1660, without intermission. In which the whole frame of the Government

The joy and happines of Eng^d, upon the King's Restoration.

T O M E

II.

1660.

was overturn'd, Monarchy destroyd, the King murder'd, and to make it yet more horrid by a pretended Court of Justice; the Nobility and Gentry brought low, many of which had the same fate with their King; the Church Government quite destroyd; and a Commonwealth, or rather Anarchy, set up by the force and influence of an Army, whose Officers for the most part were of the meanest sort of men, even brewers, Coblers, and other Mechanicks. After this, Cromwell their Generall usurped the supreme authority, and under the name of Protector govern'd more arbitrary, then ever any King of England had done before him. After his death, his Son Richard stept in to the Government; and was immediatly turn'd out by the Army, who took the Supreme power into their hands, and knew not how to dispose of it. But after severall changes and convulsions of State, God out of his great mercy to these Nations, and the more to shew his Omnipotent hand, made use of Generall Monk, as an Instrument (thō a weak one) to restore the King without one drop of blood shed, to the astonishment of all the Christian World.

The deaths of the Duke of Glocester, and the P^{re} of Orange.

Nor did ther happen any thing in this first year of the Restoration, to interrupt the publick joy of the Court, and of the Nation, but the untimely deaths of the Duke of Glocester, and the Princesse of Orange; the first in September, and the other the Christmas following, and both of the small pox: That Duke had all the naturall qualitys requisit to make a great Prince, which made his loss the more sensibly felt by all the Royall Family: Which greif was renewed and augmented, by the death of his Sister the Princesse of Orange so suddenly following, whose personall merits, and particular love of all her Relations, which she manifested in the time of their distress, caus'd a sorrow for her death, as great as was their esteem of her.

We must not forget to mention in this year, so important and so extraordinary a passage of the Duke's life, as was his first marriage with the Lord Chancellor's daughter, Extraordinary indeed both in it self, and in the consequences both good and bad which in process of time followed from it. When the Princesse of Orange came to Paris to see the Queen her Mother, the Duke being (there) at that time, as has been before mention'd, M^{rs}. Anne Hide was one of her Maids of Honour, who ther attended her : It happen'd that after some conversation together, the Duke fell in love with her, she having witt, and other qualitys capable of surprising a heart less inclinable to the Sexe, then was that of his Royall Highness in the first warmth of his youth. She indeed shew'd both her witt and her vertue in managing the affaire so dexterously, that the Duke overmaster'd by his passion, at last gave her a promise of marriage some time before the Restoration : Not long after which, the Lord Chancellor, her Father, being then uppermost in the Kings favour, the Duke chose that time to beg his Majesty's leave, to perform what he had promis'd ; which at first his Majesty positively refused, and used many arguments to dissuad the Duke from that resolution ; and not only his Ma^y, but many of the Duke's freinds, and most especially some of his meniall Servants, with a violent Zeal opposed the match. However (the Duke still continuing constant in his resolution to be true in his word, and chusing rather to undergo the censure of being fraile in promising, then of being unjust in breaking his promise) the King at last, after much importunity, consented to the marriage ; and it may well be suppos'd that My Lord Chancellor did his part, but with great caution and circumspection, to soften the King in that matter, which in every respect seem'd So much for his own advantage. The King's leave being thus obtain'd, the Duke without loss of time

TOME
II.

1660.
The Duke of York's 1st marriage with L^d Chancellor Hide's daugh ter.

TOME II. 1660. privatly married the young Lady, and soon after own'd the marriage. It must be confessed, that what she wanted in birth, was so well made up by other endowments, that her cariage afterwards did not misbecome her acquired dignity.

1661.
Venner's Insurrection.

Soon after this in the beginning of January 1661, one Venner a fifth Monarchy man, and a holder forth amongst them, after having preached to his Congregation and fasted all the day with them ; being full of the Spirit of Rebellion, march'd out of their meeting house with thirty in his Company all arm'd, between eleven and twelve at night, and ran about the Streets crying, Live King Jesus, and that all should follow him that were for King Jesus, and those that did not should keep their houses. Some of the Constables hearing this, went to suppress them, but thō three or four of the Watches joyn'd together, they durst not venture upon them ; so that Venner march'd throw the Town without any opposition, and none of his party being mad enough to come and joyn with him, he and his Company betook themselves to the woods near High gate.

The King at Portsmouth, to see the Queen mother and P^{re} Hen-riette imbarke for France, at the time of Venners insurrection.

The Duke
indispos'd Stays behind at Whitehall.

At this time it happen'd that his Majesty was at Portsmouth, having gone thither with the Queen his Mother, and his Sister Princesse Henriette, to see them imbarke ther for France ; but the Duke being somewhat indispos'd stayd behind at Whitehall: The Generall who was at the Cockpit, had soon the allarme, and came and waked the Duke to give him an account of it ; wherupon they sent out some of the few horse which were yet left not payd off, and the Generall's own Troop commanded by Sir Philip Howard, to look after them : But Venner keeping the woods, and the Horse not knowing the Country, did not light on them.

After two or three days lurking, Venner and his men leaving the woods before day marched into London ; and came through Allgate about seven in the morning, crying as before, Live King Jesus, and that such as were for him should joyn them. There they found no resistance, and so passing by Leaden-hall, and driving before them such loose men of the Militia as offer'd to appear upon the noise, they pass'd on by the old Exchange, and advanced as far as Woodstreet, where a party of about twenty horse commanded by one Corbet came up to them, but the Street was so narrow, that the horse could not break in upon them; By this time the Trainebands were up, and came so thick upon them, who had only two men that joyn'd them in all their march throw the City, that they were forced to get into a house where they defended themselves.

Whilst this pass'd in the City, news of it was brought to the Duke and the Generall at Whitehall by a Messenger; who told them that when he came away, Venner and his Company were come up as far as Leaden-hall, beating all before them: Wherupon the Duke and the Generall immediatly took horse, there being no more left on the guard. But as they went on, so many of the Nobility and Gentry with their attendants came and joyn'd them, that when they were got as far as S^t Paul's, they were no less in number then fifteen hundred horse.

There they met the Lord Maior, Sir Richard Brown, who told them, that Venner and all his party were either taken or kill'd; That the Militia which beseiged them, and (had been order'd to) drive them out of the house which they so obstinately defended, (could not do it) without firing it, which for good reasons they durst not do; till at last one Lambert a Seaman (who afterwards for his good Service was made Commander of the Duke's Yacht, and in the end of the year 1665 was slain on board the ANNE a Third rate) perswaded some of them to follow him and get up on the top of the house, which they did and forced their entry that way.

T O M E
II.

1661.

The Duke and the Generall march towards Venner with about 20 horse.

T O M E
II.

1661.
All Venner's men killed or wounded, before they could be masterd.

These desperate men were almost all killed or wounded before they could be master'd, and one only of them ask'd for quarter; at which a Camarad of his, that layd wounded in the room, endeavour'd with his Sword to kill him, reviling him for being so mean as to ask quarter. Venner had no less then nineteen wounds on him, and it was with great difficulty that the Surgeons kept him alive, till he could be condemn'd and hang'd; as he, and the rest of his fanatick Crew that were left alive, soon were, except two who were made use of as witnesses against the rest.

And so ended this mad attempt of a furious Zeal, which seem'd in a manner design'd by Providence to convince the King and his Ministers, of the necessity of providing better for the safety of his person, and the Security of the Government, then hitherto they had done, by letting them See what dangerous spirits lay still scatter'd about in the body of the Kingdom; Nor indeed could it well be otherwise, since so very lately the Government of the Nation was in the hands of phanaticks, and that men of the same temper were still in being, tho not in power.

The Duke
upon the occasion of Venner's business, proposes in a Councill the keeping up some and raising more Troops for the Security of the Government.
The Duke's advice is follow'd.

For this reason it was, that the Duke proposed to the Councill, which was called in the time of the Insurrection, That they should write to his Majesty, and desire him to Stop the disbanding of the Generall's Troop of horse Guards and the Regiment of foot, which were to have been payd off that day, and that he would rather think of raising more men for the security of his person and Government; Which advice his Majesty follow'd, and immediatly gave order for the raising a new Regiment of Guards, of twelve Companies, to be commanded by Collonel John Russell, and a Regiment of horse of eight Troops, of which the Earle of Oxford was to be Collonel, and also a Troop of horse Guards to be Commanded by the Lord Gerard: he likewise sent for the Duke's Troop of Guards which were then at Dunkirk. Moreover he gave out Commissions to the Earle of - - - , and the Earle of - - - , for Regiments of horse, and that they should name their under Officers, who likewise had Commissions, and should list men in their Severall Counties, who were not to be in present pay, but in a readiness in case there should be any occasion for their service.

T O M E
II.

1661.

It may be wonder'd at, that the Lord Chancellor and the Earle of Southampton, the King's Cheif Councillors, who had been eye-witnesses of the Insurrections and Rebellions in the time of King Charles the first, and what he suffer'd for want of good Guards, should now be so careless of the King's safety, as not to have advised him to secure himself from such dangers for the future: And in this I can not but think My good Lord Hawly a wiser States-man then they; for upon this occasion he told the King, That the better he was guarded, the more his Enemies would fear him, and his Friends love him.

Reflection on the Chancellor, and Southampton's unjustifiable conduct in this affaire.

Now this is the more to be wounder'd at in these two Lords, because they together with the Bishops, were the great opposers in the House of Lords of the King's inclination and intention to grant, according to his promise given at Breda, a Toleration to Dissenters so limited, as not to disturb the publick peace of the Kingdom: So that all this being put together, it plainly appears, that the consequence unavoidable of their Counsels, was to irritate an Enemy, and not to arm against him, which shews that a misguided Zeal of Religion often turns the brains of the wisest heads; for it was that only which made the Chancellor (who in all other matters was true to the interest and honour of the Crown) oppose here in both, the King's and the Duke's Sentiments; and in some Sorte cause a breach of publick faith, or at least of the King's word, which ought to have been Sacred and inviolate.

TOME
II.

1661.
Character of some of his Majestie cheif Ministers.

L^d Chancellor, Duke of Ormonde and the E. of Bristol in no good understanding together.

E. of Southampton much esteem'd.

Now in regard of the influence which Ministers of State have upon all proceedings of the Government, in which his R. H. had so great a share, as to the executive part, in being High Admirall, It will not be improper to give here a short account of their persons and qualifications, who were then imployd and taken into trust by his Majesty. We have already observed that for some time before the Restoration, there was no very good understanding between the Duke and the Kings Ministers, which were then the Lord Chancellor Hide, the Duke of Ormonde, and the Earle of Bristol: The last of these, having declar'd himself a Catholick some months before the Restoration, took no longer his place in the Privy Councill, but nevertheless was as much trusted in the secret affaires as formerly. But this Triumvirat held not long together; for the Earle of Bristol endeavour'd to ingross by some by ways, more of the Kings favour to himself, then the Chancellor was willing to allow him; This after some time broke out into an open war between the two pretenders, In which Bristoll was at first worsted, the Chancellor having on his side the Earle of Southampton, a person much esteem'd by the King and the Kingdom, and who had no good opinion of the Earle of Bristol; who being of a haughty temper could not bear this preference of his Enemy, but fell therupon into violent courses and expostulations even with his Majesty himself: And thō at first he did not succeed therein, yet afterwards (as it will appear) in conjunction with other Enemies of the Chancellor, he gained his point in dismounting his adversary, but without any other advantage to himself, except the guilty pleasure of revenge.

Now whereas the King had layd his commands upon the Duke, to live well with all those that were trusted by his Majesty, this was now the more easily obey'd, in relation to the Chancellor, upon the consideration of his daughter; and from that time forwards his R. H. was a fast freind to the Lord Chancellor, as far as consisted with his duty to the King.

T O M E
II.

1661.

That Minister, in generall, was very loyall and true to the interest of the Crown ; but I can not excuse him from having been very faulty in not procuring (or at least endeavouring it) in the first Parliament, after the Kings return, a Repeal of all those Statuts so injurious to the Crown, that past in the long Rebellious Parliament ; which, if well solicited, might easily have been obtain'd at that time, the Parliament being then in so loyall a temper and so hearty for the King. With the like facility, he also might have obtain'd such a Revenue settled upon the Crown, as might have secured it for the futur from the attempts of factious Spirits, and such terrible calamitys as lately it had sustain'd. The Chancellor wanted not skill and foresight to make him sensible of all this : and therefore some have thought, not improbably, that this remisnes of his proceeded from a jealousy, that the King was inwardly inclin'd to Popery : wherfore he, himself being a zealous Protestant, thought it not expedient to have his Majesty too much at ease, and be trusted with too large a power.

L^d Chancellor Loyal, but faulty in not getting the Acts of the long Parl^t. repeal'd, and a competent Revenue Settled upon the Crown in his Ma: first Parl^t.

It was by the advice and negociation of this Minister, that in the year, 1662, the marriage between the King and the Infanta of Portugal, was concluded ; which in appearance was advantageous to the Crown of England, and would have really been so, if the Town of Tanger which was given in part of the portion, could have been made (as then it was beleev'd it could be) a safe harbour for our Ships, and if the Queen had proved fruitfull, as it was likewise hoped she would : One would have thought that My Lord Chancellor's fortune and greatnes was so 1662.

The King's Marriage with the Infanta of Portugal, negotiated by the Chancellor.

TOME firmly establish'd, as never to be moved by bringing a Queen
II. into England of his own chusing, and by having his daughter 1661. married to the next Heir, then in being, to the Crown. But to let us see how short sighted, as to future events, and how apt to misreckon even the wisest men are, those very things which seem'd at first the props of his greatnes, proved at last to be the occasion of his fall, and a load and charge upon him, under which he sunk : for his Enemies afterwards made the barrennes of the Queen (especially his own Daughter proving fruitfull) a crime in him, pretending he either did, or might have known it, considering the Age and Nation of the Queen ; And how far this jealousy may have enter'd into the King himself, to make him the more easily part with his Minister, I leave it for others to guess.

The King, and the Duke meet the Queen at Portsmouth, where she landed the 24th
 May.

Vpon the news of the Queen's arriual in Portsmouth road, under the conduct of the Earle of Sandwich, The Duke attended by many of the Nobility went by the King's order, to wait on her Majesty on board some leagues off at Sea, and bring her to land : Where she arrived the 24th of May, and was received by the King, and led by him to her lodging ; where, after she had reposed for some litle time, their Majestys were marryd by My Lord Aubigny Almoner to the Queen, but So privatly (not to offend the Protestants) that none were present but some few Portugaises, as witnesses : Soon after this, the King and Queen coming forth into the great room, where all the company was, and being Seated in two chaires, Doctor Sheldon then Bishop of London perform'd the outward ceremony in publick, of declaring (them) to be man and wife.

It may be wonder'd, why the Queen was not married by Proxy, and by My Lord Sandwich the King's Ambassador, before she left Portugall, as is usuall in such cases : Nor do's there appear any other reason for it, but that the Portugaises are more scrupulous then other Nations, and would not have the Ceremony perform'd in their own Country by a Protestant. T O M E

II.

Many other proposalls and offers of Matches had been before this made to the King; of which I shall only mention that of Cardinal Mazarin's Neice, who was cryd up for the greatest beauty in Europe; because it had this of particular in it, that it had been at different times both offer'd and refus'd on both sides. For in the time of the King's being abroad, and a litle before the Treaty of S^t Jean de Luz, when there was a great alteration and confusion in England, upon the Armys dissolving the Rump Parliam^t, and setting up their Comitee of safety; it was thought by some of the King's freinds, that the Cardinal would be glad to have such an honour done to his family, as to have his Neice married to the King: On the other side, considering how great he was in power and mony, they concluded, that if he would heartily imbrace the King's interest, he might be able in a litle time to restore his Majesty. For these reasons it was, that either Abbot Montague, or My Lord Aubigny, took an occasion to propose the matter to him: But the Cardinal it seems had an ill opinion of the King's affaires, and thought them desperate, according to the notions given him by Monsieur Bourdeaux the French Minister in England, and therefore put it off with a compliment, and would not enter into the Treaty. But when the King was restor'd soon after, the Cardinal, not forgetting the proposall made to him, had the courage to take it up again, and to make an offer of his Neice to his Majesty with a vast Sum of mony for her portion: And then, neither the charms of her beauty, nor so much mony could prevaile with the King, who in his turn also put it off with a compliment, and so the matter rested.

I have not much to Say from this time, till the beginning of the Dutch War, all things then continuing quiet at least in outward appearance both at home and a broad; Only I shall 1662.

A matche between the King and C^t.
Mazarin's Neice offer'd and refus'd on both sides at different times.

TOME
II.

1665.
Secret workings of the Republican's Party against the Government.

Wildman, Bremen, and Creed, Secur'd.

Bradford's Conspiracy.

observe, that the restless party of the Republicans were secretly working to destroy the Government, and for that end the Chief of them had privat meetings and consultations how to carry on their designs, wherein they could hardly agree amongst themselves concerning what sort of Government they should declare for, both in Church and State ; for their Councils consisted of all sorts of Protestant Dissenters, except the Quakers. Of all this his Ma^y was from time to time advertis'd by some false brethren amongst them, and therupon he thought fitt to secure some of the old Officers of Cromwell's Army, and the Cheif of the Nonconformists, such as Major Wildman, Major Bremen, Major Creed, and severall others that were likely to head them, and get together considerable numbers of disbanded Soldiers of the old Army, that were all good fighting men. These above nam'd, were kept in prison till the year 1667, when the Lord Chancellor Clarendon was layd aside. This however did not dishearten the Party from designing a Rising, one to be in London, and another in the North about York, both at the same time.

That in London was thus design'd ; that when his Majesty was to go to see one of the Militia Regiments, some of their gang, who were in it, should load their Muskets with bullet, and when they gave a voley to salute him, they should shoot at him ; And one Bradford a SerJeant of that Regiment, who was at this Consultation, when some of them said, What shall we do if we miss him ? answer'd, If you miss him with your shott, I will not miss him with my halbard : These words this Villain did not deny when he was taken, and brought in chains to his Ma^y, who examin'd him himself ; and they were proved against him afterwards at his Tryall.

Most of this Caball were Seised, and amongst the rest one Ridge a preacher, they were examin'd by the Secretarys and would confess nothing : wherupon his Ma^y sent for Ridge, and examin'd him himself, none being present but the Duke and Lord Lauderdale. At first he would own nothing ; but the Duke asking him, if he were married, which he said he was and had a wife and five small Children, and then pressing him again, by letting him see that if he still persisted in his obstinacy, and did not confess what he knew, he would certainly be hang'd, and leave his wife and Children to starve, whereas if he would be ingenuous and trust to his Ma^{ties} mercy, he might save his life and have wherewithall to provide for his family ; this so struck him, that he immediatly fell on his knees, ask'd his Ma^{ties} pardon, confessed the whole design, and serv'd as a witness against the rest of them, who could not have been convicted of Treason without him, there being but one Witness besides himself ; and he became So true a convert, that afterwards he was made a muster-master at Sea, and was slain in the four days fight in 1666.

As to affaires in the Government, and at Court, they at this time went smoothly on, the Chancellor continuing Cheif Minister, and solely governing the matters of State. Lord Falmouth was in great favour with the King from the beginning of the Restoration ; and none ever had it to such a degree, either in this or any other Kingdom, that consider'd so litle his own concerns, and so much his Masters ; for when afterwards he was kill'd at Sea, he dy'd without leaving any Estate behind him, thō he was no ways extravagant in his expences : But he was of so generous a nature, that when any projects of advantage to himself had been brought to him, and that he had obtain'd the King's promise for a grant of them, if some old suffering Cavaliers happen'd at the same time to put in for them, he releas'd the King of his promise to himself and got them given to the others, Saying, that for him, sooner or later the King would provide. It were to be wished that all Favorites and first Ministers would follow such an Example.

T O M E II.

1662.
Ridge, one of Bradford's Caball, ex-amin'd by the King ; the Duke being present, is the occasion of his confessing the whole design.

L^d. Falmouth in great favour with the King.
His Elogium.

TOME
II.

1662.

E. Arlington brought into the favour by the Chancellor, but turn'd afterward his Enemy.

Sr W. Coventry, the Duke's Secretary, in favour by reason of his great ability, y^e Chancellor and he jealous of one another.

The Duke of Buckingham tho at first not of the Councill, by degrees comes into favour, and joins with the Chancellor's Enemies.

About this time the Lord Arlington being come from Spaine, endeavour'd to insinuate himself into his Majesties favour, and was at first supported by the Lord Chancellor, and his old Master the Earle of Bristol, neither of which cared for Lord Falmouth; But after his death, the Chancellor soon repented the helping hand he had given to Arlington, and with good reason, as will appear in the sequell of this history.

Sir William Coventry also, who was the Duke's Secretary, and much in his favour by reason of his great ability, kept not long well with the Chancellor; who finding him to be a very industrious man in busines, and very capable, grew jealous of him and secretly endeavour'd to keep him back, which the other was clear sighted enough to perceive; and therefore when the opportunity was offer'd, he fail'd not to give his helping hand towards laying aside the Chancellor.

I must have also mention (of) the Duke of Buckingham; who, thō when his Ma^y came first into England, was not made of the Councill (as all but himself were that had been of it beyond Sea) by reason of several misbehaviours towards his Majesty, when he came into England Some years before the Restoration; yet being admitted to Court, and being of a very pleasant and agreeable conversation, he by degrees insinuated himself again so much into the King's favour, as to be brought first into the Councill and after some time to be made Master of the Horse. Being thus advanced, he quickly joyn'd with those other persons who design'd the Chancellor's ruine, and by his raileries did by degrees use his Majesty to hear the Chancellor spoken against: But that Minister was too well fix'd to be easily shaken, thō he had many Enemies at Court who had the King's hear, so that he made good his post against them all for some years; till at last, finding that they could not prevaile with his Ma^y to lay him aside, they rais'd such a faction against him in the house of Commons (a thing easy enough to be brought about in that place against any first Minister) as was at last the cause of his downfall, as will heareafter appear.

T O M E
II.

1662.

But to return from this digression, to what more immediatly relates to the Life and Actions of his Royall Highness. I (It) must be remember'd that ever since his return into England, he made it his busines, as being Lord High Admirall, to inform himself of the condition of the Fleet; which, thō much increas'd in number of Ships by the Vsurper's, was then by the many changes and revolutions after the death of Cromwell, but in an ill condition, the Navall Forces quite exhausted, and the Magazins very empty; of which he gave a speedy account to the King, who order'd matters so with the Parliamt, that they voted him a sum of twelve hundred thousand pounds, to be disposed of by him, as the necessitys of the State should require: And his Majesty who understood the true interest of the Nation, and had a particular inclination and application to Maritime Affaires, appointed for the service of the Fleet eight hundred thousand pounds of the sum given, which was most of it layd out in Navall Stores to fill the Magazins, that it might be in his power at any time speedily to sett out a considerable Fleet, when there should be occasion.

The Duke, as, Lord High Admirall, makes it his busines to inquire into the condition of the Fleet.

1663.

800000^{lb} appointed for the Fleet, most of which layd out in Navall Stores.

Besides the care which the Duke had of the Navy, he applyd himself to understand the busines of Trade, which is the great interest of England, and gave all encouragements to the severall trading Companies; as those of the East Indies, Turkey, Hamborough, and Canary, and morouer he sett up a new one for Guiny, which was absolutely necessary for the Support of the Foreing Plantations, and for hindering the Dutch from being absolute masters of the whole Guiny trade: to this end he made use of the aduice and industry of Sir Richard Ford, and some other Marchants, who had got the Secret which the

The Duke encourages the Trading Companies, and sets up a new one for Guiny, w^{ch} was call'd the Royall African Company.

T O M E Dutch had, of dying the Sayes of such a colour as the Blacks liked, and of giving them the Smell in the packing them up, like that which was used at Leyden, from which place formerly all the Sayes were brought that were sent into Guiny.

II.

1663.

The Duke sends Sir Rob: Holmes wth two Ships to support the Aff: Company against the increchements of the Dutch.

Sir Rich: Holmes seizes the Fort of Cap de Vert and the Castle of Cormentin.

The King gives the Duke a patent for Long-Island.

The Duke borrows two Ships from the King, and sends S^r Rich: Nicholas to take possession of Long Island, afterwards call'd New York.

And whereas the Dutch, during the Civill Wars in England, had every where increashed much upon the English Trade, and had dispossessed the English of the Castle of Cormentin on the Gold Coast; the Duke at his first setting up the Guiny or Royall Affrican Company, borrow'd two Ships of his Ma^{ty}, and sent Sir Robert Holmes with them, and with some other Ships belonging to the Company and some few land men, with which according to his orders he seiz'd the Fort of Cap de Vert in Affrica, and took the Castle of Cormentin from the Dutch, leaving garrisons in both of them, and settling Factorys for the Company all along that Coast.

Some time after this, the King gave the Duke a Patent for Long Island in the West Indies, and the Tract of Land between New England and Mary Land, which always belong'd to the Crown of England since it was first discover'd; upon which the Dutch had also incroached during the Rebellion, and built a Town, and some Forts, to secure the Bever-trade to themselves: Wherefore the Duke borrow'd two men of war of the King, in which he sent Collonel Richard Nicholas (an old Officer and one of the Grooms of his Bed-chamber) with three hundred men, to take possession of that Country; which the Dutch gave up upon composition without stricking a Strok, most of the Dutch inhabitants remaining there, together with the old English Inhabitants, and some other Nations who had first planted there with the English; So that Collonel Nicholas remain'd in peaceable possession of that Country, which was then call'd New York, and the Fort up the River nam'd Albany. And as the Duke did all on his side to advance Trade, the Parliament press'd on to it by the King were no less active to make it flourish, which they chiefly did by the Act of Navigation, and other Bills for the encouraging of Trade, and building of Ships.

TOME
II.

1663.

These proceedings and the Severall complaints of our Marchants of the injurys they received from the Dutch, by their depredations of them during the late disturbances in England, were a sort of preamble and introduction to the war which soon after follow'd against Holland; for it now grew to be the Sense of the whole Nation, and of the House of Commons in particular, that Satisfaction ought to be given to our Marchants for the injuries and losses they had sustain'd by the unjust incroachments of the Hollanders, which losses were represented to amount to seven or eight hundred thousand pounds. These Complaints being at last brought to the Parliament, both Houses resolved, That the indignities and dammages done to Vs by the Dutch, were the greatest obstructions to Foreign Trade, and that his Ma^{ty} should be moved to take Speedy course for the Redress thereof.

1664.
The Severall occasions of the first Dutch war.

The whole Nation, and particularly the Parliament, bent for having Satisfaction given by the Dutch for the injuries received from them.

Notwithstanding all this, the Dutch still refused to give that reasonable Satisfaction which was required of them; beleiving, and with some colour of reason, that the Nation would not easily engage in a new and expensive war at Sea, having been but lately settled in peace at home. In the next place, their Ambassador Van-Gough perceived, that the King himself was not much inclin'd to a war, and that the Chancellor was wholly adverse to it; which gave him a wrong aim in this matter, and made him conclude that nothing would be carried in oposition to the sentments of the first Minister. This so misled him, that he would not beleieve the Duke when his R. H. told him plainly in the way of freindship, That unless his Master's the States gave such reasonable Satisfaction as was requir'd, for

The Dutch refuse to give Satisfaction to the English, beleiving that the King and the Chancellor were not for a war.

The Dutch Ambassador So misled by his opinion, that he would not beleieve the Duke himself, when in

TOME
II.

1664. freindship his R. H. endeavours to disabuse him.

Instead of giving Satisfaction, the Dutch sent privat orders to de Ruyter at Cadiz, To Sail to Affrica and dispossess the English of Cormantin,
&c.

S^r Jo. Lawson meets De Ruyter at Cadiz, and suspects his design; but having no instructions to attack him, he only gives notice to the Duke.

Upon notice of De Ruyter's being sail'd to the Coast of Guinea, P^r Rupert is order'd with a Squadron to follow him in October.

the injuries done to the English by his Contrymen, a war would certainly break out: He took it, as said only to fright him, and so deceived both himself, and his Masters, by his too great cunning.

This admonition of the Duke finding no good effect, the King was in a manner necessitated by the generall outcry of the Nation, to declare open war against the Dutch about the beginning of the ensuing February; cheifly occasion'd by the privat orders sent to De Ruyter their Admirall, then in the Streights with twelve men of war, to take in a sufficient supply of victualls at Cadiz, and from thence to make the best of his way to the Coast of Affrica, to dispossess again the Englis of Cormantin Castle, and to ruin all our Factories therabouts, which had been lately establish'd by the particular care and directions of the Duke.

Now when De Ruyter came into the Bay of Cadiz to fit himself for the intended Voyage, he found Sir John Lawson there, who was newly come with a Squadron of our Ships from concluding a peace with the Algerines; and Sir John perceiving, by the Sort of Victualls which De Ruyter took in, that his design was indeed for the Affrican Coast to destroy the establishment of our New Company there, he forthwith advertized the Duke thereof by letters: for after calling a Councill of his Captains together, and reading his Instructions, he found he had no power to proceed to any Act of hostility.

Upon this notice, and further news that De Ruyter was actually Sail'd from Gibraltar to the Southward, and that arriving on the Coast of Guinea, he had seiz'd all in his reach about Cap de Vert, the King resolved to send Prince Rupert to follow him with a Squadron of about twelve men of war, and six of the Company Ships, the least of which had forty guns. But by that time that this Fleet was fitted and come together, which was about the middle of October 1664, a further account was brought, that the Dutch had prepar'd a more considerable one under the command of the Baron of Opdam, with which he pretended in spight and contempt of Vs, to force his passage through the Channel, in order to convoy the Succours design'd for Guinea: In the mean time they had sent before hand a Galliot to their Director general there to give advice thereof.

The King, hereupon, layd aside the thoughts of having Prince Rupert to go thither with the intended Squadron, and in stead thereof, order'd a considerable number of more Ships to be fitted out, amongst which were to be the ROYALL CHARLES, the ROYALL JAMES, SWIFTSURE, and LONDON, of the 1st and 2^d Rates, with others of the 3^d and 4th, so as to make up about forty; and resolved that the whole should be commanded by the Duke, who accordingly parted at the beginning of November for Portsmouth, quickly after which he went aboard, and joyn'd the Prince and the Earle of Sandwich. In the mean time Opdam lay with his Fleet in the Goree, where after all their bravado's, there arose great debates whither they Should now go out, or no; but the wind proving cross to them all that month, determin'd their dispute, and gave them no disagreeable excuse for their staying still at home: For about the beginning of December, when the wind came East, and consequently favorable to bring them out, their design not to make use of it, continued the Same, and so they layd up their Ships for this winter.

The Duke knowing nothing yet hereof, but expecting rather to meet them, cruised to and again for four or five days between Dunnose, Portland, and Cape de Hogue, where by reason of the narrowness of the Channel, he was obliged to Tack every night; and thō it was extreme dark still, and blew very fresh, yet no ill accident happen'd either to himself or any of the Ships.

T O M E
II.

1664.

Upon further notice of the Dutch fitting out a Fleet under Opdam, 'Tis resolved that in stead of P. Rupert's Squadron, a stronger one be put out under the Command of the Duke.

In the beginning of Nov: the Duke go's to Portsmouth and soon after aboard the Fleet with P^r Rupert and the E. of Sandwich.

The Dutch come not out to Sea, but lay up their Ships.

The Duke continues cruising in the Channel, not without danger.

T O M E
II.

1664.
Seeing no appearance of the Dutch coming out, he returns to Spithead, and from thence to Whitehall.

But seeing now in all this time no appearance of any Dutch, he return'd to the Spithead; where he met with the news, that Opdam had received orders from his Masters to lay up, upon their being inform'd that the Duke was ready and in expectation of them: Wherupon his R. H. after having encouraged the Seamen by his presence and directions, return'd together with Prince Rupert to Whitehall, about the beginning of December; and left the Fleet, till he should return, under the Command of the Earle of Sandwich, with orders to send out the 4th and 5th Rates a cruising off the Isle of Wight, and to bring in what Dutch Ships they met with, by way of Reprisals, and this in pursuance of the King his Brother's directions. His Highness gave order also, for the fitting out of the rest of the Ships in harbour, that the whole Fleet with all the provisions necessary might be ready to receive him again by the beginning of Spring: Nor was he wanting to see all things perform'd accordingly, and to hasten back to his charge, as soon as ever the Season would permitt.

The Parliament meets in November, and gives the King 2 millions and a half for the war against the Dutch.

1665.
The first Dutch war declar'd March 4th.
The Duke goes down to Gunfleet to take the Command of the Fleet, March 23.

The 24th of November the Parliament met, and the King, in his Speech to both Houses, represented the present State of Affairs, in relation to the United Provinces, and of the Navall preparations he had made to bring the Dutch to reason: Wherupon the House of Commons the very next day voted his Majesty a supply of two millions five hundred thousand Pounds. And on the 4th of March, the King's declaration of war against the Dutch was solemnly proclaim'd.

It was on the 23 of March following, that the Duke, attended by severall eminent persons and Volonteers of the first quality, parted from London to the Gunfleet, where the generall Rendezvous of the Fleet was. And thō by his continuall directions and presence, he hasten'd all he possibly could to have it completely equip'd to go out forthwith, yet with all his diligence it could not be ready till some five weeks after: However his Highness in the mean while employd his time to the best advantage he could, by ordering all the Flag-Officers to meet every morning on Bord him, and there to agree upon the Orders of Battel and Ranck; for thō in the late Fights in Cromwell's time, the English behaved themselves bravely, yet they minded not any set order, and their Victories were still more owing to their valour, then method; so that this war, begun now under the conduct of his R. H. was the first wherein fighting in a Line and a regular Form of Battel was observ'd.

In the beginnjng of May the Duke put to Sea with all his Fleet, then which, the Nation never hitherto had seen one so glorious and formidable, either in respect of the force and number of Ships, or in regard of a Royall Admirall that commanded them, who had the greatest share both of danger and glory in this Expedition.

The Duke puts to Sea with the Fleet in the beginning of May.

The whole Fleet was compos'd of about ninety eight men of war of severall Rates: There were three of the first Rate, eleven of the second Rate, fifteen of the third Rate, two and thirty of the fourth Rate, eleven of the fifth Rate, and six and twenty marchant Ships arm'd for war from forty to fifty guns, besides fire Ships and tenders &c. The Fleet was divided as usually, into three Squadrons, the Red, the White, and the Blue: At the head of the first was the Duke, in the ROYAL CHARLES, carrying, at the main top mast the Royall Standard, which are the Arms of England. Sir John Lawson had the honour to be his R. H. Vice Admirall of that Squadron, and Sir William Berkley his Rere Admirall. Prince Rupert was Vice Admirall of the Fleet, commanded the White, and carried the Vnion Flag at his main top mast: Sir Christopher Mynns and Captain Sanson were his Vice Admirall, and Rere Admirall. The Earle of Sandwich Rere Admirall of the Fleet, was Admirall of the Blue, and carried the Blue Flag, at his main

The Fleet consists of 98 men of war.

Division of the English Fleet wth an account of its severall Commanders.

TOME
II

1665.

The Dutch not yet appearing, the Duke resolves to visit them on their own Coasts.

top mast, his Vice Admirall and Rere Admirall wer Sir George Ayscue, and Captain Tyddiman.

His Highness being thus attended, thought the time long till he met with the Holland Fleet ; and they not yet appearing abroad, he resolved to visit them upon their own Coasts ; And for some time he cruised to and again between Scheveling and the Texel, and came so near the mouth of it, that he took a particular view of their whole Fleet then at anchor within the harbour ; which gave them so great an alarme, that they forthwith sett up beacons with great speed all along that Coast, so to give notice of any attempt of landing which they very much apprehended.

The Duke discovering ten Sail of Dutch Marchantmen, gives them the chace and they are all taken.

After this his R. H. stood off again some ten leagues, and there came to an anchor, expecting still their coming out ; but in Stead of them, he discover'd some ten sail of their Bourdeaux marchant men, convoy'd by two men of war ; wherupon, they being at about a league to windward of the Englis Fleet, he gave the signal to chace them, and thō it was a Fog,^u all the marchant men were taken, whilst the two Convoy men made a shift to Save themselves.

The Duke returns with the Fleet to Gunfleet, to repaire and take in fresh water.

The Duke seeing yet no appearance of the Dutch coming forth, remain'd however a few days longer on their Coast, till some of his Ships having their Masts come by the bord by foul weather, he thought fitt to return to the Gunfleet to repair and take in fresh water, so that it was now about the end of May, before he could be in a condition to return to Sea again ; however, as the winds stood, he knew at the same time that neither the Enemy could then come forth.

The Duke
go's out again the 30th of May.

But on the morning of the 30th, his R. H. order'd the signall for Sayling again ; and thō at the same instant the wind chang'd and came to the East, whereby it was very difficult to get clear of the Sand-bancks, he made all the use he could of the Tide, being sensible too, that the same wind would bring out the Dutch, and that they might lickely make use of it to shew themselves upon the English Coast, towards the Satisfying of their own people, and repairing a litle the credit they had lost by their late backwardnes; Nor was his Highness deceived in his conjecture. He therefore us'd all means possible to get out, So as to attend their motions: But with all his endeavours he could not, till the first of June, reach Southwold Bay, at which time he came to an anchor there, and about one a clock in the afternoon, the Dutch appear'd to windward of him.

The 1st of June he reaches Southwold Bay where he first discovers the Dutch.

Their Fleet consisted of a hundred and thirteen Ships of war of all Rates, divided into Seven Squadrons, eleven Fire-Ships, and seven Yachts: The whole was commanded by Opdam, who (tho a man of quality and personall courage) was no great Seaman. The Officers under him, who carryd Flags at their main top mast, were Cornelius and John Evertson, (Evertzs) Stillingwert, Tromp, Son to the famous Tronip, Schram, and

The Dutch Fleet consisting of 113 men of war. Their principal Commanders.

The two Fleets did not yet make up to one another, for the English require some time to put themselves in order of Battel, and besides they expected the return of some of their great Ships, which were gone but that very morning to make up their complement of men out of a great Fleet of Colliers then passing by, and bound for London.

The wind also which was still Easterly, fell much towards the evening, so that (litle) way could be then made: In the mean time both Fleets endeavour'd to get what wind there was.

The next day the Dutch were not to be seen, till about ten in the morning; when the Duke having a fresh gale stood towards them, with thirty of his best Saylers, but thought fitt to keep at about two leagues distance, till all his Fleet should be join'd and put in order: which being done, he advanced forwards, so that a litle before the close of the evening, both Fleets were gott within two litle leagues of one another. The

The 2^d of June,
the Duke makes up to the Dutch.

TOME Duke was at that time some eight leagues to the eastward of II. Laystof, (which is about threc or four leagues from Yarmouth) 1665. and the weather was calm all night.

The great Sea Fight of the 3^d June 1665, with the Duke's conduct and dangers therein.

About two of the clock next morning the Dutch were discover'd lighting their matches, and consequently preparing themselves for the Fight; They had the same order of battel as the English, all upon a Line. As the day broke there arose with it a litle fresh gale at Southwest, which was a very proper one for the approching Engagement, towards the better success of which, the Duke with great care and labour made a shift to get the wind; the White Squadron had the Van, and Sir Christopher Mynns, who fir'd the first shot, led it: Whilst the Dutch were led on by three Flag-ships, commanded by Tromp, Courtenaer, and Stelingwart.

The Fight begins at three in the morning.

About three in the morning the Dispute begun briskly on both sides, And when the Van of the Enemy was come up to our Rere, the Duke commanded the signal to be given for the tacking of his whole Fleet, so as to steer the Same course with the Dutch; but the Sayler who was got up the mast to give the Signall, happen'd to be so embarass'd and long about it, that before he could let the Flag fly, Sir Christopher Mynns had with the Van bore up round, (round up) ship after ship, and brought his starbord tacks on bord; Which the Enemies Van seeing, sprung their Luff hoping therby to weather most of the White Squadron. The Duke, perceiving this, stopt the making the intended signall, least it might have put his whole Fleet in disorder; and in stead of bearing up round, as most of the White had done, he tack'd only when it came to his turn; which litle accident lost above six hours, for so long it was before the same opportunity could be had: And then his R. H. thought fitt to give the Signall, wherby the whole Fleet tack'd at once, So that both Fleets had now their Star-bord tacks on bord, and lay as close haled as they could: but the Dutch found great benefit by this accident ; for had the Signall been made as soon as order'd, both the English and they would have had their Larbord-tacks on board, and have stood towards the Coast of England: so that when the Dutch should give way (as they afterwards did) they would have been more expos'd, by having a greater run to make towards their own Coast.

T O M E
II.

1665.

In these two first passes litle dammage was done on either side: Only the CHARITY of fifty guns, which was taken from the Dutch in Cromwell's time, and had been lately one of the Convoy to the Colliers (being a bad Sayler and unable to weather the Dutch) was retaken by them ; thō not till Dickenson, her Captain with half his men were slain, whilst he did all he could to stand throw the whole body of the Enemy. Two other fourth Rates, and one fifth, that were coming up to join our Fleet, not being able to weather the Dutch, tack'd just before they came within cañon shot of them, and got in to our Fleet the next Tack.

Litle dam-mage done in the two first passes.

By this time both Fleets had tack'd twice, and stood the same course, with their Starbord-tacks on board, the wind South West, and they left off firing for near an hour, thō they were within less then random shott of one another ; for each endcavour'd now to make all the Sail they could, the English to keep the wind, and the Dutch to gain it : In the doing of which it fell out, that the Duke changed his order of Battel, as also Opdam did in his side ; For the ROYALL CHARLES, in which the Duke was, being a very good Sayler, got on the head of the EARLE OF SANDWICH who was in the PRINCE, (a heavy Sayler, thō the stoutest Ship of the Fleet): had not the Duke done as he did, the Dutch had streach'd out on head, and might have weather'd him. So that now his R. H. with the Red had the Van, The Blue the Battel, and the White the Rere: And perceiving, that his Vice Admiral Lawson in the ROYAL OAKE had gott the length of the headmost of the

T O M E Dutch, he made him a signall to bear neerer to them ; Where-
II. upon the whole Line did the same.

1665.
 The heat of the Engag-ment begins not, till 10 in the morning.

It was now about ten in the morning, when the heat of the Battel began. Never was seen a more proper day to dispute the Mastery of the Sea ; for it was very smooth, a fine steddly fresh gale at South West, not a cloud in the Sky, nor the least appearance of any alteration of wind or weather.

The Duke
 bears down upon Opdam.

The Enemies Van was led by part of the Zealand Squadron, commanded by John Evertson with three fire Ships on head of 'em, Astern of whom was Opdam ; So the Duke bore down, and according to his Intention had to deal with Opdam : Nor did these two Admirals leave plying one another most furiously for some hours, till the Dutch began to give way.

Sir Jo. Lawson mortally wounded.

And now it was not long before that Sir John Lawson, one of the bravest Seamen of his time, was wounded in the knee with a great shott, which quickly after prov'd mortall ; Who finding himself in that condition, and his Ship also disabled, sent off his Boat to acquaint the Duke therof, wherupon his R. H. order'd Captain Jordan, his own second and an old experienced Officer, to quitt the St. GEORGE where he was, and to command not only Lawson's Ship but his division also : But when he got on bord of the Ship which was the Royall Oak, he found her so disabled that he was forced to ly by to refitt her ; by which means (the fighting Instructions not being then so well drawn as since they have been) all that Division lay by also to look after their Flag, So that the Duke was left very much expos'd, having now but four or five of his own Division on head of him, and Sir Thomas Allen in the PLIMOUTH led the Line.

Sir Jo: Lawson's Division lying by, the Duke is left very much expos'd.

Soon after this, three Dutch men of war which had been seen for some time to the windward of Vs, and were looking out for their own Fleet, bore down in order to join it. One of them was a great Ship of above eighty guns, which for want of some repairs had been left by Cornelius Evertson to his son, with orders to follow; the other two were not of the same force. These being to windward, endeavour'd to join the head of their Fleet, and young Evertson being a mettled man, and having a mind to distinguish himself, resolved to run on board of the PLIMOUTH, hoping to bear her down; But Sir Thomas Allen perceiving by Evertson's working, what his design was, brought his Ship to at once, so that Evertson miss'd his aim, thō he came so near it that the yard-arms of both Ships touch'd, and they gave each other a severe broad-side in passing; after which Evertson, and the other two, made a shift to join their own Fleet, and Sir Thomas Allen continued still leading as before; till, finding himself extremely disabled, he was forced to ly by, as also were the FOUNTAIN, and the Mary, the first an Algereen prise of fourty guns, commanded by Captain Do Tile and the other was a Ship commanded by Sir Jeremy Smith, whose rigging was so cutt that he was forced to quitt the Line.

Soon after this, the old JAMES, a second Rate Ship commanded by the Earle of Marlborow, another of the Duke's seconds and just on head of him, sprung her Luff and got out of the Line; which Sir Allen Aplesey seeing (a great freind of that Earle) and not perceiving the Ship to be so much disabled as she was, said to the Duke, He was sorry to see his old Commarad do so ill; but his R. H. told him, He was confident the Earle was slain, and so it prov'd to be; for both he and his Nephew, the Earle of Portland who went a Volunteer with him, were kill'd. This Ship being gone, the Duke had only the HAPPY RETURN of fifty odd Guns commanded by Captain Lambert, on head of him; So that the Enemy had more leasure to ply his Royall Highness.

Much about this time it was that the Earle of Falmouth, the Lord Muskerry, and Mr Boyle, were all slain with one shott, as

T O M E
II.

1665.

Young Evertson endeavours to bear down the PLIMOUTH.

The PLIMOUTH disabled, is forced to ly by, as also the FOUNTAIN and the Mary.

The E. of Marlborow being kill'd, his Ship the old JAMES lys by.

The Duke having now but one Ship on head of him, is in very great danger.

E. Falmouth, L. Muskerry, and Mr. Boyle,

T O M E
II.

1665. killd with one shott just by
the Duke.

they stood by the Duke on the Quarter-deck. The first of them was Captain of his Guards, a very generous, bold man, and a good horse Officer, who had Serv'd the Duke from the time he first came into France to that moment, and had been with him in all his Campagnes, both in France and in Flanders, and was much esteem'd and intirely trusted, not only by his R. H, but by the King, having never made a false step to either of them, but allways minded nothing but their Service; and so litle his own interest, that when he was kill'd he had nothing to leave to his Wife and Daughter, So that if the King and the Duke had not provided for them, they must haue starv'd: Such an Example is hardly to be found amongst those who enjoy their Princes favour.

The Lord Muskerry was Gentleman of the Bed-chamber to the Duke, a very brave man and a good foot Officer. M^r Boyle was a younger Son of the Earle of Burlington, who came a Volunteer to attend his R. H, and never had been in service before.

The Engagement still continued very warm on both sides, till about two in the afternoon, when the fire of the Dutch began to diminish; which encourag'd our men (if possible) to increase theirs. Nor did Opdam himself now ply the Duke so smartly as hitherto with whole broad Sides, but with two or three guns only at a time, which made his R. H. conclude that severall of them were dismounted, and many of his men lost. This gave the Duke time to order his own Ship to forbear firing, till, being some what clear'd from the great smoak, he might see wherabouts he was, and in what posture both Fleets then stood: By which he discover'd, that the ROYALL OAK, the MARY, and the PLIMOUTH, with some other disabled Ships, were refitted and come on head of him, and the ROYALL CATHERIN and SWIFTSURE on stern of him; which Seasonable Rejoyning added such terrour to the Enemy, that those on the

The PLIMOUTH and some other English Ships, that had ly on a side to refitt, rejoin
the Duke again.

Stern of Opdam began to give way, thō Opdam himself and those on head of him (most of them Zelanders) still Venture to keep their Luff.

The Duke therfore finding himself now much more at ease, and but within muskett shott of Opdam, order'd his Master-gunner to give him a salute in the usuall forme, Gun after Gun, and to lay all the Guns himself, but to begin with those of the lower Tire: The Gunner so well executed his office, that at the third shott (which was plainly seen to take place as well as the two former) Opdam and his Ship blew up. At which terrible sight, the Enemy's Fleet all gave way, and ran for it putting right before the wind, except the ORANGE, a stout Ship of eighty four guns, which to the surprise of all kept still her Luff; by which and by her working, it was plain that the Captain, who stood on the poap brandishing a two handed brod-sword, intended desperatly to run her on bord the Duke; and so boldly did the Ship advance all alone, that some about his R. H. who were no great Seamen, cryd, She was a fire Ship; but the Duke knowing her to be what she was, told them, They would quickly find their mistake, by the brodeside she was preparing to give them, which they had been sure of, had not Sir Jeremy Smith in the MARY (one of the Duke's Seconds, and just on head of him) happily interpos'd, and made up so close to the ORANGE, that both their Yard-Armes touch'd, and so gave her his own brode-side and received hers, which kill'd and wounded no less then Sixty of his men. Presently after this, another brode-side bein powred into the ORANGE by the ROYALL CATHERIN, she found it high time to strike. The men being taken out, according to the fighting Orders, she was fir'd, and the Captain of her, call'd Sebastien Seaton, of Scots parents a lusty proper man, did not stick to own, That he had resolved to signalize himself by endeavouring to borde the Duke, or to have the honour of being taken by him: But he had no long time to please himself with that ambition, for in two or

TOME
II.

1665.

Opdam blown up by a shot from the Duke's Ship, which his R.H. order'd to be level'd at him,

All the Dutch Fleet run, except the ORANGE commanded by one Sebastien Seaton a Scotsman.

The bravery of this Captain of y^e ORANGE.

He attempts to bord the Duke, but is hinder'd by Sr Jer: Smith.

T O M E three days after, he dyd of the bruises and hurts he received in II. his rash attempt.

1665.
 Four Dutch men of war burnt by one fireship, which
 the Duke order'd to be clap'd upon them.

It was now about half an hour after two, when the Duke, being in pursuit of the Enemy, saw four of their men of war (wherof one a Vice Admiral) fall foul of one another just on head of him : his R. H. finding them thus embarass'd, made a signal to one of the two fire ships that attended him, to clap them on bord, which was perform'd so successfully that they were in a moment all in a flame ; Nor could there be a more lamentable spectacle, then to see the Sea about them cover'd with their men, who had no other refuge but to throw themselves into that Element to avoid the rage of the other. The generous temper of the English Seamen, which appear'd on this occasion, deserves to be taken notice of : for having by their valour reduced their Enemy to this Extremity, they did by their charity redeem most of them again, and with the hazard of Sinking themselves by picking them up, and overloading their shaloupes with too great a number of them.

Soon after this, whilst the Body of the English Fleet follow'd their advantages, there appear'd a fresh Squadron of the Dutch to windward of them ; which obliged the Duke to ly by a litle, and order a few Ships under the command of Sir William Berkley to bring up the Rere, and secure as well his own maim'd Ships, as those which were then taken from the Enemy.

His R. H. soon after made such way by the admirable Sailing of his Ship, that he quickly got 'on head of his Fleet again ; which he had no sooner done, but he saw three more of the Enemy fall foul one of another, of which the MARSEMAN of eighty four brass Guns, Jacob Rouse Commander, was presently boarded, and after she had struck was fir'd by one of our fire ships, without order and against the custome of war ; wherby the other two also suffer'd the same fate, and all so suddenly, that not one of the MARSEMAN's men could be Sav'd, and very few of the other two.

TheMarseman a ship of 84 Guns, and two other Dutch Ships, burnt without order after they had struck.

The next day the Duke order'd the Captain of the fire ship to be confin'd, in order to be tryd by a Court Martiall for what he had done without order and against the Rules of War; but before he could be further proceeded against, he dyd, and so prevented the punishment he had deserved.

It was now about six in the evening, when the English were still pursuing their chase, which they continued as long as the day held, wherby severall more of the Dutch Ships fell into their hands; and thō John Evertson, who was on the head of Opdam when he blew up, got clear, and stood away for the Meuse with twelve of the Zealand Squadron, yet few of those which stood for the Texel, which were the main Body of the Fleet, could in appearance have escap'd next day, had it not been for an accident that happen'd that night.

For the Duke, when it began to grow dark, had order'd Captain Wetwang, in the NORWICH, to carry out lights, and to keep just on head of him all night, and close up to the Dutch; that in case they should alter their course, he should fire guns and make false fires, put up more lights, and steer the same course with them; that so, as soon as it should be light, they might again be sett upon.

His R. H. after having given these plain and positive commands, remain'd still upon the Deck till it was quite dark, then he went down into his Cabin to take a litle rest; but before he layd himself down, he could not be satisfied without coming up once more to the Quarter Deck, to see how affaires went, and to reinforce his orders: Then he return'd back to his Cabin, it being eleven at night, when he layd him down upon a quilt in his clothes, so to be ready upon any occasion that should happen. But no sooner was he fallen a sleep, when M^r. Brunkerd, (Brounker) a Groom of his Bed-chamber who was in waiting, slipt up from him and applyd himself to Captain Cox, who was Master of the ship, endeavouring to perswade him to shorten sails; that he might not expose the Duke by 1665.

T O M E
II.

The Duke orders the Captain of the fire Ship to be tryd.

The English continue in pursuit of the Dutch as long as the day held.

The Duke orders to keep close up with the Dutch all night, in order to set upon them again next morning.

Brunkerd's arguments to Cox and Harman, to perswade them to shorten Sail rejected.

T O M E

II.

1665.

running in amongst the Enemy in the night, the Ship being so good a Saylor, whereby he might be clapt on board by some fire ship, or find himself at break of day in the middle of the Enemies Fleet, expos'd to all their fire ; That he ought in these circumstances, to have a more particular care of the aparent Heir of the Crown, and the King's only Brother. To which, and many other arguments, Captain Cox very honestly answer'd, That he was but Master of the Ship ; that the Duke had order'd him to make all the Sail he could, and that without a Countermmand from his Highness, or at least from some Superior Officer, he neither could nor would shorten Sail. Brunkerd, finding he could not prevail upon him, address'd himself next to Captain Harman, the first * Lieutenant, with the like arguments ; But he, being an old experienced Officer, would not suffer himself to be so easily imposed upon, So that Brunkerd finding his Rhethrick could not prevail, went cunningly down between decks and after some litle stay came up again to Harman, pretending to be just come from the Duke (thō he had not been so much as in his Cabin) and told him with the greatest confidence imaginable, That he brought immediat commands from his Highnesses own mouth, that he should forthwith shorten Sail. Captain Harman thinking it impossible for a Gentleman in his post to come with a Ly in his mouth of so dangerous a consequence, could not doubt the truth of the pretended Orders, and therefore did not only shorten Sail, but for some time brought to ; till, at last, fearing it might cause some considerable disorder in the Fleet, as indeed it began to do, he put before the wind again, and settled his top Sails a litle, and just as the day began to

Harman at last shortens Sail, being impos'd upon by Brunkerd's false message from the Duke.

* The Duke had two CAPTAINS on board, Sir W. Penn, who had the rank of a Vice Admiral, and Captain Harman, who is here consider'd in the capacity of first Lieutenant to H. R. H.

break, hoisted them a trip as they were when the Duke left them, and this was done but just a moment before his R. H. came up again upon the Quarter-deck; So that all things appearing to him as he left them, he knew nothing of what had thus pass'd during his repose.

By this means the Dutch were got a good deal on head of the English, and the Duke when it grew light, found himself about half a league a stern of the Body of the Dutch, and as far on head of that of his own Fleet, having only the CENTURION, a forth Rate, and two of his Yachts near him. This posture of the Fleets contributed to keep his Highness in ignorance of his own Ship having shorten'd Sail; for knowing her to be a very good Sayler, he thought that was the reason of his being so far on head of his own Fleet; and that the Dutch had outsail'd him by reason of our going right before the wind, and their drawing less water then we.

When it was broad day, the Duke found himself faire in with the Coast of Holland, which he saw very plain. The Earle of Sandwich was then about half a league still on stern with the body of the Fleet, and Prince Rupert at some distance in the offing. The Enemy, in the mean while, lost no time in pursuing their Course for the Texel, with all the sail they could make. However some of the English best sailing third and fourth Rates fetch'd up and snap'd severall of the Sternmost of them; all the rest were chaced to the very mouth of the Texel, where the tide not serving then to get in, they came a while to an anchor, but so near the Sands and in so shallow water, that the Duke found it dangerous to Ventur neer them with his great Ships, and they being above forty sail, were too strong and numerous for his smaller ones; and what added to their good fortune, was, that there were no fire Ships left to fasten upon them; So that they got at last into their harbour.

T O M E
II.

1665.

The Duke kept in ignorance of his Ship having shorten'd Sail.

The Dutch chased in the very mouth of the Texel.

TOME II.

1665.

They get at last into their harbour, the English having no fire ships left to fasten upon them : But 4 fire ships in all, in the English fleet, wth an account how they were imployd.

The Dutch being got into harbour, the Duke stands out to Sea again, and so ended this great Engagement.

A short account of this great Victory, and of the number of the Ships lost by the Dutch, and of the kill'd and wounded on both sides.

We had in all but four fire Ships belonging to the Fleet ; Of the two first we have already given an account ; The third was commanded by one Captain Balle, a small one made out of a sixth Rate, which being a good Sayler gave chace to the Helverson, a Ship of sixty six guns, and at last ran up along her Brod-side, notwithstanding all the shott made at her by the Dutchman, and so clap'd him on bord, and fir'd his Ship, which oblig'd the Helverson to bring to, so to clear himself of her ; which he did, she being but a very small vessel : But by that means he fell in amongst some of our headmost Fregats, and was taken ; and the fourth of those fire Ships was disabled.

Thus at last the Dutch being got into their harbour, the Duke thought fitt to stand out to Sea, to get a fair offing from the shore, that he might not expose his Fleet in case it should blow. And so ended this Engagement, the greatest and most considerable that had till then been seen : For the Enemy lost that day twenty men of War, the least of which was of forty guns ; Eight of the number were burnt and the rest brought away, together with four thousand prisonners. They had four of their Admiralls kill'd, Opdam who commanded in cheif, Courtenaer, Stillingwart, and Scram. It was reckon'd they lost in all ten thousand men, either slain, drown'd, burnt or taken prisonners.

Our Loss, as to common men, was inconsiderable for so great a Victory, The number of them not exceeding eight hundred Slain and wounded besides what were taken in the CHARITY, which was the only Ship we lost. Of Flag Officers we lost Sir John Lawson Vice-Admiral of the Red, who dyd some days after the Fight of a wound he had in the knee ; and Captain Sanson Rere Admiral of the White. Of persons of quality were slain the Earle of Marleborow, Captain of the OLD JAMES, and on board of him, his Nephew the Earle of Portland, The Earle of Falmouth, The Lord Muskerry, and M^r. Boyle, son to the Earle of Burlington; besides Sevarall other Volonteers of less quality, and some of the Duke's under Servants.

TOME

II.

1665.

The Duke having taken an account of the condition of his own Fleet, and of what he had taken and destroyd of the Enemys, whose Fleet was got now safe into the Maze, the Texel, and the Fly, he made the best of his way to the Buoy of the Nore, in order to refitt and go out again as soon as possible.

The Duke returns with the Fleet to the Buoy of the Nore.

During his stay there, he took care to have his Scouts a broad, which being usually of the best fourth Rates, went two and two together towards the Texel, and other parts, so as to give notice of the Enemies motions. But after he had been thus Sevarall days putting things in order with all expedition and success, the King about the latter end of June thought fitt to send for him and Prince Rupert up to London, to give a more particular Relation of what had pass'd, as well as an account of the present condition of the Fleet, and what measures were best to be taken for the rest of the Campagne; and in the mean time order'd, that the Earle of Sandwich should be left in chief.

He sends Scouts abroad to watch the motions of the Dutch.

We must not ommit before we proceed any further, to give an account of what was perform'd by two of those Scouts, the DIAMOND command'd by Captain Golding, and the YARMOUTH by Captain Ayliff, sent out by the Duke to observe the motions of the Dutch. They happen'd to meet with two Direction Ships (as the Dutch call them) belonging to Zealand, of forty od guns each, The biggest Commanded by one Masters, the other by youn Cornelius Evertson, who, thō ours were somewhat better force, did not avoid engaging; at the very first brod-side Golding was slain, but his Lieutenant

Two English Scouts attack two Dutchmen of 40 Guns and take them.

TOME

II.

1665.

Everstson, and Masters, the two Dutch Cap^{ns}. set at liberty by y^e Duke, because of their bravery.

The Duke, at the King's Commands, leaves the Fleet under Earle Sandwich, and go's wth Rupert to Court.

Resolv'd by the King, that the Duke, nor the P^{ce} Rupert, should go no more to Sea that year.

The Duke's arguments to the King to let him go to Sea again. But can not prevail.

Davis managed the Fight so well, as also did the Captain of the YARMOUTH, that after some hours dispute both the Dutch Ships were taken, thō bravely defended; for they lost many of their men, and were very much disabled before they Struck. The Duke gave Evertson his liberty in consideration of his Father Cornelius, who had perform'd severall Services for the King before his Restoration; and his R. H. freed also the other Captain for having defended himself so well, and made Lieutenant Davis Captain of one of those Prizes.

In obedience to the King's Commands, the Duke left the Fleet under the Command of the Earle of Sandwich, and taking Prince Rupert along with him, went to attend his Majesty at London; By whom it was resolv'd, that neither the Duke nor Prince Rupert should go any more to Sea that year; but that the Earle of Sandwich should command the Fleet, since the busines to be done for the remaining part of the year would not be so much for seeking another battel, as endeavouring to intercept De Ruiter's Ships from Guinea, and other rich ones from the Straights and the East and West Indies, all which were expected to come homewards by the back of Ireland and Scotland: But those Ships by good fortune for them, got safe into Bergen in Norway.

The Duke did what he could to perswade his Majesty to let him go out again with the Fleet by many weighty arguments, to which the King return'd no other answer, but that he was resolved not to hazard his person again that year; thō the Duke made it appear, the danger would be very small, since the Dutch could not be Strong enough to give another battel; adding, That since he had begun that Campagne So Successfully, he desir'd to end it, and had vanity enough to beleeve, he could end it better then any body els, and that the care his Ma^{ty} now had of his person might possibly oblige him to send him out some other time at the head of the Fleet, when he should be more expos'd then he had yet been, for want of a vigorous prosecution of the advantages already gotten, which might oblige the Dutch to make such a peace as would be for the honour and advantage of England.

T O M E
II.

1665.

But the King remain'd fix'd to his first Resolution ; and when the Fleet was ready to put out again to Sea, he went himself with the Duke, to the Buoy of Nore, to take a Review of the Fleet that was now left to the conduct of the Earle of Sandwich.

All this while the Duke had not heard one word of his Ship having shorten'd Sail, no body having given him the least notice of it ; which happen'd well for Brunker, who had certainly suffer as he deserv'd, had the Duke been at that time inform'd of his misdemeanor ; and it was by strange concurrence of accidents, that his R. H. was kept so long in ignorance of that which was so generally known and talk'd of: When the King and the Duke were coming back from the Buoy of the Nore, Captain Cox took an occasion of addressing himself to his R.H. with intention to purge himself in that matter, Saying to the Duke, That he believ'd some thing might have been reported to his prejudice, but that he could very well clear himself when he should be examin'd, having done nothing but by order. The Duke not imagining what he meant, bad him explain himself, for no body had told him any thing to his prejudice: But just as Cox was going to begin his history, his R. H. was call'd away in all hast to the King, who was then staying for him in the boat just ready to go off. And the Captain being to go to Sea with the Earle of Sandwich, had no further opportunity of explaining himself.

A strange concurrence of accidents keep the Duke still in ignorance of Brunker's busines.

After this, the great Plague increasing at London, the King and the Duke removed from thence, first to Hampton Court and in few days after to Salisbury ; From whence the King thought fit to send his R. H. to York, that he might have an eye upon The Plague in London, the King and the Duke remove to Hampton Court.

The Duke is sent to York.

T O M E

II.

1665.

the Northern parts, there being at that time some apprehensions of a Rising design'd by the Phanaticks and others of the old Cromwelian and Republican Party, many of which hold correspondence with the Dutch, by whom they were encouraged, as his Ma^{ty} was inform'd by some of his Spys amongst them; and to keep all things quiet in London, he left there the Duke of Albemarle and the Earle of Craven with one half of the Foot guards, and a Troop of the horse guards.

The Parliament meets at Oxford.

A Present of 120000^l propos'd by the Paliam^t for the Duke, in consideration of his bravery and conduct in the late Engagement.

The Duke at last made acquainted with Brunker's affaire, his resentments therupon.

The Parliament meeting at Oxford the Autumne following, obliged the Duke to return thither to the King. At this Session they gave a supply to his Majesty of 1256347^l to carry on the war, and at the same time beg'd leave to make a present of about Six score thousand pounds to his R. H. in token of the great sense they had of his conduct and bravery in the late Engagement; and they also gave the King particular thanks, for his care in preventing his Royal Brother from exposing himself to any further danger at Sea.

It was about this time, that the Duke first heard what Brunker had done in counterfitting his Orders at Sea, which rais'd in him no small indignation against the person so offending, not without his displeasure against those who so long had concealed it from him. Prince Rupert and the Earle of Sandwich excus'd themselves to the Duke, by Saying, They really beleev'd he had known it, but was unwilling to take publick notice of it, least he should have been obliged to punish Brunker as he deserv'd. Those of his R. H. own family, who were freinds to the person offending, beg'd pardon for their silence, alledging that it was not their part to inform against a freind and a fellow Servant; And they who were reckon'd his Enemies, pretended it would have been look'd upon as malice in them, to accuse him, since it might have cost him his life, or at least might have ruin'd him for ever in all other respects. Thus upon one pretence or other, all were faulty to the Duke, in not advertising him in due time of what was of such importance for him to know ; And when he came to the knowledge of it, the house of Commons, of which Brunkerd himself was a Member, took also cognisance of it, which hinder'd the Duke from having him tryd by a Court Martial : By which means he at last avoided the punishment he deserv'd ; for thō his fellow Members seem'd at first violent enough against him, he wisely, whilst the heat lasted, withdrew into France, and during his absence some of his freinds prevail'd So far, as to get the prosecution of him to be deferr'd till Sir John Harman, the principall witnes against him, was return'd from his voyage of the West Indies ; So that by length of time the prosecution could so, that Brunkerd was only turn'd out of the House, nor could the Duke do any thing more at that time, then to turn him out of his Service.

The various successes at Sea in that year, 1666, we shall not much enter into, since his R. H. was permitted to have no further share in them, but only to take a view of the Fleet before its going to Sea. However to make things hang together in order of time, It must be mention'd that the French King, having endeavour'd by his mediation to procure a peace in favour of the Dutch, without obtaining it, thought himself obliged by vertue of an Alliance lately made with them, to joyn his forces with them against Us ; and that when our Fleet was at Sea under the conduct of Prince Rupert and the Duke of Albemarle, thō We in the first Engagemēt that summer (by reason of the Prince his being gone with his Squadron to seek out the French) had somewhat the worst, yet we continued fighting on under the Duke of Albemarle four days together, and for the first three against double our number ; But that on the fourth day 1666.

This year the French join in war with the Dutch against the English.

The English Fleet go's to sea under command of P^r Rupert and the Duke of Albemarle. In the first Engagemēt, which was on —, the English have the worst, yet

T O M E
II.

(our Fleet being then rejoin'd and we equal in number with them) the Dutch in four hours time gave way, and retir'd to their harbours.

1666.

continue to fight it out for 4 days together, and at last after Rupert's coming in, they oblige the Dutch to retire.

In the 2^d Engagement of this year, on the 25th July, the Victory is intirely on the English Side.

The Fire of London begun the 2^d Sep^r. and lasted 4 days.

The Duke expos'd to much toyle and danger to quench the Fire.

The Parliament meets, and being in an ill humour they fall upon the R: Catholicks, and endeavour to lay y^e Fire on them.

After our Fleet had refitted at the Buoy of the Nore (for the Duke of Albemarle's Squadron was much damnifyd in their Rigging) and after the Hollanders had repair'd their losses, both Fleets put out again to Sea, and came to a second Engagement on the 25th of July which was S^t JAMES's day, in which we gain'd the Victory and drove the Dutch into their harbours; wher upon happen'd the Enterprise upon Schelling by Sir Robert Holmes, and the destroying there a hundred and fifty lesser ships, that lay there at Anchor, with the two men of war that garded them.

But there remain'd yet a terrible accident to make this year remarkable, which was the Fire which happen in London, consuming in four days time above thirteen thousand houses, eighty nine Parish Churches, with many other publick and magnificent Structures; and this happen'd in a time of war against Holland and France, and after the desolation caus'd the year before by the Plague. The Duke had no litle share of toyle and danger in exposing himself day and night to stop the rage of the Fire, much increas'd by the Easterly winds which then blew, which at last was effected by blowing up houses, that so the flames might have no matter to feed on.

The Parliament met again quickly after this, and severall of the Members finding the Nation under a Triple Scourge of Plague, War and Fire, were in an angry humour, and to vent themselves, they took occasion to fall upon the Papists; and whereas the Plague was evidently from the hand of God, and they themselves had engaged the King in the war, they at least endeavour'd, with a little reason as Christianity to lay the Fire on the Roman-Catholicks, and appointed a Comittee on purpose to make out an accusation against them upon that head, thō at last they were forced with shame to give over the Enterprise. And being also weary of the war, which they at first so eagerly enter'd into, upon pretences of mismanagement, they refused to give the Supplys necessary to carry it on. So that the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer Southampton, the Duke of Albemarle, and the other Ministers, perswaded the King upon pretence of saving charges, to lay up the first and Second Rate of Ships, and to send out such only as were most proper to interrupt the Enemy's Trade, and only to make a defensive war.

The Duke oppos'd all he could the taking of these measures, urging, that our having no Fleet at Sea would raise again the spirits of our Enemies, which now were very low, and give them time as well as courage, to set out their Fleet again, having a prospect of litle or no resistance; That what might be sav'd by laying up our great Ships, according to the Counsell given, would be spent in maintaining the Militia and other necessary Land forces for the security of our Coasts and Ports; and that we should suffer, not only in our interest, but in our honour, by permitting the Dutch to ride masters of the Seas just under our noses: Wherfor his R. H. frankly declared his opinion, That the Expedient propos'd would prove but very ill husbandry and be soon repented of. What follow'd, did but too much confirm the reasons of his R. H. thō at that time they did not prevaile.

For so it happen'd, that the Dutch came out with their Fleet the Summer following, and were So far masters of the Sea, that they came to the Buoy of the Nore, and so up the River of Medway; where they burnt and destroyd several Ships, and carryd away the CHARLES a first Rate, and had they push'd vigorously they might have done much more mischief. This was the last action of this war which gave the Dutch an

TOME II.

1666.

The Parliament weary of the war, give but weak Supplys for carrying it on.

The King to Save charges, is perswaded by the Chancellor and others, to lay up the 1st and 2^d Rate Ships, and make only a defensive war next Campagne.

The Duke opposes these measures, and gives his reasons, but is overruled.

1667.

The busines of Chatham, June 1667, which had not happen'd if y^e Duke's advice had been follow'd.

T O M E

IL

1667.

opportunity of ending the war with too much reputation, throu' our own neglect; for at this very time there was a Treaty of Peace on foot at Breda, which was there concluded the 9th of July, and solemnly proclaim'd at London the 24th of August following.

The dissafected Party encouraged by the ill Success at Sea, grow turbulent.

And now the time drew near of the Parliament's next sitting, which was to be on the 10th of October; and the disaffected Party was so encourager by the ill Success at Sea of that Summer, that they began to be very turbulent and bold: In so much that Severall of the great ones amongst them had privat meetings and Cabals, especially those of the Presbyterian and Commonwealth gang, who never neglected any opportunity of being troublesom to the Monarchy. To this purpose the Earle of Northumberland, the Earle of Lester, the Lord Hollis and others, who were for the Isle of Wight conditions, met in consultation at Gilford, and what measures they there took may appear by the discourse, which the Earle of Northumberland soon after held with the Duke before the Sitting of the Parliament: for he coming to St James's a day or two after his arrivall in London, to wait upon his R. H. which was his custom to do; upon the Duke talking freely with him of all things, and amongst the rest concerning the Lord Chancellor, and the apprehension he had that his enemies at Court would impeach him (for he took the Earle to be the Chancellor's freind) contrary to his expectation, the Earle answer'd with a grave face, That the laying aside of the Chancellor, who was very much hated, was not sufficient to Satisfy the Nation, for they also expected the disbanding of the Guards, and the redress of severall other Grivences. At which the Duke interrupted him, desiring him to have care of talking at such a rate, for he should be obliged to inform his Majesty of it; To which the Earle answer'd, That he had said nothing to him, but what he design'd to repeat to the King next day; wherin he was as good as his word, he and his party being imbolden'd by the resolutions taken at Court by the Chancellor's Enemies to impeach him, thinking the doing it might make some breach between the King and his Brother: However the Duke at that time calmly reason'd the matter with him, by letting him see the necessity of having Guards, for the safety of the King's person and quiet of the Nation, the want of which had prov'd so fatal to the late King and the whole government; But the Earle was of too inflexible a temper to be wrought upon by the Duke's reasons.

E. Northumberland's factious discourse to the Duke, concerning laying aside the Chancellor, and disbanding the Troops.

At this time it was that the King's consent was gain'd for the removall of the Chancellor, which for severall years before had been attempted by severall of his Enemies. The first that attack'd him was the Earle of Bristol, who impeach'd him in Parliament in the year 1664: But the King then Supporting the Chancellor, the Earle miscarried in his design, which incensed him so, as to make him break all measures of duty and respect to the King, and without leave obtain'd from the House of Lords, to apply himself to the house of Commons in a studyd speech full of Seditious reflexions upon his Majesty's proceedings. He had also at the same time the confidence to desire an audience from the King, and that My Lord Aubigny might be present at it; in which he express'd himself with So much insolence and extravagance, that had not the King more compassion of his folly, then consideration of his own dignity, the Tower, and some thing worse, would have been his just reward: For he had the boldness to tell the King (as the Duke was afterwards inform'd by the Lord Aubigny) that since he saw his Enemies had deprived him of his Majesty's favour, he would raise such a storm against them, that even his Majesty himself should feel the effects of it.

The King consents at last to the removall of the Chancellor, w^{ch} had been long before endeavour'd by his Enemies. The E: of Bristol was the first who had attack'd the Chancellor.

The E. of Bristol's insolent discourse to the King, after having miscarried in his Impeachment of the Chancellor in Parliament, in —64.

The rest of the Chancellor's Enemies went more temperatly and securely to work, by watching their opportunitys and

T O M E
II.

1667.
The Chancellor inexcusable in his misbehaviour to y^e King, in opposing a Declaration of Liberty of Conscience, which had been before agreed upon in a Councill held by y^e King, in the Chancellor's own lodgings.

insinuating by degrees a disgust in the King towards him. Nor can I excuse the Chancellor of having given occasion by his own misbehaviour towards the King, to make his down fall more easily consented to by his Majesty. To ommit other instances of his refractorines to the King's will, That of his opposing the Resolutions taken by his Majesty, for an Indulgence to Dissenters in Religion about the year 1664, is too memorable to be pass'd over ; For it having been propos'd and solicited by the Lord Roberts, Lord Ashly Cooper, and others, that by the King's Declaration a Tolleration should be granted to tender consciences, in pursuance of, and grounded on the Declaration at Breda, it was resolved by his Majesty in a privat Councill held by him in the Chancellor's lodgings at Worcester house, that a Declaration to that purpose should be brought into the House of Lords, the Duke being also very much for it : But when that busines afterwards came to be debated by the Lords, the Chancellor speake violently against it, and being seconded by the Bishops and others of the zealous Church of England men, it was layd aside, which did not a litle cool the King's warm heart towards the Chancellor.

The D^{ch} of Cleveland joins with the Party against the Chancellor.

His Enemies were not wanting at proper times to revive the memory of all his failings ; and the more to Strengthen their Party, they gain'd the Dutchess of Cleveland to be on their side, which they easily compass'd in regard of a former pique she had against him, for having forbid his Wife to visit her by reason of her scandalous life, thō formerly he had been a great freind to her Father.

The Canary Company broke, meerly out of Spite to the Chancellor.

The first publick attempt this Party made against him, was their perswading his Majesty and instigating the House of Commons, to break the Canary Company, for which he had obtain'd a new Charter from his Majesty, which was done merely out of Spite and to lessen his credit, to the great prejudice of Trade: For wheras that Company did and could oblige the Canareans to take great Store of the manufactures of this Kingdom, in part of payment for their wines, and also to sell their wines at reasonable rates; so soon as the Company was broken, the Canareans would take nothing but ready mony, and at the same time rais'd the prices of their wines, which prov'd a double loss to the Nation.

The Chancellor's Enemys having now prevail'd with the King, to lay him aside before the Sitting of the Parliament, which was to be on the 10th of October 1667 (as has been already said) His Majesty acquainted the Duke with it, and order'd him to let the Chancellor know it, telling him at the same time, That it was not out of any dissatisfaction he had against him, but that the necessity of his affaires requir'd it, it being more for the dignity of the Crown for him to do it of himself, then to suffer him to be torn from him by the Parliament: And therefore he order'd the Duke to tell him, he must send the great Seal to him; and that, to shew he had still a consideration for him, he would continue to him the privat pension he formerly received.

The Chancellor receiv'd the Message as became a good Subject, and without delay sent the Seal to his Majesty; and then told the Duke, That since his Enemies had prevail'd so much, they would not stop there, but would prosecute him to the last degree, and not mind the interest of the King and the Crown, so they might ruin him. The Seal was given to Sir Orlando Bridgeman as Lord Keeper, who was, till some time after he had it, look'd upon as a very honest and able Lawyer, but upon tryall prov'd to be too weak for so weighty an Imployment.

When the Parliament met, the House of Commons were much out of humour by reason of our Losses at Sea, and the expence of the war; and according to their usuall custom, in

T O M E
II.

1667.

The King orders the Duke, to acquaint the Chancellor, of his being oblig'd for y^e good of his affaires to lay him aside.

The Chancellor, in obedience to the King's command, Sends the Seals to his Ma^{ty}, who gave them to S^r Orlando Bridgeman, in quality of L^d Keeper.

The Parliament vote an address to the King, for turning out all Catholicks out of his Service.

T O M E the first place they vented their Spleen against the Papists, by II. voting an address to the King, that all such of them as were 1667. in his Troops, or in service at Sea, might be turn'd out ; and that for their better discovery, the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy should be tender'd indifferently to all persons so imployd, and they should all by such a day take the Sacrament in the usuall forme of the Church of England.

They Vote an address of Thanks to the King, for having taken the great Seal from Lord Clarendon.

This was done after they had voted the Thankes of the House to his Majesty for his gracious Speech at the opening of the Session, and they likewise order'd (the motion being made by Sir Thomas Littleton) that particular Thanks should be given for having taken the Seal from the Earle of Clarendon, and remov'd him from the exercise of publick trust and imployment in affaires of State. It is to be observed, that this clause of Thankes concerning the Earle of Clarendon had hardly past, if his Majesty had not order'd his Servants in a privat manner to let it be known, that he desir'd it should be so ; and had not the Earle charg'd his freinds in both the Houses, not to oppose it ; as being resolved never to let any of his privat concerns obstruct the King's affaires : For if the Duke, with the Bishops, and other freinds of that Earle, had opposed it in the House of Lords, in all likelihood it would not have been agreed to ; and when it was put to the vote, the Duke and Severall of that Earle's freinds withdrew ; for thō their obedience to the King would not permitt them to oppose it, they could not contrary to their judgment vote for it, not only in regard of their relation and freindship to the Lord Clarendon, but as thinking it an ill precedent for the Crown. His Majesty in answer to this Address, assured the two Houses, that he would never more give any Imployment of trust to the Earle of Clarendon.

L^d Clarendon impeach'd in Parliament,

That Earle's Enemies being thus encouraged, thought it not fitt to stop here, but, to make all sure, resolved to impeach him :

The cheif Actor in this affaire was Sir William Coventry, who gave up his place of Secretary to the Duke, that he might be the more free to prosecute the Earle of Clarendon; Of all that Lord's Enemies he was the most dangerous, as having the best parts; Nor could the Faction perhaps have prevail'd, had not he been at the head of it. The House of Commons lost no time in preparing their Articles of Impeachment, to be prefer'd to the House of Lords; during which violent proceedings, the Duke had been very much put to it how to behave himself in that whole affaire, between his duty to the King, and what he ow'd in justice and freindship to the Earle, and to his own honour, had it not pleas'd God in the heat of this prosecution to visit him with the Small pox; so that before he was able to come abroad, this great busines was over, the Earle having by privat intimation from the King, to avoid a further storm, withdrawn himself out of England; wherupon there insued an Act of Parliament to banish him out of England during his life.

In both Houses of Parliament there was at that time a Presbyterian Party, not very considerable for their number but for their great industry in watching all opportunities, if not quite to destroy, at least to bring low the Regall Authority. Some of the Cheif of them, thinking this a proper occasion for their purpose, and that nothing would more contribute therunto then a division in the Royall Family between the King and the Duke, applyd themselves privatly to the Earle of Clarendon, and sent him word, That they would all Stand by him, if he would stand by himself and join with the Duke to oppose the Violent and undue proceedings against him: Where it is to observ'd, that they made use of the Duke's name without the Duke's knowledge, who was all that time lay'd up with the Small pox. But the Earle was too honest and too wise to be caught in their snare, and they went off disapointed,

T O M E
II.

1667.
Sir William Coventry a Cheif Actor in this affaire.

LdClarendon's prudence and honesty in rejecting a pro-posall, made to him by a Presbyterian Party, who design'd thereby a division between the King and the Duke.

T O M E

II.

1667.
E. Clarendon retires into France.

whilst the Earle, in conformity to his Ma^{ties} will and pleasure, yeelded to the stream which ran so violently against him, and went over privatly to France, where he died in the year 1674, after seven years banishment.

His Education and Character.

He was born a privat gentleman of a good family, bred up to the Law, of good sense, and naturally eloquent, all which brought him into credit ; so that he was chosen a member of the House of Commons in that fatall Parliament of 1640, in which by his good parts he Soon brought himself into esteem, in so much that the King chose him to be a privat manager for him ; and therin he behav'd himself with so much dexterity and fidelity, that at the beginning of the Rebellion he was brought in to Court, and intrusted in the most Secret affaires, and for a reward of his good Service was made Chancellor of the Exchequer. When the Prince of Wales was sent down from Oxford into the West, he was one of his R. H. Councill appointed by the King to attend him, and was most relyd upon. When afterwards the King's affaires grew so desperat, that the Prince, for his safety, removed first to the Isle of Scilly, and thence to Jersey, and at last into France, Sir Edoward Hide always attended him. The murther of King Charles the first following soon after, the then present King sent him, together with the Lord Cottington, Ambassador into Spain, whence he return'd, and joynd the King at Paris soon after his Majesties escape from the battel of Worcester : From that time he had the entire confidence of the King, and began to act as a first Minister. He had the Sole management of the affaire of the Restoration with Generall Monk, and Admirall Montague, having been made Lord Chancellor some time before ; And when the King came into England, he was in such favour, that he carried all things before him, and none dared to oppose him. He got his grat freind the Earle of Southampton made Lord Treasurer, with whom, together with the Duke of Ormonde and the Bishops (he being himself a very zealous Protestant) being joyn'd in a strict league, he was feared and courted by the whole Nation. To this was added, his having his Daughter married to the Duke of York, which for the present was no small Support to him, thō at last it probably rais'd So much envie against him, as to be the cause of his ruine.

TOME
II.

1667.

No Sooner was the Chancellor removed, when those who had chiefly driven it on, began to disagree amongst themselves, each of them pretending to succeed in the Ministry. Sir William Coventry, without whose help Buckingham and Arlington could never have brought it about, had most reason to expect the place, as having most capacity and parts for it; But the other two, thō much inferiour to him in qualification, were better Courtiers then he, and joyning together, they prevailed to get him out of all his Employments; which having done, they strove each against the other, who should have most power and credit with the King, whose affaires by their disagreement and insufficiency suffer'd very much.

1668.
After the Chancellor's removal, the Ministers disagree amongst themselves.

Sir Wil:
Coventry, tho of more capacity, is outed of all his Employments by Buckingham, and Arlington, whowere better Courtiers then he.

One thing there was, in which they, and all the Stickers for the removall of the Lord Chancellor, agreed in; which was, To lessen as much as they could the Duke's interest with the King, without which their guilty consciences made them apprehend they should be sooner or later exposed to the resentments of his R. H, for their behaviour in Lord Clarendon's busines, and that he might prevaile hereafter with the King to bring him back; Which to prevent, they obtain'd his Ma^{ties} leave to bring a Bill into the House of Lords (as has been said) to banish him. The Duke at that time was recovered of the Small pox, and gave his reasons in the House for his voting against the

The Ministers do all join in endeavouring to lessen the Duke's interest with y^e King, for fear he should get E. Clarendon recall'd.

The Duke, recover'd of the Small pox, gives his reasons in Parl^t. for voting against E. Clarendon's banishment.

T O M E

II.

1668.

The King is colder to the Duke then ordinary, upon this account.

Malitious insinuations of the Duke's Enemies.

Banishment, as a thing unprecedented, there being no proof made of any of those Crimes layd to his charge.

This made the King colder then usually to his R. H. which imbolden'd the Faction to venture one step farther; and under pretence of Duty and Zeal, to represent to the King, That the great power and credit of the Duke in the Nation was look'd upon as a lessening to his Majesty, and that in the present circumstance of affaires, it might be unsafe to have the entire command of the Sea, with a great part of the Land-forces, wholly at the Duke's disposall; considering the disgust he may probably have taken at the late Chancellor's disgrace, and the influence which his Party, and especially the Dutchess his Daughter, may have upon his R. H. to excite his resentment.

The King can not be mov'd by any of those Sugestions ever to doubt of his Brother's fidelity.

These Suggestions, tho' they deserved severe punishment, yet were taken by the King only as an overabundant Zeal in them, nor did they make any impression upon him, to the prejudice of the Duke; for his Majesties opinion of his Brother's fidelity was too firmly rooted in him to be shaken by any insinuations of that nature.

All the Chancellor's freinds remov'd, and the Creatures of Buckingham, and Arlington, preferr'd.

However, the now prevailing party would not be idle, but fell to work in removing all such as had been freinds to the late Chancellor, and putting in their room such as had been old Rebels, or notorious Opposers in the Parliament of the King's interest; Of the latter, were Sir Tho: Osburn, Sir Robert Howard, M^r Seymour, and Lord Vaughan, who were brought to Court and had good places given them by their Patron the Duke of Buckingham, as also Sir Tho. Littleton, Sir Rich: Temple, and Sir Robert Car, brought in by My Lord Arlington. Of the Republican and Cromwellian Stamp were Lord Roberts, Lord Orrery, Lord Anglesy, Secretary Trevor, and many others of the Same gang, who upon the defeat of the late Chancellor sooner or later came into Imployment.

They also, to gaine popularity to the hazard of the Crown, releas'd out of prison severall Republicans and old Officers of Cromwell's Army, such as the famous Major Wildman, Col: Salmond, Major Creed, Major Bremen, and others who were men of good Sense, very Stout, and had great credit with the disbanded Officers and Soldiers of that Rebelious Army, Of which very many had been in actuall possession of the Crown and Church Lands, at the time of the Restoration. These had been Secur'd by the advice of the Duke of Albemarle, as a thing which he knew to be absolutly necessary for the Safety of the Government, for the overthrow of which, that they might recover their unjustly acquir'd Estates, they had allways plots and contrivances on foot, which by the diligence of the old General were found out and disappointed.

1668.
Wildman, Creed, and others, Cromwellian Officers, releas'd out of Prison.

After this, they fell upon removing the Duke of Ormonde from his being Lieutenant of Ireland; which was cheifly managed by the Duke of Buckingham, at the instigation of the Earle of Orrery, a person famous for having changed partys So often, and for his Speech made to Cromwell to take upon him the Title of King of England. The Earle of Arlington at first scrupul'd to joyn with them in putting out his old freind the Duke of Ormonde, but at last they threaten'd him into it. Nor had that Duke any that took his part but his R. H; who thought it very scandalous that one who had allways been so loyall, should be prosecuted and run down by men who had been most of them downright Rebels, or litle better; meaning the Duke of Buckingham, who renounced the King his Master to gain the favour of Cromwell whose Daughter he would have married, But that Vsurper had at least so much of honour in him, as to say, He would never give his Daughter to one who could be so very ungratefull to his King: Having fail'd there, he (with) much ado and great Submission gott to marry the Lord Fairfaxe's Daughter, who had been General also of the

The Duke of Ormonde remov'd from the Lieuten-ancy of Ireland, and L^d Roberts put in his place.

T O M E

II.

1668.

S^r Tho:
Osburn, and S^r Tho: Littleton, made Treasurers of y^e Navy, without acquainting
the Duke.

Parliament Army, Yet notwithstanding the endeavours of his R. H. the Faction prevail'd to out the Duke of Ormonde, and to put Lord Roberts in his place.

They also prevail'd to put in Sir Thomas Osburn, and Sir Thomas Littleton, to be Treasurers of the Navy, without so much as speaking or making the least application to the Duke about it, thō Such places never use to be disposed of without the concurrence and approbation of the Lord Admiral; and thō the Duke represented to the King the hardship done him, yet his Majesty order'd him to sign the Warrant for their admission; which having done, he afterwards lived very well with those two gentlemen, they being men of parts and executing well their office. They likewise obstructed for some time Sir Jeremy Smith's being made a Commissioner of the Navy, thō recommended by the Duke, as being an old Sea Commander and the fittest man in England for that employment.

No disrespect of the Ministers hinders
the Duke to joyn with them for the King's Service.

Notwithstanding these disrespects and slights shewn by these new Ministers to the Duke, yet his R. H. never fail'd to join with them at the Cabinet Councill, or elsewhere, in any thing that concern'd his Ma^{ties} Service; for no usage could ever prevaile upon him to be in the least wanting to his duty, and therin to give good Example to the meanest Subject. This his Ma^{ty} was so sensible of, that all the Duke's Enemys from first to last could never lessen the confidence he had in his R. Brother.

Buckingham,
and Arlington, labour to supplant one another.

Thō these two Ministers, Buckingham and Arlington, agreed in mortifying the Duke, yet they were so far from being united in other matters, that they now labour'd to supplant and destroy each the other; In so much that the Duke of Buckingham sent a privat message to his R. H. by the Earle of Berkshire, one of his great confidants, to offer him his service, with great protestations of what he would do for him. To which his R. H. gave a plain answer, That he had formerly received such offers

D. Buckingam's message to the Duke, offering him his Service; to wh^{ch} the Duke answers

from that Duke without any performance, and therefore could not trust him; besides, that he look'd on it as below him, to enter into any of their Cabals, being resolv'd to Serve the King in his own way; And least any Story should be made of this hereafter, and the thing misrepresented, his R. H. immediately gave the King an account of what had past, without naming the person that brought the Message.

We must not omitt here an accidentall declaration, which the King made of his mind concerning his Brother in presence of three or four of his Bedchambermen; which happen'd upon old Sir William Armorer's bluntly telling him, There was strange news passing up and down in the Country, for it was said, that his Ma^{ty} intended to disband his Brother's Troop of Gards and Regiment of Foot, and the reason given for it was that his Ma^{ty} had so disobliged him, that it was not safe for him to let the Duke have such a body of men as they were under his command, and to leave it in his power to revenge himself: To which his Ma^{ty} answer, That it was the greatest Ly in the world, that it had never enter'd into his head, but that, on the contrary, he had all the kindness imaginable for his Brother, and were he master of more Kingdoms then those he had, he would trust them all in his hands; and the King also added, He had heard it reported, that he design'd to have the Duke of Monmouth declar'd legitimate, which was a thought never enter'd into his head, that he abhor'd it, and would endeavour to find out the authors of so vilanous a report, and have them Severly punish'd. Yet notwithstanding this so solemn a Declaration, the factious Party desisted not to insinuate such fancies into the Duke of Monmouth's head, who greedily swallowed the poison, as will hereafter appear.

Now when this turbulent Party that were Enemies to his R. H. found they could not prevail with his Ma^{ty} to entertain any jealous thoughts of his Brother, and therby to out him of

T O M E
II.

1668. plainly, That he could not trust him.

Some remarkable expressions of the King's kindness for, and confidence in the Duke.

The Duke's Enemies fall upon another expedient to ruin him, which

T O M E
II.

1668.

was, that the King should be divorced from the Queen.

D. Buckingham and E. of Bristol the chief promoters of this project of the Divorce.

The first hints thereof come from the old Republican party.

E. Bristol go's incognito to Parma, to find out a new wife for y^e King.

The Duke, advertis'd of these Practices, cautions the King against them.

his Employments, they betook themselves to another expedient, no less effectually for compassing their design, and more suitable (as they thought) to the genius and inclinations of the King; which was, that he should be divorced from the Queen (she not having had after so many years of marriage any children, nor being likely to have any) and be married again.

Two of the chief promoters of this, were the Duke of Buckingham and the Earle of Bristol, who very much pleas'd themselves with the invention and contrivance of it, and were heard to say, in discoursing about it, That if the Duke could be perswaded to consent to it, he would make himself be laugh'd at, and despis'd by all the world; and, if he oppos'd it, it would ruine him with the King. Many at Court enter'd into this Project, and there wanted not Lawyers and some Divines, that wroth papers to shew the lawfulness and reasonableness of it. There is reason to beleieve that the first hints therof came from some of the Old Republican Party, since nothing could be more for their turn, nor more likely to cause division in the Royall Family, and consequently the destruction of Monarchy.

Severall persons of different partys and professions, all joyn'd in this design, and none more active in it then the Earle of Bristol, who took upon him to find out a new wife fitt for his Majesty; and to that end he went privately into Italy, upon information, that at the Court of Parma there were Daughters of that Duke, amongst whom might be found a fitt match for the King.

His Royall Highness was by his freinds advertis'd of all these practices, and thō he did not openly complaine to the King of them, yet he occasionally by way of discourse represented to him, That the Common-wealth-party and the Enemies of the Royall Family were still at work, in hopes of setting up again their beloved Idole of a Common-wealth, and seeing they could not bring it about by open force, they attempted to do it by Sowing division in the Royall Family, which they hoped might break out into a Civil-war and which would make the English Nation cast them off both, and even Monarchy itself, as destructive to the peace and happines of the people of England. It is to be presum'd, that such discourses as these had a good effect with the King, for thō he did permitt severall about him to argue with him upon that Subiect, yet they could not prevail with him to come to a resolution to do any thing in it.

Now to reinforce the Project of the above contrived Divorce, there was brought into the House of Lords a Bill for dissolving the marriage of Lord Rosse, upon the account of Adultery, and giving him leave to marry again, which Bill at last, after great debates, pass'd by the plurality only of two Votes, and that by the great industry of that Lord's freinds, as well as the Duke's enemies, who carried it on cheifly in hopes it might be a Precedent, and Inducement for the King to enter the more easily into their late proposalls: Nor were they a litle encouraged therein, when they saw the King countenance and drive on the Bill in Lord Rosse's favour; But their hopes were again soon disappointed, for when his Majesty was inform'd of what was said, and what inference they made from his favouring Lord Rosse's Bill, he took an occasion to declare, That had he a conscience which would permitt him to be divorced, it would not Stick at taking a quicker and surer way (not unknown in history) of marrying again without giving the Parliament any trouble about it: And now that we are upon the point of Consciences, it is to be notted that when the Lord Rosse's pass'd the House, of eighteen Bishops that were there, only two * voted for the Bill, of which one doted throu' age, and the other was reputed a Socinian.

L^d Rosse's Divorce carryd on in Parliam^t. of purpose to be a precedent to the King's.

The King, thō he favour'd L^d Rosse's Bill, yet did soon after declare, that he was no ways dispos'd to follow his example.

* Dr. Cosens Bishop of Durham, and Dr. Wilkins Bishop of Chester.

Now it was that the King began again outwardly to shew

The King begins again to

T O M E
II.

1668. be more kind to the Duke then he had been of late.

A ridiculous
fancy of D.
Buckingham's that the Duke design'd to have him murder'd.

The King laughs at the D. of Bucking-am's folly, and begins to be convinced that he was no fitt man to be a Minister of State.

his former kindness and confidence towards the Duke, which for some time past had seem'd to cool by the instigation of those Enemies of his R. H, who had been taken into the Ministry upon Lord Clarendon's being layd aside; and espically of the Duke of Buckingham, who had so guilty a conscience of his misbehaviour towards the Duke, that he fancyd (thō without the least ground) that his R. H. had a design to have him murder'd; So that when he went out of Town any where, he had allways two Musketoons in his Coach, and many horsemen well arm'd to attend him. This came to the King's ears, who laught at the folly of that Duke's suspicion, and spar'd not to tell him how ridiculous he made himself therby. His Majesties eyes open'd every day more and more to convince him, that the Duke of Buckingham was not cut out for a Minister of State, who, thō very agreeable in his person and conversation, and full of flashy witt, had nothing of steady or solid in him.

1669.

The Duke discourses with F. Simons a Jesuite about Religion, and the intention he had of becoming Catho-lick.

It was about this time, in the beginning of the year 1669, that his R. H. (who had it long in his thoughts that the Church of England was the only true Church) was more sensibly touched in conscience, and began to think seriously of his Salvation. Accordingly he sent for one Father Simons a Jesuite, who had the reputation of a very learned man, to discourse with him upon that Subject; And, when he came, he told him the good intentions he had of being a Catholick, and treated with him about his being reconcil'd to the Church. After much discourse about the matter, the Father very sincerely told him, that unless he would quitt the Communion of the Church of England, he could not be received into the Catholick Church; The Duke then said, He thought it might be done by a dispensation from the Pope, alledging to him the singularity of his Case, and the advantage it might bring to the Catholick Religion in general, and in particular to those of it in England, if he might have such dispensation for outwarly appearing a Protestant, at least till he could own himself publickly to be a Catholick, with more security to his own person, and advantage to them. But the good Father insisted, that even the Pope himself had not the power to grant it, for it was an unalterable doctrine of the Catholick Church, Not to do ill that good might follow. What this good Jesuite thus said, was afterwards confirm'd to the Duke by the Pope himself, to whom he wrott upon the same subject. Till this time his R. H. beleev'd (as it is commonly beleev'd, or at least said, by the Church of England Doctors) that dispensations in any such cases are by the Pope easily granted, But Father Simons's words, and the letter of his Holines, made the Duke think it high time to use all the endeavours he could, to be at liberty to declare himself, and not to live in so unsafe and so uneasy a condition.

Wherfor his R. H. well knowing that the King was of the same mind, and that his Majesty had open'd himself upon it to Lord Arundel of Warder, Lord Arlington, and Sir Thomas Clifford, took an occasion to discourse with him upon that subject about the same time, and found him resolv'd as to his being a Catholick, a very Sensible of the uneasines it was to him to live in so much danger and constraint; and that he intended to have a privat meeting with those persons above nam'd at the Duke's Closett, to advise with them about the ways and methods fitt to be taken for advancing the Catholick Religion in his Dominions, being resolved not to live any longer in the constraint he was under. This meeting was on the 25th of January, the day in which the Church celebrates the Conversion of S^t Paul.

The Duke speaks of Religion to the King, and finds him resolv'd to be a Catholick.

The King appoints a privat meeting with L^d Arundel, L^d Arlington, and Clifford, at the Duke's closett, to advise on the methods to advance Cath. Religion in his Kingdoms. They meet the 25 January.

TOME
II.

1669.
The King declares his mind in the matter of Religion, with great Zeal to the Duke, and the other 3 persons present at this privat meeting.

When they were met according to the King's appointment, he declar'd his mind to them in the matter of Religion, and repeated what he had newly before Sayd to the Duke, How uneasy it was to him not to profess the Faith he beleev'd, and that he had call'd them together to have their advice about the ways and methods fittest to be taken for the setteling of the Catholick Religion in his Kingdoms, and to consider of the time most proper to declare himself; telling them withall, that no time ought to be lost, That he was to expect to meet with many and great difficultys in bringing it about, and that he chose rather to undertake it now, when he and his Brother were in their full strength and able to undergo any fatigue, then to delay it till they were grown older, and less fitt to go thorow with so great a design. This he speake with great earnestness, and even with tears in his eyes; and added, That they were to go about it as wise men and good Catholicks ought to do.

Result of the privat Consultation about Religion.
The work to be done in in conjunction with France.

The Consultation lasted long, and the Result was, that there was no better way for doing this great work, then to do it in conjunction with France and with the assistance of his Most Christian Majesty, The House of Austria not being in a condition to help in it; and, in pursuance of this Resolution, Mons^r. de Croissy Colbert, the French Ambassador, was to be trusted with the secret in order to inform his Master of it, that he might receive a power to treat about it with our King. The doing of this took up much time, for the Treaty held on, not only here, but also Lord Arundel was sent into France to conferr with that King, and to conclude the Treaty: Sir Richard Beling was intrusted to draw the Articles, and to do the part of a Secretary in that Negociation.

L^d Arundel sent to treat with the King of France.

The Treaty concluded in the beginning of 1670.
Articles of this

The Treaty was not finally concluded and sign'd till about the beginning of 1670, The purport of which was, that the French King was to give two hundred thousand pounds a year by quarterly payments, the first of which to begin when the Ratifications were exchange'd, to enable the King to begin the work in England ; That when Catholick Religion was settled here, our King was to joyn with France in making war upon Holland ; That in case of success France was to have such a part as was stipulated ; The Prince of Orange such a share, And England was to have Sluce, Cassant, and Walkeren, with the rest of the Sea-ports as far as Maesland-Sluc. The French had a great mind to have begun with the war of Holland first, but Lord Arundel being sent again over into France, convinced that King of the necessity of beginning first with the Catholicity here ; and so it was at last adjusted, and the first payments began according to the Articles.

All this was translated with the last Secrecy ; and in preparation thereunto, Collonel Fitzgerald, lately come from Tanger where he had been Governor, was to have a new Regiment of Foot rais'd for him, and such Officers chosen for it as might be confided in ; his Regiment was to be put into Yarmouth, and he made Governor of that important Town : The Earle of Bath was Governor of Plymouth, Lord Belasis of Hull, Lord Widdrington of Berwick, all of them men in whom the King might confide ; The Fleet and Portsmouth were in the Duke's hands ; nor was the Generality of the Church of England men at that time very averse to Catholick Religion ; Many that went under that name, had their Religion to chuse, and went to Church for Companys sake ; The few Troops that were on foot were look'd upon as well affected, and their Officers, all except Collonel Russel, such as would serve the Crown without grumbleing or asking questions. The rigorous Church of England men were let loose and encouraged underhand to prosecute according to the Law the Nonconformists, to the end, that these might be more Sensible of the case they should

T O M E
II.

1669. privat Treaty with France.

Col. Fitzgerald to have a new Regiment, and be made Governor of Yarmouth.

Plimouth, Hull, Berwick, and Portsmouth, in hands of persons to be trusted.

The Troops
well affected.

T O M E
II.

1669.
The D. Buckingham seeks to support himself by the favour of Madame, with whom he manages a Treaty with France.

Sir Elis Leighton sent over to treat with Madame.

This new Treaty with France, made a Secret to the Duke, and to L^d Arlington.

have when the Catholicks prevail'd. But how all this design came to faile, an account shall be given in its proper place.

The Duke of Buckingham finding himself every day sinking lower and lower in the King's esteem and confidence, and that his application to his R. H. by the Earle of Berkshire (who, as I should have said before, was introduced by the Earle of Peterborow) had no effect, and also finding that his Rivall, Lord Arlington, had in like manner made his addresses to the Duke with better success, and knowing with all the great credit which Madame the Dutchess of Orleans had with our King, he thought he could not be better supported or buoyd up, then by her favour towards him; And the better to introduce himself, he enter'd into a Treaty with Monsieur de Rouuigny (who was at that time the King of France's Minister in England and who mistakingly thought that Duke to be still in his former favour with the King) about a stricter Alliance between England and France, to be transacted with all secresy, only between that Duke on our King's part, and Madame for the King of France: In prosecution wherof, he sent over his great confident Sir Elis Leighton, with recommendations from Mons^r de Rouuigny, to manage affaires with Madame. In the mean time the King kept the Secret, and suffer'd this mock-treaty to go on, that he might the better cover the reall one, of which neither Madame, nor that Duke, had the least knowledge; whose cheif drift in his own new project, was to keep himself up at the head of the Ministry.

This management was made a Secret to his R. H. and to Lord Arlington, But after Sir Elis Leighton was come back from France, and had settled a Correspondence with Madame, his R. H. came accidentally to the knowledge of it, and at last received a full account of the whole Transaction from Sir Elis Leighton himself; and then gave notice of it to Lord Arlington, which serv'd not a litle to make the breach wider between him and the Duke of Buckingham, and to make him more firm in his R. H. interest (wherunto Sir Thomas Clifford, that Lord's great freind, and a very stout and Loyall man, did very much contribute) thō he still supported the creatures he had brought in, in opposition to the Duke.

Of this there was an instance in the two Treasurers of the Navy, Sir Tho: Osburn, and Sir Thomas Littleton, who pretended to have discover'd great mismanagment in the Commissioners of the Navy, who were persons put in by the Duke, and depended on him, that so they might get in others in their places of their own gang: This by a side wind reflected on the Duke, and therefore he thought fitt to obtain of his Ma^{ty} that the matter might be examin'd before him; and all sides being heard, it appear'd that those accusations proceeded either from malice, or from their ignorance in the affaires of the Navy, and the proceedings of the Commissioners were fully justified. They also attempted to perswad his Ma^{ty}, when a Squadron of eighteen Ships were order'd in Councill to be got ready to go against the Algereens, not to imploy Sir Thomas Allen a very experienced Commander, in that Expedition, only because he was the Duke's creature and recommended by him; and they press'd to have that Command given to Sir Robert Holmes, a creature of Lord Arlington's; who, thō very Stout in his own person, had not the capacity of the other, nor temper enough to govern such a Squadron: But his Ma^{ty} understood Sea-affaires so well, and was so well Satisfied with his Brother's managment of them, that notwithstanding the Suggestion of others, he still follow'd his advice in those matters.

T O M E
II.

1669.

S^rTho Osburn, and Littleton, pretend to discover great mismanagment in y^e Commissioners of the Navy, but are disappointed.

Sir Tho. Allen's going out against Algereens, oppos'd by the Ministers, because Sr.Tho. was a creature of the Duke's.

In the beginning of September, of this year, 1669, the King and the Duke went to Southampton, to hunt in the New Forest, where the news was brought them by an express of the death of the Queen their Mother, who dyd at Colombe near Paris the

The Death of the Queen Mother at Colombe.

TOME
II.

1669.

latter end of August. She was youngest Daughter of the great King Henry the 4th, of France, born the 28th Nouembre 1609. N. S. and married to King Charles the 1st, in the year 1625. After her great and many sufferings, God was pleas'd at last to comfort her with the sight of her Son's Restoration to his Father's Crown. She excelled in all the qualitys of a good Wife, a good Mother, and a good Christian. She was buryd with great magnificence at S^t Denis the buriall-place of the Kings of France, in the same mañer as the Queen Mothers of France are us'd to be buried.

The Duke regulates wth the French Ambassador, the Salutes at Sea between the English and French Ships in y^e Mediteranean.

Sir Thos: Allen being about this time to go out with a Squadron of Ships under his command into the Streights, the French Ambassador propos'd to the Duke the making some regulation for the Salutes at Sea between the English and French Ships which might meet there, his Master being then about Sending out a Squadron, under the Command of Monsieur du Quesne to treat with the Algereens; and at last it was agreed, to avoid all disputes, That in the Mediteranean they were not Salute one another; and the Duke took particular care that in the agreement, the words, In those Seas, should be inserted, that ther might be no consequences drawn from thence as to other Seas.

1670.
The old Duke of Albemarle's death.

The Duke takes this occasion to advise the King, not to make anybody General, it being too great a Command for any Subject.

On the 3^d of January, of the year 1670, dyd the old General The Duke of Albemarle, who was the cheif Instrument of the King's wonderfull Restoration, and had received from his Majesty honours and estate proportionable to his merite. Some days before his death, his R. H. being inform'd that he could not recover, speaking of it to the King, he took that occasion to advise his Ma^{ty} not to make any body General in his room, for that it was too great a power and trust, as matters stood, to be put in any one bodys hand, not excepting even himself; thō if his Majesty would have a General, he hoped he would not think of any other body for that place but himself, which however he did not desire for the reason above given, and that in time of peace there was no need of one; and in case of a war, his Ma^{ty} might make such General Officers as should be fitt and proper for the occasion; And since the number of his Troops at present was so small, it would look oddly, as an unusuall thing, to have a General over them. For these and other reasons his Ma^{ty} at that time resolved to have no new General in the place of the Duke of Albemarle.

At the same time the Duke desired the King, that upon this occasion of the Duke of Albemarle's death, his own Troop of Guards might not lose their Rank of being the Second Troop of Guards, which would be a hardship both to himself, and to all the Officers of his Troop, who were very good men, to be so postpon'd; That when his own Regiment of foot was rais'd call'd the Duke's Regiment, he did not then desire or expect they should have their rank before Coldstream Regiment, they being first rais'd; and therefore since his Majesty saw he did not desire to do wrong to others, he hoped that he should not have wrong done to him nor to his Troop of Guards; and his Ma^{ty} was then so well satisfied with these reasons and the justice of the Duke's desire, that he assur'd his R. H. that his Troop should not lose their Rank of being the Second Troop of Guards.

The Duke desires of the King, that his own Troop of Guards should not lose their Rank.

But so it was that upon the General's death, his Regiment of foot called the Coldstream, was given to Lord Craven, and made a Second Regiment of Guards, and his Troop of Guards was the Queen's Troop; and therupon the Queen who was not of herself overkind to the Duke, was put upon it by some who were glad of any occasion under hand to put any mortification upon his R. H. to ask it of the King, That her Troop of Guards might have the next rank to that of the King's; which she

The Coldstream Reg^t. given to L^d Craven, and the old Generals Troop of Guards is call'd y^e Queen's Troop.

T O M E

II.

1670.

The Duke generously dispenses the King from his promise, and acquiesces to have his Troop of Guards lose their rank of 2^d Troop, which was given to the Queen's Troop.

Madame comes to Dover in May.

press'd so hard by herself and others, that his Ma^{ty} was very much embarrass'd what to do in it, remembring what he had said to the Duke upon that subject: Of which his Royall Highness being inform'd, he went to the King, and said, That he saw his Ma^{ty} was teas'd by the women and others upon that account, That for his own part he would be more reasonable then they, and was content his Ma^{ty} should not stick to his first resolution and promise (thō at the same time he could not (but) think it a hardship upon him) but would quietly acquiesce to what (was) easiest to his Ma^{ty}, For what ever others did, it was his resolution never to make him uneasy for any concern of his own; And so the Queen's Troop had the rank given it of the Second Troop of Guards.

About the beginning of May, in the same year, Madame, the King's only Sister now living, came to Dover to meet her Brother, which she had long desird to do, and which was now made easy to her upon the King of France's coming then into Flanders to visit his new Conquests; But this her journey prov'd to be unfortunat in many respects, and not only hurtfull to our Kings affaires in generall, but particularly to those good measures (which) had been taken as to the Catholick Religion. I have already mention'd how the private Treaty was Signed and exchanged between the two Kings, and that Some of the mony in pursuance of it had been payd to the King; for thō the French allways shew'd a strong inclination to have their own work done first, and to begin with the war against Holland, yet that King yeelded at last to the convincing reasons that were given him to the contrary, as has already been said. But now again, still looking upon it as more advantageous for their own temporall concerns, to change those measurs then taken, and knowing the great influence which in all likelyhood Madame would have upon the King her Brother, it was resolved by his Most Christian Majesty to make use of her to bring that about which he so much desir'd ; For which reason he consented to her journey, thō formerly he had been adverse to her making a visite to her Brother in England, as also Monsieur was for reasons of his own. She very willingly undertook this Commission, hoping thereby further to ingratiate herself with that King, and to be more consider'd in France by shewing the power she had over the King her Brother : She had indeed a mind to Stay in England, not only out of love to her Brother, but she presumed upon his temper and the ascendant she should have over him ; and beleev'd, that if once she could compass her living with him, she might govern all things here.

When her coming over was first propose the Duke did not like it, fearing the ill consequences it might have, and which afterwards did happen ; and as dexterously as he could, without appearing down right against it, he did his utmost to hinder it, but without effect. Also an accident happen'd at that time, which did very much facilitate Madame's prevailing upon the King her Brother ; for a late new Act of Parliament coming just at that time to be put in execution against Conventicles, the King thought it necessary to leave the Duke behind him in London, to prevent any disorder that might happen upon the first Sunday in which the Conventicles were to be shutt up and suppress'd, which fell upon the 10th of May ; So that Madame arrived at Dover three or four days before the Duke could come thither. In which time she had so prevail'd with the King, that when the Duke arrived there he found all the former measures broken, and the resolution taken to begin out of hand with the War with Holland ; And it was no litle Surprise to his R. H, that both Lord Arlington, and Sir Tho. Clifford, being gain'd by Madame, had concurr'd in it, who were the only two there present that knew of the Secret Treaty. They meeting the Duke upon his first entring against his Sister's coming to Dover, fearing the ill consequences of it, as to the privat Treaty.

The Duke

Before the Duke's arrivall at Dover, Madame had already prevail'd with the King, to begin first with the Dutch War and break all the former measures, L^d Arlington, and Clifford, gain'd by Madame, con-curr'd with her

TOME
II.

1670. to the great Surprise of the Duke, who was concern'd to See, that these new methods did quite ruin the Catholick Design.

The Duke's reasons against beginning with the Dutch War; But he is overruled.

into Dover, before he had seen the King, told him what had been done; who answer'd them, He was very sorry for it, for he was sure, it would quite defeat the Catholick design; because when once his Ma^{ty} was engaged in such an expensive war as that would be, and was not absolute master of affaires at home, he unavoidably would run in debt, and must then be at the mercy of his Parliament, which, as matters had been order'd were not likely to be in very good humour; and, therfor, thō they had given very large Supplys for the former Dutch War, in all probability they would not do the same now, since that War was of their own proposall, wheras this is undertaken without their advice, and (in) conjunction with France; for which reason alone they would not approve of it, and besides it would give them a jealousy and suspicion of what was further intended. They answer'd, That, as to what his R. H. fear'd of the King's running in debt, there would be no danger of it, since his Ma^{ty} being to have fifty Ships out, to which the French were to joyn thirty, that charge might be easily supported by the Customes which they reckon'd at six hundred thousand pounds, and that such a Fleet, they thought, would be sufficient to deal with the Dutch; and that if the War succeeded, it was not much matter what people suspected. The Duke told them, He was sure they took wrong measures as to the Sea expence, for thō the number of Ships they mention'd might cost no more, and that he thought he should be able to look the Dutch in the face with eighty such Ships as those, and fire Ships proportionable, yet the necessary Convoys for the preservation of Trade, and the security of the Plantations, with a recruit of Ships which must be got ready to joyn the Fleet after an Engagement, would go near to cost as much more, not to reckon the Land forces which upon this occasion must of necessity be rais'd. All this, and more, the Duke afterward represented to the King, but could not prevaile to get that fatal Dutch War put off.

Whilst Madame stayd at Dover, she prevail'd with the King to pass by his displeasure to the Duke of Buckingham, and got him restor'd again to his Majesties favour and trust; and when his R. H. found fault with her for so doing, she ingeniously told him, She did it to make her court to the King, who she saw had a mind to be press'd to do it. She also made the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Arlington freinds; and had at that time so much credit with the King, by reason of the opinion he had of her good understanding and of his kindness to her, that she should have perswaded him to have done almost any thing she had a mind to. After about a fortnight's stay at Dover she was call'd back, the French Court being upon their return towards Paris; and a litle after her arrivall at her own house at St Cloud, she dyd of a sudden and violent distemper, which seiz'd her but the evening before to the great surprise and grief of all the Royall Family. The manner of her death gave some suspicion that she was poyson'd, but the Phisitians when she was open'd declar'd she was not.

This voyage of Madame's into England made a noise beyond Sea; and the Dutch were much alarm'd at it, whose jealousy was increased by the Duke of Buckingham's being sent soon after into France, In So much that Monsieur Vanbeuning, their Minister here, desir'd he might be impower'd to assure De Witt, that that Duke was sent upon nothing prejudiciall to his Masters.

Soon after Madame's death, his R. H. fell ill of a great cold, to that degree that it was fear'd it would turn to a consumption; so that he was oblig'd to go to Richmont for change of air, to get well of it; nor did he perfectly recover till almost the end of the Summer.

All things were now pretty quiet at Court, the two Cheifs Ministers having been lately made freinds. The winter

T O M E
II.

1670.
Madame gets Duke of Buc-kingam restor'd to the King's favour, and made him and Arlington freinds.

The Dutch alarm'd at Madam's journey to Dover, and the Duke of Bucking being sent soon after to France.

The Duke taking a great cold, go's to Richmont to change air.

T O M E
II.

1671.
The D^{ess} of York begins to be suspected of being a Catholick.

The Duke owns the truth to the King, of the D^{ess} resolution to be a Catholick.

None but Fr.
Hunt a Franciscan, Lady Cranmore, and Dupuy, privy to her reconciliation.

The D^{ess} of York's death, 31 March.

following there was some noise made upon a suspicion, that the Dutchess of York was inclin'd to be a Roman Catholick ; nor was it without ground, for she that had been all her lifetime very regular in receiving once a month the Sacrament in the Church of England way, and upon all occasions had shewn herself very zealous in her profession, but was of late observed to have forborn so taking the Sacrament ; and that which confirm'd them the more in this suspicion, was, that during all her great indisposition, of which she dyd, she had not prayers said to her (as was usually) by any of the Chaplains ; in so much that in December (the King) took notice of all this to the Duke, who own'd the truth to him, That she was resolved to be a Catholick, and was soon to be reconciled ; Vpon which his Ma^{ty} charg'd the Duke to keep it as a great Secret, which was accordingly done, for none but Father Hunt a Franciscan who reconcil'd her, the Lady Cranmore, and Depuy a Servant to the Duke, was privy to it. It was about a twelve month before (as may be seen by the papers she left behind her containing the motives of her Conversion) that she began to doubt, and in August last she was fully convinced and reconciled, thō the world knew it not till she dyd ; which happen'd the last day of March, 1671, after she had received all the last Sacraments of the Catholick Church. She dyd with great devotion and resignation, and the morning before her death, finding herself very ill that she could not long hold out, she desir'd the Duke not to stir from her till she was dead ; and that in case Doctor Blanford Bishop of - - - - -, or any other of the Bishops, should come to speak to her, he would tell them the truth, That she was reconcil'd to the Church of Rome, and had accordingly receiv'd already the Sacraments ; But, if when so told, they still insisted to see her, they might come in, provided they would not disturb her by discoursing to her of Controversy : And accordingly, when Doctor Blanford soon after came the same morning to see her, being brought thither by her Brother Mr. Laurence Hide, now Earl of Rochester, (who did not certainly know that she was become a Catholick) The Duke meeting the Bishop in the drawing Room, told him what the Dutchess had charg'd him with; and being further satisfy'd by the Duke, that she was reconcil'd, he said to him, He made no doubt but that she would do well (that was his expression) since she was fully convinced, and did it not out of any wordly end; and afterwards went into the room to her, and made her a short Christian exhortation suitable to the condition she was in, and then departed. Her Brother the Lord Cornbury, a violent Church of England man, came not near her when she was so ill, because he suspected she was become a Catholick.

T O M E
II.

1671.
Dr. Blanford came to see her on her death bed, and tho he was told she was a Catholick, said, he made no doubt she would do well, since she was fully convinced.

It was not long after the death of the Dutchess, that the Duke was press'd by severall of his freinds, to think of marryin again, and they would have had him propose it to his Majesty; But he told them, It was as much the King's and Kingdom's concern as his own, and that if his Majesty had a mind to it, or thought it fitt, he would speak to him of it himself; which at last he did about six months after the death of the late Dutchess, and the person propos'd was the Princess of Inspruck, daughter to the Arch Duke of that place, who was of the House of Austria. This was done upon the information of Sir Bernard Gascon, a Florentin gentleman, who had long serv'd in the Army of King Charles the 1st, and had seen that young Princess, being well acquainted with the Dutchess her mother, who was of the house of Florence. The well wishers to the Crown were very desirous that the Duke should lose no time in marrying again, the King having no legitimate children, and the Queen likely to live long without hopes of having any; and the Duke having lost six of the eight he had by his first Wife, of which four were Boys, and only two

The Duke press'd by severall of his freinds, to marry again.
His Answer.

The King himself speaks to the Duke of marrying, and the P^{ty} of Inspruck is propos'd.

TOME
II.

1671.

Sr Bernard Gascogne, after a long delay, is sent to negotiate the marriage at Vienna and Inspruck.

The Articles sign'd amongst which one that the D^{me} was to have a publick Chappel.

E. Peterborow is sent Embass^r. to marry the P^{me} of Inspruck, as Proxy for the Duke, but stopt at Calais with the news of the Em^{press}'s death, and y^e Em^{peror}'s resolution to marry that P^{me} himself.

Daughters left. At last it was resolv'd, that Sir Bernard should be sent into Germany, to treat this Match both at Inspruck and at Vienna; yet the doing it was delayd for severall months, wherby we may conclude that the King was not very forward in it at that time. However, after a long delay, Sir Bernard was sent with necessary Instructions to both the above named Courts, for the treating and concluding this Marriage. This he effected after a tedious Negociation, and the Articles were sign'd and exchang'd privatly, between the Emperor and the King; one of which was, that a publick Chappel should be allowed the Dutchess in England. Hereupon the Earle of Peterborow was nam'd, and dispatched away as Ambassador Extraordinary from the King to the Emperor, with the usuall Instructions upon such occasions, and with a power to marry that Princess by Proxy. But the said Earle was no sooner landed at Calais, when news came from Vienna of the death of the then Em^{press}, and that the Emperor was resolv'd to marry that Princess himself, which did put an end to all this negociation.

1672.

Buckingham, Lauderdale, Arlington, Clifford, and Ashly Cooper, afterward Earle of Shaftsbury; These 5 call'd the Caball were now of the Cabinet Council, the last a great stickler for the Dutch War.

THE year 1672 began with preparing the Fleet with as litle noise as might be, to have it in readiness to begin the War in the Spring with the Dutch, in pursuance of the Treaty above mention'd with France. Of the King's Cabinet Council were then the Duke of Buckingham, Duke of Lauderdale, Earle of Arlington, Lord Clifford, and L^d Ashly Cooper, afterward Earle of Shaftsbury and Chancellor of England, and none more zealous then he for carrying on the War with Holland. Now thō none of them but Lord Arlington and Clifford had knowledge of the Secret Treaty with France, which gave the first Rise to this war, yet there were not wanting other specious reasons enough, to make the others enter into it, which were afterwards sett forth in his Ma^{ties} Declaration of War published on the 28th of March of the present year. The War being thus resolved on, the first busines was to provide mony sufficient to carry it on ; for which they could find no other expedient but stopping all payments in the Exchequer, with an allowance of interest, of six per Cent to the persons unpaid, and this for the space of a year. In the next place it was thought necessary to procure, as much as might be, an Vnion amongst ourselves, before we fell upon our Enemies ; and in order therunto it was resolved, That his Ma^{ty} should put forth a Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, with due limitations for the preservation of the Church of England as it was by law establish'd, and for preserving the publick peace against any seditious practices in the meetings of the Non-Conformistes, which were to be in publick places to be allow'd them, where all should have liberty to come in ; But to the Roman Catholicks there was only exemption granted from the penal Laws, and liberty to exercise their Religion only in their privat houses.

Thō his R. H. was in his own Judgment against entering into this War, before his Ma^{ty} power and authority in England had been better fixed, and less precarious, as it would have been if the privat Treaty first agreed on had not been alter'd ; yet in obedience to the King's Commands, he lost no time and spar'd no pains in carrying it on with all the vigour imaginable, and with all the good husbandry that such an Vndertaking would permitt ; and therefore when it was propos'd in Councill to put an Embargo on all Ships outward bound, the better to man the Fleet, the Duke alone oppos'd it, because it would have put a stop to all Trade, and by consequence highly endammage the King in his Customes ; and, at the same time, he undertook to man the Fleet without so doing, for which he only desir'd that the Newfound Land Trade might be forbid for that Season ; And for the Main-Fleet which he was to command, he desir'd

T O M E
II.

1672.
The Publick reasons for this Dutch War sett forth in the Declaration of y^e 28 of March.

The Duke against entering into this War before
the King's authority was better fix'd, as it would have been if y^e privat Treaty had been follow'd.

The Duke alone opposes the proposal made in Councill, of an Embargo upon all Ships, and undertakes without that to man y^e Fleet.

T O M E no more then Sixty Ships of Line English, with twenty fire Ships, and thirty French men of war with ten fire Ships, judging that force sufficient to deal with the Dutch. By this means there were Ships and men enough left for Convoys, so that the War would cause no interruption of Trade.

II.

1672.
He desires only 60 ships of Line and 20 fire ships.

Sr Rob.
Holmes sent out with a Squadron to intercept the Dutch Smirna
Fleet.

The King about this time having advice that a rich Dutch Fleet was coming from the Straights throu' the Channell, convoyd by six men of war, sent orders to Sir Robert Holmes who was then at Portsmouth, to go out with what Ships could be got ready there, in order to intercept them; he had also orders to call to his assistance all such men of war as he should meet with in the Channell. Accordingly Sir Robert put out to Sea in the St MICHEL a second Rate, having with him the Earle of Ossory in the RESOLUTION, Sir Fretcheville Holles in the CAMBRIDGE, Captⁿ George Legge in the FAIRFAX, Captⁿ John Holmes in the GLOCESTER, which four last were all third Rates, with about three or four smaller Ships of fifth and sixth Rates; and whilst he was cruising on the back of the Isle of Wight, he saw at some distance from him Sir Edward Spragge, sailing with about five or six men of war homewards, bound from the Mediterranean; but did not advertise him, as he had to have done, of the Orders he had receiv'd for all the King's Ships that he met to joyn with him; nor would he (allow) Captain Legge to go and speak with Sir Edoward, thō he much desir'd it: and this out of a privat pick and emulation, for he rather chose that the King's busines should suffer, then that Sir Edoward Spragge should have any share with him in the honour of that Enterprise; which was the cause why the Dutch came off with so litle loss, and we with so litle advantage upon this occasion.

He meets Sr Ed. Spragge at the Isle of Wight, but do's not advertise him to joyn with him, as he might to have done.

Sir R. Holmes attacks the Dutch Smirna Fleet. The Dutch lose but 4 Marchand men in this Engagement.

Soon after the Dutch Smirna Fleet appear'd, and Sir Robert engaged them with more courage then conduct; for his own Ship was disabled in the Fight, and the Dutch gott off with the losse only of four Marchant men, and but two of them of any considerable Value. T O M E II.

1672.

AFTER this Engagement the War against Holland was immediatly proclaim'd, and the Generall Rendezvous of the whole Fleet, both English and French, was appointed to be at St Helens near the Isle of Wight; but notwithstanding all the diligence that we could make, De Ruyter with about seventy Ships of Line, besides fire-ships, gott to Sea before we and the French could joyn. The Duke being advertis'd of this, and also that the French Fleet were sail'd from Brest, and judging, as the winds had been, that they must now be in the Channel, he sail'd from the Buoy of the Nore with all the Ships of Line which were then ready, which were only forty with twelve fire ships; and having had all that day a fresh gale at West, which carryd him down the King's Channel, by that time he was got the length of the long-Sand-head, he had in the evening sight of the Dutch Scouts, and by the Signals they made, he judged they saw the Body of their own Fleet, thō he could not, it being somewhat hazy towards the Eastward; and when he had got about the head of the above mention'd Sand, he stood away to the South; and as the night fell, the gale growing fresher, and there being liklyhood of bad weather, he was obliged to come to anchor, where he continued all night. At break of day it prov'd litle wind, and the Duke had no sooner given the signall for sayling, but that the wind came up East with a thick fog; by which means he past by De Ruyter without seeing him, or being Seen by him, and so stood away for St Helen's; had not that Fog opportunly happen'd, the Duke could not have avoided an Engagment upon Very unequall terms. About eleven it began to grow clear, and the Duke found himself somewhat to the West of Dover, fair in with the shore, and continued on his course, so that early next morning he joyn'd

THE SECOND DUTCH WAR, proclaim'd.

The general rendezvous of the English and French Fleet at St.
Helens.

De Ruyter with 70 ships of Line, gets to Sea before y^e Junction of the English and French Fleets.

The Duke Sail'd from the Buoy of the Nore with only 40 ships of Line.

He discovers
the Dutch Scouts in the evening.

The Duke passes by De Ruyter in a Fog without seeing him, or being seen by him, and passing by Dover joyns next morning the French at St. Helens.

T O M E II.

1672.

The Duke stays 2 days at S^t. Helens to adjust all things.

An account of the Fleet.

The Duke's Ship the PRINCE of 100 guns, his Squadron y^e Red.

His Vice Admiral S^r Ed.
Spragge in the LONDON, his Rear Admiral
Sir John Harman in the CHARLES.

C. d'Estreés Adm. of the White, his V. and R. Admirals Mr. Du Quesne and La Rabiniere.
E. Sandwich in the R. JAMES admiral of the blew.

Sir Jos Jordan in the SOVERAIGN V. Ad^l. of the blew and S^r John Kemp-thorn R. Ad^l. in y^e S^t ANDREW.

the French at S^t Helens (May 4th). As for De Ruyter, he came into * Dover road two hours after the Duke had pass'd by it, but thought it not convenient to Sail further West.

The Duke remain'd but a day or two at S^t Helens, only to settle the order of battel and to adjust all things with the Count d'Estreés, Commander of the French Squadron ; which being done, he sail'd to look out for the Dutch Fleet, and to joyn the rest of his own Fleet which were not ready when he sail'd from the Buoy of the Nore.

Before we proceed, it may be proper to give some particular account of our Fleet, and how it was officer'd as to the Flags.

The Duke, as High Admiral of England, commanded the whole ; his Squadron was the Red, and he was in the PRINCE a Ship of a hundred guns, this being her first voyage ; Sir Edoward Spragge in the LONDON, a Ship of the same force, was his Vice Admiral ; and Sir John Harman in the CHARLES of ninty Guns, was his Rear Admiral ; The Count d'Estreés, Vice Admiral of France, in the S^t PHILIP of between eighty and ninty Guns, was Admiral of the White, and Vice Admiral of the Fleet ; he carried his white Flag at the fore top mast head, none but the Admiral of France carrying it at the main Top mast head ; his Vice and Rere Admirals were Du Quesne, and La Rabiniere, both in Ships of eighty guns and upwards. The Earle of Sandwich in the ROYALL JAMES of one hundred guns, was Rere Admirall of the Fleet, and Admirall of the Blew ; Old Sir Joseph Jordan in the SOVERAIGN of the same number of Guns, was his Vice Admiral, and Sir John Kempthorn in the S^t ANDREW of ninty od guns, his Rere Admiral. Sir

* According to Campbell, the Dutch Fleet was seen off Dover, May 9th, and on the 13th a Squadron of theirs chased some English Ships under the cannon of Sheerness. — EDITOR.

T O M E
II.

1672.
Sr R. Holmes in the S^t MICHEL and L^d Ossory in y^e VICTORY, weretheDuke's seconds.

The Duke getting sight of the Dutch, bears down
upon them.

Capⁿ Haddoc advertises the Duke of the Rumble Sand, on which the Dutch design'd to draw the English Fleet.

The Duke brings to, and

Robert Holmes in the S^t MICHEL of ninty od guns, and Lord Ossory in the VICTORY of eighty od guns, were the Duke's Seconds, which post Sir Robert had desir'd to have, since he could not have a better Flag then Sir Edward Spragge.

When this Fleet sail'd from S^t Helens, the wind continuing East, they were obliged to stop tides, So that it was some time before they got the length of Dover, where they receiv'd notice that the Dutch were without the banks of Flanders thwart of Ostend ; Wherupon the Duke made the best of his way to find them out, and was the next day joyn'd by Severall Ships of Line from the River, that were not ready to saile with him when he first Sett out. Vpon the (19th) of May about ten in the morning he got sight of the Dutch, and having the wind of them, it being West, he bore down right upon them : At which time the Earle of Sandwich sent his Captain, Richard Haddoc, an old Commander at Sea, to advertise the Duke, That by his reckoning they should not be far from a Sand called the Rumble, known by few of our Pilotes ; and that he was confident the Dutch were just to Leeward of it, designing to draw us upon it ; Wherefore the Duke examin'd all the Pilots on bord his Ship, and they knew nothing of that Sand, it being out of the Tradeway for the English ; But Captain Lecke master Gunner of his Ship, who having cruised in Cromwell's time on that coast, knew it as well as Haddoc did and was of his opinion : Wherupon the Duke order'd some of the smallest fourth Rates to make saile on head, to See if they could find out that Sand, which they accordingly did, and found that what Haddoc and Lecke had said, was true, and that the Dutch kept just to Leeward of that Sand on purpose to draw the Duke upon it ; That there was but eighteen foot water in it, so that there could be no engaging them that afternoon : And when he was come up within allmost Cañon-shott of them, he brought to, the same tacks on bord, and stood in with them towards the banks of

T O M E
II.

1672. stands in with the Dutch towards the Banks of Flanders.
Both Fleets tack, and are within less then cañon shot of one another.

A Fog rises next morning and continues till 8 or 9.

De Ruyter stands in the Banks, having no mind to ingage in the morning and so far from y^e Banks.

The Duke stands after him, but the gale freshening he could not ingage him.

The Duke, seeing the Enemy avoided ingaging, stood away to Southwold bay, to take in water and provisions.

Flanders till about ten at night; And then the Enemy first gave their Signals for tacking, which the Duke also did at the same time, and lay close haled to keep the wind: Both Fleets were then so near one the other, that some of their shot, when they fir'd for their signal of tacking, flew over our Line, wherupon the Duke stood towards the North till after midnight, at which time they tack'd again, and stood in towards the Banks of Flanders; which the Duke also did, and about two in the morning, finding the Soundings of those Banks, he tack'd, and stood out to the North.

Before day break, there fell a very thick Fog, which continued till about eight or nine; when it brake up, the Duke saw the Van of the Enemy led by a Vice Admiral, that was litle more then Canon-shot a stern of him, somewhat to windward of his own Ship and of some ten more that were next him, but to the rest of his Fleet that was in sight, they were Leeward; The Earle of Sandwich Admiral of the Blue, and his Division, were not in sight, he having come to an anchor in the Fog, but after it clear'd up he quickly joyn'd the Fleet.

When the Enemy saw themselves so near us, they tack'd and stood in towards the Banks, De Ruyter not having a mind to ingage so early in the morning and so far from the Banks, which appear'd by his working. The Duke tack'd at the same time, in doing of which three or four of his Ships brought their top masts by the bord; and the gale freshening, and being north west, there could be no ingaging, the wether not permitting to carry out the lower Tire, however the Duke waited on them towards their own Coasts; but towards sun set, seeing there was great likelihood of more blowing wether, he stood off from the Banks. Seeing therefore that the Enemy avoided fighting, and that many of our Ships wanted water and provisions, occasion'd by our hasty coming out to joyn the French,

T O M E
II.

1672.
And De Ruyter stood into his Coast, and anchor'd off of the Gorée.

De Ruyter's reasons for venturing a battel at that time.

De Ruyter the greatest Sea-Commander of his time.

The Duke stood away for Southwold Bay, the wind continuing westerly, and the Ruyter stood in to his Coast, and came to an Anchor off of the Gorée. This sure was the first time that two Fleets were so near, and continued so long in presence of one another, and parted without engagin. De Ruyter had no mind to venture a battel, and with reason; for the loss of it might at that time have proved very fatal to his Country, considering the ill condition they were then in by the Conquests the Most Christian King in person had made upon them, and the great consternation they were then under. On the other side he was obliged to keep the sea, So to support the drooping spirits of his Countrymen, and to hinder the deserting of his men, and their getting the same fright amongst them, which was on shore: So that he had a hard game to play; And had he not been qualified as he was, he could not so well have fenced against all these difficulties as he did. He was indeed justly esteem'd the greatest Sea Commander of his time; he was bred up under old Van Tromp, and had been in all or most of the Cheif Engagements of the two first Dutch Wars; he had very good sense equall to his courage, which appear'd upon this occasion in so managing his Fleet, that altho they were so near one another for so long a time, the Duke could not come to an Engagement without great disavantage and hazard to his own Fleet; for he posted himself so advantageously for his own Fleet, that drew less water then ours, neer the banks of Flanders, and serv'd himself so well of the wether, which was favorable to him, that the Duke could neither attack him in the morning so to make a decisive battel of it, nor far enough off from the Sands with which they were better acquainted then we.

When the Duke was come to an Anchor in Southwold Bay, he let such of his Ships of Line, as were in most want of provisions and water, anchor near the Shore for the quicker

The Duke at anchor in Southwold Bay.

TOME
II.

1672.

His care and orders to prevent being surpriz'd.

De Ruyter's reasons and determination to attack the Duke in South-wold Bay.

dispatch; which also severall of his fire Ships did to take in more balast, they having been fitted out in So much hast, that they had not time to take in all they wanted. This permission was given the wind being westerly, the Duke declaring at the same time, That so soon as it should come about to the East, he would stand a litle further out into the Sea, and anchor in his order of battel. He also order'd, That no light Colliers, or other trading-Ships should be permitted to go to the Northward, for fear of falling into the hands of any of the Enemies Cruisers or Privateers, wherby they might be advertis'd how his Fleet then lay. Notwithstanding which orders and precaution, a light Collier slip'd by in the night and was taken by a Privateer, and so carryd to De Ruyter, who therupon immediatly call'd all his Flag-men and Captains on bord, and the wind being just then come up East, he gave them an account of the Intelligence he had of the posture the English Fleet was then in, and propos'd to them to sail that night at Sun-set, so to be up with the Enemy by break of day, That in all probability they would not be in order, or in a condition to receive him, That having now the advantage of the wind for doing it, he could not hope to have so fair an opportunity again, and therefore thought he ought to make use of it. Notwithstanding all these reasons the Generality of the Officers seem'd not satisfied with them, but made severall objections against this proposall, Saying, That should the wind come Westerly when they were come up with the Enemy, they should be in an ill condition, It being very unsafe for them to ingage so far from their own Coast; And when De Ruyter saw he could not by reasoning bring them to be of his mind, he told them, That being convinced it was for his Master's service so to do, and being trusted by them with the Command of the Fleet, he was resolv'd to undertake it, and therefore order'd them to be ready to saile at the close of the evening which accordingly was done. The account of these particulars was afterwards given the Duke by Captain John Dick, Commander of the Josue, who was present at the debate. T O M E II.

1672.

As soon as the Duke saw the wind come up Easterly, he call'd for Sir John Cox, his Captain, and order'd him, in pursuance of what had been formerly resolv'd, to give the Signall for the Fleet to stand out, and be in order of battel to receive the Dutch in case they should be up with them the next day: Sir John represented to the Duke, that he was of opinion, there could be no danger of the Enemies coming upon him so soon, their Fleet being in the same condition as ours, taking in stores and provisions as we were; That Captain Finch, one of our Cruisers, come newly in from the Coast of Holland, had brought no news of the Enemies motion; That the master of the Packet-boat was just come in also, who being brought in to the Duke, inform'd him, that he came the evening before throu' the Dutch Fleet, as they lay at anchor off the Gorée, That most of 'em had then yards and Top-masts down, and were taking in all sorts of provisions. Sir John therefore insisted, That by all this it was not likely that they could be So Soon in a sailing condition; So that it would better for his R. H. to remain where he was at least for twenty four houres longer, in which time all his Fleet might be Supplyd with what was wanting, which it could not be in severall days should it stand out farther from the Shore: This advice was confirm'd by the French Major, and Captain Eliot his assistant, who were appointed to take the water and other necessities for the French Squadron. Vpon all which the Duke was overperswaded to continue as he was. Sir John Cox was so fully perswaded that the Dutch could not come and attack us in twenty four houres time, that as soon as the Duke was gone to rest, without asking leave of his R. H. as he ought to have done, he brought his Ship, the PRINCE, on the Careen to

The Duke diswaded by Sr Jo. Cox, from standing out with the Fleet, to be in a posture to receive the Dutch should they come upon him.

TOME
II.

give her a Pair of Boot-hose-tops in order to her better sailing.

1672.
The Duke surpris'd at Southwold Bay.
The first notice of the Dutch Fleets approaching, given by one Cogolin at 2 in the morning, May 28.

In this condition was the Duke on the 28th of May about two a clock in the morning, when he had the first notice of the approche of the Dutch; which was given by one Cogolin Captain of a French fourth Rate, who had been out with Captain Finch a cruising on the coast of Holland, and his Ship being none of the best Sailers, could not get into the Fleet the evening before, as the other had done; and therefore was obliged to come to an anchor a league and better to the East of the Fleet, that he might not be driven to the Leeward of it, the wind being north east, and a Leeward tide. This happen'd well for us, for by that means we had quicker knowledge of the approche of the Enemy; For this Captain inform'd that whilst he was getting under Sail to joyn the Fleet, two of their Scouts fell in with him, and thō they were each of them of equall force with him, they fir'd not at him, but brought to, and stood from him, which made him with reason judge that their Fleet was not far astern of them; Wherefore by way of signal to give notice of the approche of the Enemy, he fired all the way he stood in to joyn our Fleet, which instantly made us all prepare to receive them the best we could. As soon as it was day we perceiv'd the Enemy just to windward, bearing right down upon us. Such of our Ships of Line and fire ships that were nearer in with the shore then the Flag-men, and some of the other great Ships, at the first alarme got under sail, to place themselves in their respective stations in order of battel; but by reason of the Leeward tide, and East wind, few of them could get in when the Engagement began: So that of the Red and the Blew Squadrons there were not above twenty in all that bore the brunt of De Ruyter's and Van Ghent's Squadrons. The Zeland Squadron commanded by Banker, had to do with the French commanded by the Count

Not above 20 Ships of Line, of the Red and Blew Squadrons, bore the brunt of De Ruyter's and Van Ghent's Squadrons.
The Zeland Squadron

D'Estreés, both of them standing to the Southwards, having their Larbord tacks on bord from the very beginning of the Ingagement, wheras the Duke and the Earle of Sandwich with theirs lay close hal'd with their starbord Tacks on bord. The Earle with his Blew Squadron led, and had to deal with Van Ghent and his Amsterdam Squadron, and De Ruyter, with his of the Maese ingaged with the Duke and his Red Squadron.

The better to avoid confusion or any sudden consternation, the Duke in the first place gave very seasonable and prudent Orders, That none who were about him should trouble the Officers of the Ship with unnecessary questions, and that no man whatsoever should so much as name a Fire Ship aloud ; That if they perceived any such a bearing down upon him which neither he nor his Officers saw, they should whisper it to himself, or to y^e Officer next to them.

Between seven and eight in the morning the Ingagement began with great fury, the Dutch having the advantage of the wind, of which De Ruyter thought to have made good use; for after that he and the Duke had given each other their Broad-sides, hoping to make short work with his R. H. he sent two of his Fire ships to bord him. Sir Edward Scot formerly a Land Officer under the Duke, who now attended him as a Volunteer, happen'd first to discover them; but remembring what Command his R. H. had given, he gave notice of them only by a whisper to Sir John Cox, who stood then next to him: But scarce had Sir John call'd for an Officer to give him orders therupon, but a great shot struck him dead, and at the same time carried off the head of one M^r. Bell a Volunteer. Sir Edward then address'd himself to the Duke, who forthwith gave such directions that the Fire ship which came on first was quickly dispatch'd, and the other render'd useless for that bout.

T O M E II.

1672. commanded by Banker, has to do with the French.

The Duke's Orders before the Fight.

The Fight begins about 8 in y^e morning, the Dutch have y^e wind.

De Ruyter, after exchanging broad-sides
with the Duke, sends two fire ships to bord him.

Sir Ed. Scot, the first that discovers the fire ships coming, and advertises.

S^r. Jo. Cox slain.

By the Duke's directions the 2 fire ships are quickly dis-patch'd.

T O M E

II.

1672.
The Duke first Ship the PRINCE so disabled that he's oblig'd to leave her.

He go's aboard
the S^t. MICHEL.

The Duke was all this while, with the few Ships that were with him, so plyd by De Ruyter and his seconds, that his Ship, the PRINCE, had before eleven of the clock her main-top-mast shot by the bord, her fore top Sayl, her Starbord main shrowds, and all the rest of her Rigging and fighting sails shot and torn to peices, and above two hundred of her men kill'd and wounded ; So that his R. H. finding his Ship unable to work any longer, was forced to leave her, after having privatly order'd his Captain to tow out of the Line and endeavour to refitt, or at least save her from the Enemies fire ships ; And to avoid noise and surprise, he went down between decks, as it were to order something there, and then slipping in to his Boat, he took with him only the Lord Feversham, M^r. Henry Savil, M^r. Ashton, Dupuy, and his cheif Pilot ; His Shaloupe brought him to the S^t MICHEL, a Second Rate, Sir Robert Holmes Commander, that was on head of him somewhat to Leeward, and for that reason had not then been much damaged.

As soon as he was there got on bord, he put up his Flag that he carried with him, but there not being wind enough to spread it, he was fain to send his Boat to give notice to the Ship next him, where he was.

The French standing away to the Southward, are not press'd by the Zeland Squadron as they might have been.

Whilst matters pass'd thus where the Duke in person was, the French, as I have already said, stood away to the Southward as close haled as they could ; but they were not at all press'd by Banker and his Zeland Squadron as they might have been ; for he hardly came neerer to them then half Cañon-Shot, which did not a litle diminish the reputation the Zelanders had gain'd in the two former wars, of being the briskest men amongst the Dutch ; so that neither of those two Squadrons were much endamaged : But it was not so with the Red, and the Blew, for they were press'd very hard by De Ruyter, and Van Ghent with their Squadrons ; And that which imbolden'd the Enemy the more, was, that there was not above twenty of the Red and the Blew upon a Line that bore the first brunt of the two above mention'd Squadrons, the rest of our Ships not being able to get into the Line till the afternoon.

T O M E
II.

1672.

As soon as the Duke was on bord of the S^t MICHEL, he was obliged to tack by reason of a Sand thwart of Laistoff, and stood to the Southward as neer as he could ly; And by that means he wether'd De Ruyter and most of his Squadron, but had the Amsterdam Squadron still to windward of him, which had been obliged to tack for the same reason: So that now the Duke had them on both sides of him, and was forced to lead for some time those of his division, that could get into his wake and tack after him, which were not many; And the rest tack'd Leeward of De Ruyter, so that the Enemy and we were much mingled together.

The Duke between two Lines of y^e Dutch, and forced to lead the few Ships of his Division that were with him.

Soon after that Duke had stood to the Southward, a gentle gale sprung up at East, and being got clear of the Smoke he could look a litle about him. The first thing he saw was the Earle of Sandwiche's Blew Flag some distance on head of him, appearing above smoke, which was so great about that place that one could not see any hulls. Whilst the Red was engaged with the Ruyter and his Squadron, The Earle of Sandwiche's Division was no less hotly engag'd with the Squadron of Van Ghent, who with his Ship brought to on the broadside of the Earle; whilst at the same time Captain Brakell, a bold hot headed Dutchman in a Ship of Seventy Guns, layd him on bord thwart the hause, by which means raking him for and aft, they together destroyd him a world of his men; which obliged the Earle (that he might be rid of so troublesom a neighbour) to order his men to enter Brakell's Ship, which they did with their swords, halfpikes, and pistols, and after some resistance they master'd her. Thō this gave the Earle some ease, yet Van Ghent and his Seconds so plyd his Ship the ROYALL JAMES, and had slain and disabled so many of his men, that he was

The Duke discovers the E. of Sandwiche's Ship on Fire.

The particulars of the E. of Sandwiche's engagement with Van Ghent and Brakell, and how his ship the R. JAMES was burnt.

T O M E

II.

1672.

obliged to recall those who had master'd and were in possession of Brakell's Ship ; and then having sent to take the advice of his Captain, C. Haddoc an experienced Commander (who had been shot throu' the foot with a musket bullet and was then dressing in the Hold) by his advice he came to an Anchor by one fix'd for such accidents out of the Gun-room, which had the desired effect of being clear'd of Brakell's Ship, but prov'd in part the loss of the ROYALL JAMES ; for besides that she was at the very beginning of the Ingagement somewhat to windward of her own Division, so by coming then to an Anchor, they drove farther from her, and the Enemy came nearer to her.

Van Ghent Slain.

About this time Van Ghent was slain by one of her shot, but that did not hinder the Enemy from still pressing her very hard ; and they sent a fire ship upon her, which she sunk before she could reach her. The Earle was then no longer at an Anchor, for soon after he was got clear of Brakell's Ship, he cut the Cable that was out his Gun room, after which, when he had almost got clear off from amongst the Dutch, another fire ship came upon him, which he endeavour'd to bear up ; but his Ship was so disabled, that she could not do it, and so the fire ship layd her on bord to windward on her larbord side, and burnt her.

The Duke Saw
the R. JAMES blown up, but being to Leeward could not help it.

This the Duke beheld with Sorrow, but could not help, he being to the Leeward of her, thō he past close by her and saw the Sea all cover'd with her men, some sinking, some swimming, and others buoying themselves up upon what they could next catch hold of.

He orders the DARTMOUTH to ly by, and save all the men she could of the R.
JAMES.

Hereupon he order'd the DARTMOUTH, which was just come up to him, to ly by, and save all she possibly could ; So that she and some of the boats of the Line which followed the Duke, made a shift to pick up two or three hunderd, of which number were Captain Haddoc, Lieutenant Majo, the master Carpenter,

Cap. Haddoc, Lieut. Majo,

and one Lowd a Servant of the Earle of Sandwich, whom the King made Page of the Bedchamber so soon as he came to London. The Earle his Master had not the same good fortune, for being drown'd, his body was afterwards taken up, and honorably burried in Henry the Seventh's Chappell.

Soon after this the PHENIX a small fourth Rate, Capⁿ. le Neve Commander, and not long after him the RESOLUTION a third Rate, Capⁿ Berry Commander, and the CAMBRIDGE also the third Rate, Sir Fretchevill Hollis Commander, got on head of the Duke very Seasonably; for the St MICHEL (where he then was) was between the two Lines of the Dutch, and had received so many shott between wind and water, that the water she made hinder'd her sailing; which the Duke perceiving sent down a Lieutenant, who brought him word, She had five foot water in Hold; yet by the care and diligence of the proper Officers, her leakes were soon stopt and she sufficiently clear'd of the water, without lying by, or forbearing to ply the Guns.

About this time, Van Ghent's Squadron of Amsterdam bore down nearer the Duke, as if they design'd more closely to press him, But on the sudden they brought to again, and contented themselves with plying him very hard with their great guns; the reason of this was (as the Duke was afterwards inform'd) that the Captain, who then Commanded Van Ghent's Ship, was kill'd at the time when this was doing, and that he who commanded after him, had not the resolution to do what the other design'd. Soon after this, Van Nesse the elder, who carryd a Flag in the main top, being to Leeward of the Duke, after he had tack'd and cut between De Ruyter's and the Amsterdam's Squadrons, he stretched out on head with some of De Ruyter's Squadron, and tack'd again and stood stem-lings with the Duke, designing to wether him, and bring up some fire ships he had with him; But when the STAVERN, one of his Seconds which led him, had got up with the broadside

TOME II.

1672.

and one Lowd sav'd, but the E. of Sandwich himself was drown'd.

The PHENIX, the RESOLUTION, and the CAMBRIDGE, come very Seasonably on head of the Duke.

The Duke's ship the St. MICHEL so leaky, that she had 5 foot water in Hold.

Van Ghent's Squadron bear down upon the Duke.

Van Nesse the elder strives to wether the Duke and bring up some fire ships to attack him, but his heart fails him in the execution.

TOME II. of the Duke, Van Nesse's heart fail'd him, and in stead of following his Ship on head of him, which was a ship of fifty odd guns, commanded by Captain Elzevire, he tack'd, and stood a way with his fire ships after him, and left the STAVERN behind him ; which was so disabled by the broadside she receiv'd from the St. MICHEL, and the rest of the Ships which followed the Duke, that she yeilded to the GREENWICH a fourth Rate, Captain Green Commander.

The Duke's Ship within musket shot of the Dutch, powers her broadside into their V. Ad^l second, and raksher to and oft.

By this time the St MICHEL had again so much water in Hold, that she made Leeward way, so that the Dutch being also to Leeward of her, she at last came to be within musket-shot of them ; and as she pass'd by the first great Ship which was the Dutch Vice Admiral's second, some that were foreward on, cryd out, To forbear firing at her, for that she had struck : But the Duke quickly perceived by her working, that it was a mistake, and that the Enseigne suppos'd to have struck, was indeed shott down ; wherfore the Duke order'd his broadside to be powr'd into her, which raked her fore and oft.

Now also Sir Edward Spragge with some of his Division was got on head of the Duke, when at the same time the Earle of Ossory in the VICTORY, who till then had kept in his Station a Stern of the Duke, was so disabled, that he was forced to bear away to refitt ; Into whose place came Captain George Legge in the FAIRFAX, a third Rate. It being then above five in the afternoon, Sir Rob: Holmes gave the Duke an account, that his Ship the St. MICHEL, was no longer able to continue in the Line, for besides her loss of men, which had been great, and the bad condition her sails, masts, and rigging were in, she had so much water in Hold, that if she did not very soon ly by, to stop the leakes, they should not be able to keep her above water ; wherupon the Duke resolv'd to go on bord Sir Edward Spragge in the LONDON, and at the same time order'd Sir Robert Holmes, not to strike the Standard, nor

The Duke's 2^d ship no longer able to continue in the Line.

He resolves to go on bord the LONDON, his Orders therupon.

bear away out of the Line, till he saw the Standard flying on board the LONDON, least the disappearing of it for any time, should discourage his own Fleet, which prov'd to be a necessary caution; for thō the Shaloup which carried him to the LONDON was a very good rower and had a good Crew, he was neer three quarters of an hour before he could reach the LONDON, she having got by the freshening of the gale so far on head of the S^t MICHEL.

When the Duke came on board the LONDON, he found her also much disabled, especially in her head sails; having had to deal with the Ship of Van Nesse the younger, a Rear Admiral, who was to windward of her, so that he swag'd apace down upon us. But at this time, it being now seven in the evening, De Ruyter made a signal for all his Ships that were to windward of him, to bear down to him, and he himself bore away to joyn the Zeland Squadron, which was to Leeward of him, and was still engaged with the French; In doing of which De Ruyter bore down upon the RAINBOW, an old Second Rate, Captain Story Commander, (she was only of fifty six guns thō of three Decks) thinking she would give way to him; but seeing the sturdy Captain would not, De Ruyter brought to, and stood out on head of him, not thinking it safe for him to lay him on board, there being of our Ships both to windward and to Leeward of him, and so he sheer'd away to joyn the Zelanders. This motion of the Dutch Fleet gave Sir John Jordan with the five or six Ships with him an opportunity to joyn the Duke, he having been to windward of him almost from the beginning of the Engagement: So that now the Duke had with him about five and twenty or thirty men of war, and some fire ships to windward of the Enemy. The rest of his Fleet bore away as De Ruyter did, and joyn'd the French, and so were to Leeward of the Dutch But the 1672.

T O M E
II.

The Duke expos'd near an hour in his Shaloup, before he could reach the LONDON his 3^d ship.

At 7 in the evening, De Ruyter bears away with all his Ships, to joyn the Zealand Squadron.

Capⁿ Story in the RAINBOW obliges De Ruyter to bring to, and stand out on head of him.

S^t Jo: Jordan
joyns the Duke, who has now 25 or 30 Ships to windward of the Enemy at sun set.

The rest of the Fleet, having joyn'd the

T O M E Duke judg'd it best to keep as he was, just to windward of the
.II. Enemy, who by that time were all got together.

1672.
 French, were to Leeward of the Dutch.

This was the posture of both Fleets just after Sun Set. And thus ended this memorable day, in which the Dutch, with all the advantage they could desire, of surprise, of wind, and of number of Ships that engaged, were far from Victory over the English; as their being the first to leave the Sea, and retreat into their harbours, will hereafter more fully appear.

But before we proceed to what followed the next day, (May 29th) we cannot pass by some remarkable actions not yet mention'd in this day's Engagement, without being unjust to English Valour. We have already taken notice, that the Dutch with great odds of number made their cheif effort upon that Division of ours where the Duke was in person; wherby not only his own Ship but his seconds, that were neer him, had the greatest share of the Enemies fire. Thus it was that when De Ruyter press'd so hard upon the Duke in the PRINCE, some of his Squadron a stern of him attack'd no less warmly Sir John Chicheley in the ROYALL CATHERINE, a large second Rate, who was somewhat to windward of the PRINCE, his wake, and was endeavouring to get in to his station, which was to be a stern of the Lord Ossory in the VICTORY, one of the Duke's Seconds, then just a stern of the Duke; But the ROYALL CATHERINE ply'd not her guns so fast as she ought, which was the master Guner's fault, in not having order'd his stores as he should have done; so that all under his charge was in disorder; and Sir John himself, being newly come from the Straights in the DREADNOUGHT a third Rate, went on bord the ROYALL CATHERINE only the day before the Engagement, and so had not leisure to examine and redress what was amiss. The slack fire made by the ROYALL CATHERINE imbolden'd the Enemy to press her the more, and to send some of their fire ships on

Sr Jo. Chichelys Ship the R.
 CATHERINE taken by the Dutch, but releas'd again by a brave action of her own men.

bord her, the two first of which were put off by fire booms, but two more clapping her on bord, and one thwart her hause, the Seamen struck their Enseign against the Captain's order, and yeelded; wherupon the Dutch sent their boats on bord her, and carryd of Sir John with his Lieu^t., and severall of the men, and stow'd the rest in hold, all but the Master Gunner, the Carpenter, and Boat-swain; and they left one of their Lieutenants with a sufficient number of men to carry off the Ship. The Dutch left in the Ship, minding more the plundering of her then their other busines, did not keep her up so close to the Ships which had taken her, as they ought; so that at last, the Dutch Lieutenant having received orders to take out the men and fire the Ship, when he went to put them in execution, the Master Gunner, the Carpenter, and the Boat-swain, who had been left above deck, consulted together, and resolved as their men came up the hatches, to call to them to stand by them, and fall upon the Dutch, which they did, laying hand on hand-pikes, Iron-crous, and other trade on the deck, and soon overpowering the Dutch made them prisoners, and became again masters of the Ship. Hereupon Sir Edward Spragge who was in his station a Stern of the Duke, and had seen all that happen'd to the R. CATHERINE, but being to leeward of her could not help her, Sent his orders to those who had retaken her, to sail for the River, she not being in a condition to do any further Service that day.

Two of the Dutch fire Ships clapp'd also on bord the Edgar a third Rate of Seventy guns, but Captain Wetwang who commanded her So bestirr'd himself, that altho his main-sail was in fire, and that near eighty of his men leapt over bord, he at last clear'd himself of them.

Captain Francis Digby second Son to the Earle of Bristol who was Captain of the HENRY a second Rate, had six fire Ships that came on bord of him one after another; five of

TOME
II.

1672.

Capⁿ. Wetwang in the Edgar, clears himself of 2 fire ships, after his main Sail was on fire, and 80 of his men leapt over bord.

The HENRY, Capⁿ. Digby Commander, after having put off 6 fire

TOME
II.

1678. ships, the Capⁿ.
and Lieu^t.
kill'd, is borded by a Dutch Ship of 70 Guns, but releas'd again
by the bravery of her own men and y^e Seasonable coming of S. Rog: Strickland to her relief.

which he put off, and as he had his hand on a fire boom to clear himself of the Sixth, he was shot dead with a small shot. Notwithstanding which that fire ship was also put off. Soon after which his first Lieutenant was kill'd, as was also Captain Bennet of the Duke's Regiment, together with his Enseign, whose Company was on bord that Ship: Hereupon a Dutchman of Seventy guns, seeing the Ship much disabled, and few men left on the Quarter deck and in the Wasts, borded her, and entering his men made himself master of all the Vpperdeck, with the Fore castle and great Cabine; But the remainder of the HENRY's men kept the lower Gun-deck, and Gun-room, and continued still plying their Guns; all which being observ'd by Sir Roger Strickland, who commanded the PLIMOUTH a small third Rate, he made sail to come to her releif: which the master of the HENRY perceiving (who had still continued on his post on the quarter Deck, either no minded by the Dutch who fell a plundering in the great Cabine, or perhaps taken by them for one of their own men, he being a fair hair'd burly man,) gave the word to the man at helm to bear up, which being done the HENRY gave the Dutch Ship such a jostle with her quarter, that she therby got clear of her; and Sir Roger coming up a moment after, gave the Dutchman Such a broad-side, as obliged him to bear away, and leave his Lieutenant and men aboard the HENRY to the mercy of those they thought to have master'd.

The night imploy'd on both sides to refitt
the Ships.

But to return where we left the Fleet at Sun set: The night provd fair with litle wind, which both sides imploy'd in refitting their Ships, it being the Duke's intention to renew the Fight next morning. In the beginning of the night was seen from on bord the Duke, a great Ship on fire amongst the Dutch, which was fear'd might have been one of our disabled Ships that had fallen into their hands when they bore down to joyn the Zelanders; but it prov'd to be a great Ship of their own, which was so disabled that after having taken out their men they Set her on fire.

TOME
II.

1672.

The next morning, being the 29th of May, at day-break the Duke found himself with the Ships already mention'd some half a league to windward of the Dutch, the wind continuing still a gentle gale Easterly, and the wether clear. At the rising of the Sun he could see none of the rest of his own Fleet, being windward of them, till towards nine of the clock, at which time he began to discover them to Leeward and somewhat a stern of the Dutch: upon which he bore down towards them, passing by the Enemy, who kept on their course without endeavouring to interpose or hinder his joyning his own Fleet, which he did before eleven at noon; and then went on bord his own Ship the PRINCE, which Captain Narborow had refitted and put in a condition to engage again, having recruited her with the Crews of the two fireships, of which the one had been sunk and the other fir'd in the Engagement the day before. He then lay by, and made his signal to call all his Flag Officers on bord him, that he might have an account of the condition their Ships were in. Whilst this was doing, the Dutch continuing their Course to the Southward were got quite out of sight, and the Duke finding, that besides the loss of the ROYALL JAMES, some of his great Ships both first and second Rates, as the CHARLES THE 2^d, the S^t MICHEL, besides those already gone, were so disabled that they also must be sent to Sheerness to follow the rest, which were the VICTORY, the HENRY, and the ROYALL CATHERINE, third Rates, The FAIRFAX, the DUNKIRK, the YORK, fourth Rates, and the GREENWICH commanded by Captain Green, who carryd the STAVERN along with him without order, for which he was casheer'd; and finding also, by the account given him, that very many of those who were in a condition to engage, had spent most of their ammunition, it was resolved by the unanimous

The Duke having joynd next morning the rest of his Fleet, he returns to his r^l ship the PRINCE now refitted.

The Duke calls a general Council of his Flag Officers, in which it was resolv'd the Fleet should return to be refitted.

TOME

II.

1672.

The Dutch out of a bravade follow the English, wherupon the Duke turns upon them again, and pursues them to their own Coast.

consent of the Flagmen then present to make the best of their way to refitt at Sheerness, In order to which all the above Officers return'd on bord their respective Ships, to wait for the signal of the Admiral.

But Scarce were they got on bord, when from the Admiral's poop the Enemy's Fleet was seen standing after us, upon which the Duke thought it not fitt to pursue what had been resolved on, but, in stead thereof, to clap on a wind and stand with the Enemy, and accordingly he made the Signal for the Fleet to put itself into the order of Battel, which was accordingly done; having first order'd all the disabled Ships to make for the Nore and Sheerness, except two of them, the S^t MICHEL and the FAIRFAX, which made a Shift to stay thō very leaky, and in an ill condition. The Count d'Estreés with the French had the Van; The Blew then commanded by Sir Joseph Jordan the Vice Admiral, and Sir John Kempthorn Rere-Admiral, had the Rere. Sir John Harman who had sent his Ship away with the rest of the disabled ones, came himself on bord the Duke, who order'd him to go on bord the CAMBRIDGE, whose Commander, Sir Fretcheville Hollis, had been slain the day before, and there to put up his Flag of Rere Admiral of the Red.

In this good order the English Fleet stood with the Dutch, having the wind of them; but by that time that our Van had got the length of the Middle of the Dutch Line, De Ruyter made his signal to his Van for his whole Fleet to tack at once, which they did standing away close haled for their own Coast. Which the Duke seeing, made his signal to his Van to make what sail they could, his whole Line doing the same, edging down towards the Enemy; and as soon he saw Mons'. du Quesne with his Flag in the fore top, who led the French, got on the broadside of the headmost of the Enemy, it being then about two in the afternoon, he made the signal for engaging and bore down upon the Dutch, we being then not above half cañon shot to windward of them: But they seeing the Duke thus in earnest, in stead of receiving him, or making a regular retreat, they made all the sail they could, without staying to secure their disabled Ships, of which the Duke told above fifteen in their Rere, and had all the reason in the world to beleieve he should be soon master of them; but it pleas'd God to order it otherwise, For at that very moment whilst things were in this condition, from a clear sun-shiny day there fell all of a sudden so thick a Fog, that no body could see the length of the Ship before him. The Duke Seeing it coming, took in the signal (which was a Red Flag on the fore top mast head) and brought to, and kept his Luf as close as he could, that during the Fog the Dutch might not get to windward of him. The Fog lasted above an houre, and when it clear'd up, we were above cañon shot to windward of them, and the wind being then about Northwest, the Duke let fly again the bloody Flag (as the Sailers call it) and bore down once more to engage them, But before he could begin with them, the gale freshen'd so, that he could not carry out his lower Tyre; Wherupon he took in the bloody Flag, and kept to windward of the Dutch who steer'd their course to the Weelings. About nine or ten at night, the wether blowing still very fresh, his R.H. tack'd, having reason to fear that he might otherwise fall in with the Bancks of Flanders; he stood off therfore close haled till midnight, then tack'd again, and made after the Enemy till ten next morning, 30th of May. But then getting no sight of them, and judging that by that time they have shelter'd themselves within their Sands, whither it was not advisable to follow them, he in fine found it requisite to tack about, and make (as he did) the best of his way for the Buoy of the Nore, in order to refitt; hoping with reason, that he should be the first out at Sea again, as he was the last that kept it.

The Dutch
Sav'd by a Fog.

The Duke again prevented from engaging by foul wether.

The Duke still pursues the Dutch, but they getting within their Banks, he returns to the Buoy of the Nore to refitt.

It was about the end of June before the Fleet was refitted.

The King comes down

TOME
II

1672. to the Buoy of the Nore, to consult with the Duke what was further to be done.

The Duke proposes sailing to y^e Weelings, to fight De Ruyter
there.

His reasons against Shaftburys proposal of going to intercept the Dutch East India Fleet.

The Duke's reasons overruled by the King and his Cabinet Council.

The Duke go's to Sea again,

Some days before they sail'd, the King came down to the Buoy of the Nore with some of the Committee of foreign affaires, of which number were the Earle of Shaftsbury, and Lord Clifford, to consult with the Duke and his Flag Officers, and to take his last Resolutions about what was to be undertaken for the rest of the Season: The Duke propos'd, the sailing straight to the Weelings, where De Ruyter then lay with the Dutch Fleet, to fight him, or oblige him to go in. The Earle of Shaftsbury and some others that came down with the King, perswaded his Majesty, that it would be more for his service to endeavour the intercepting of the Dutch East India Fleet, of which they had intelligence that they were daily expected home by the North of Scotland; That should our Fleet go to look after De Ruyter to engage him, those Ships in the mean time which were very rich, might get into the Vly or Texel: To which the Duke and other of the Flag-Officers replyd, That the surest way to be Masters of their East India Fleet, would be first to beat or drive into their harbours De Ruyter's Fleet, which they had reason to beleieve were not in a condition to stand us; That whilst their Fleet of men of war was intire and out at Sea, it would be dangerous so to spread our Ships, as would be requisite to intercept the East India men, least the Enemy should come upon us on the sudden, and finding us so Scatter'd, might destroy our Ships before we could joyn into any order of battel; Nor was it to be doubted, that De Ruyter, either by their Privateers, their Advice-boats, or Fishermen, would be advertis'd from time to time of our Stations, and how we lay: But these reasons of the Duke and the Sea Officers were overruled by the King and his Cabinet Councill; and his R. H. was order'd to go and cruise in the most convenient and likely station to meet with their India Fleet.

In pursuance of this order, the Duke sail'd from the Buoy of the Nore the of July, and cruised between the Vly and the Texel, so as only just to see the land from the top mast head; but bad wether coming on he was obliged to come to an anchor, and so to continue for a whole fortnight with his yards and topmasts down. When the bad wether was over, it was judged most convenient to go and cruise on the Soundings of the Doggar bank towards the East of it; for the greater conveniency of coming to an anchor when it should blow, there being less water in that side then to the Southward or Northward of it, and consequently better riding at anchor there: And it happen'd well that he did so, for by that means he kept the Fleet together during all the time he continued in that station, thō there was never four and twenty hours together of fair wether all that time; But that did not hinder his having Cruisers abroad the whole time, some of which as the CAMBRIDGE, and another Fregate, met with the Dutch East India Fleet, one of which was boarded by the CAMBRIDGE; but the Sea went so high, she could not master her, being obliged to sheer of, and the storm encreasing, they could neither keep company with the Dutch, nor advertise our Fleet time enough; and so they got by and put into the Ems.

Vpon this intelligence the Duke stood over to the Coast of England, and came to an anchor near Burlington bay about the of August, where he put a shore about three thousand sick men, most of the Scurvy, which they contracted by reason of the bad wether, which obliged us to have our ports shut and calk'd, which did so heat the lower decks and so stifle the men, as to cause that distemper; Most of these did recover, but not soon enough to get on bord their respective Ships before the Fleet sail'd, so that some of great Ships, especially the SOVERAINE, had harly hands enough to get up their Anchors. After having taken in water and refretchments from shore, the Fleet weigh'd, and made the best of their way for the back of 1672. and cruises between the Vly and the Texel, to watch for the East India Fleet.

TOME II

The Duke changes station, and cruises towards the Doggar bank.

The CAM-BRIDGE, one of the Duke's Cruisers, boards
a Dutch E.
India man, but it blew so hard,
he could not master her, and the Storm increasing the whole Fleet got by before the Duke could be advertis'd.

The Dutch Fleet having got into the Ems, The Duke returns to the Engl: Coast, and in Burlington Bay he puts a shore about 3000 sick men.

After having refresh'd at Burlington Bay, the Duke

TOME
II.

1672. returns to the Buoy of the Nore.

The King comes to the Buoy of y^e Nore.

P^r Rupert, and Shaftsburie urge the King that the Fleet should go out again and fight
De Ruyter.

Yarmouth Sands, and came to an Anchor off of Lastoff about the beginning of September. Here the Duke had notice that some two days before, De Ruyter with his Fleet had appear'd in sight of that place, and was sayl'd back to the Weelings; wherupon it was judged convenient for the English Fleet, that had suffer'd much by the bad wether, to go to the Buoy of the Nore, the Season of the year being too far advanced to keep out the great Ships any longer in those Seas.

Some few days after the Duke was arrived with the body of the Fleet at the Buoy of the Nore, the King came down accompanied by Prince Rupert and Earle of Shaftsbury with some others of the Cabinet Councill to See the Duke, and informe himself of the condition of the Fleet. Those two Lords above nam'd had propos'd and very much urged to his Ma^{ty}, without the privy of the Duke, That the Fleet in the condition it was in, should go out again, and fight De Ruyter in the Weelings where he then lay. Notice of this was given to the Duke by a privat freind, and that the King seem'd to enter into it; At the same time his R. H. observ'd that those two Lords were very busy in taking aside and whispering to some of the Flag-Officers; Of all which the Duke seem'd to take no notice, but let them go on in their own way till the proper time came of speaking. And when that evening, being the 16 of September, his Ma^{ty} order'd the Duke to appoint the Flag-men that they should attend him the next morning to consider farther what was to be done, his R. H. desir'd that some of the old Commanders of the Navy might also be appointed to attend, they having as much or more experience then the Flag-men: This was accordingly done, and when they were met, the King order'd the Duke to propose to them the going over for the Coast of Holland to look out for the Dutch Fleet to fight them or drive them into their ports, and that they should give his Ma^{ty} their thoughts upon it; which they all did one after another in their ranks, the youngest beginning first, and at last the Duke deliver'd his own sense of it, which agreed with theirs, That the Season being so far advanced, it was by no means advisable to venture out the great Ships on the Coast of Holland, where if a Storm at West or Northwest should take them, they would run great risk of being lost, both men and Ships. In confirmation of this, Sir Jeremy Smith averr'd that in the Dutch war in Cromwell's time, near upon twenty Dutch men of war had been cast away in one night on that Coast. Captain Gunman, second Captain to the Duke, declared, He would not take care (charge) of his Ship, if they went over on that Coast; Capⁿ Sanders the Master said the same, but that they would both go along as Volonteers; These two were the boldest and ablest Pilotes in England for those Northern Seas. The King who had a good understanding in Sea Affaires, was hereby convinced of the unreasonableness and danger of the proposall, thō Prince Rupert and Lord Shaftsbury would not recede from their first opinion; which his Ma^{ty} overruled, and order'd the great Ships should go out no more that year, but be sent to Chatam and their respective yards to be refitted against next year. And so ended this Summer Campagne at Sea.

T O M E
II.

1672.
The Duke's reasons against venturing out the Fleet any more that year, confirm'd by all the Experienced Sea Officers; whereupon the King orders the great Ships to be layd up. And so this Campagne ended.

Soon after the Duke's coming back to Court, the great Seal was taken from Sir Orlando Bridgman and given to the Earle of Shaftsbury, with the Title of Lord Chancellor of England. This alteration drew on another, for that Earle was one of the Commissioners of the Treasury, which place was now to be fill'd in case the King intended the Treasury should continue in Commission: But the Duke thought that his Ma^{ty} was inclin'd to have a Lord Treasurer; And therefore he desir'd the Lord Arlington to joyn with him in proposing to the King the Lord Clifford for that considerable Imployment: But he found Lord Arlington very cold in it, who endeavour'd to perswade

After the Duke's return from this year's Sea Campagne, E. Shaftsbury is made Chancellor.

TOME him, that the King had then no inclination to alter the way
II. the Treasury was in; and the next day that Lord employd a 1672. freind of his to press the Duke that he would endeavour to get Sir Robert Car to be Commissioner in Lord Shaftsbury's room.

L^d Clifford made Treasurer at the Duke's recommendation.
 E. Arlington discontented.

Some few days after, the Duke himself propos'd to his Majesty the Lord Clifford Treasurer, which proposall was well received by him, in so much that he said he would do it, as thinking no body fitter for it; he also told the Duke, That Lord Arlington had a mind to have that Staf, but he answer'd him, that he had too much kindnes for him to let him have it, for he knew he was not fitt for that Office, and that should he give it him, it would be his ruine and expose him to the malice of his enemies. A litle while after this, the King told the Duke, That he found Lord Arlington was angry with Lord Clifford upon his knowing that the Lord Clifford was to have the place; And he desir'd the Duke to perswade L^d Arlington, not to let the world see his discontent upon that occasion, and to endeavour to make them continue freinds; In obedience wherunto the Duke speake with them both, and they promis'd to live freindly together as formerly: But L^d Arlington kept not his word, but was ever after cold, if not worse, towards him.

The King desires Lord Clifford, and Lord Arundel, to perswade
 the Duke to receive the Sacrament with him, in the Church of England.

Christmas now coming on, the King spak to Lord Clifford and Lord Arundel of Warder, to perswade the Duke to receive the Sacrament with him at that time (which his R. H. had forborn to do for Severall months before thō he continued going to Church with the King) and that they should make his Brother Sensible of the prejudice it would do to both of them, should he forbear So to do, by giving the world So much reason to beleeeve he was a Catholick, and to that purpose he us'd many arguments: to which they answer'd, That they beleeeved it would be a hard matter for any body to prevaile with the Duke in so tender a point of Conscience; and that could they prevaile with him, it would signify Very litle, as to the making

The two Lord's Answer.

the world alter the opinion they had of his being what he really was, and instead of doing any good, it would make them have an ill opinion of his Christianity, by receiving in one Church and being of another, which would make him dispised by all good men : These and other arguments they us'd, with which the King seem'd to be Satisfied for that time, and so did not press them any further in that matter ; but upon the day before Christmas Eve, the King spake again to the L^d Clifford, desiring him to represente to the Duke what he had said before to him and his freind concerning the necessity of his receiving the Sacrament with the King ; which the Lord Clifford did, but found the Duke not be mov'd in his resolution of not going against his Conscience.

T O M E
II.

1672.

THE suspicion of the Duke's having changed his Religion, which his Enemies were not slow in spreading about, gave them but too fair an opportunity of Venting with succes their malice against him, which hitherto had prov'd ineffectuall; for by this means they got him at last out of all his commands, and out of all busines, by procuring, (March 29th) under the pretence of securing the Protestant Religion, the forme of a TEST or Declaration to be passed in Parliament, such as no Roman Catholick in conscience could take or make ; and it was further inacted, That no person whatsoever should be capable of any Employment Civil or Military, that did not take or make the said TEST, or Declaration. They also encouraged under hand the Duke of Monmouth to pretend to be legitimate, and consequently right Heir of the Crown, who of himself was ambitious and weak enough to give into their snare : But of this there will be occasion to speak more hereafter.

1673.
The Duke's Enemies get him at last out of all his Commands, by procuring The TEST to be pass'd in Parliament.

The Duke's Enemies also encourage the D. of Monmouth to pretend to be legitimate.

The Duke being disabled, by the above mention'd TEST from executing his Office of High Admiral of England, the Command

P^r Rupert
comands the Fleet in this Summer's Expedition.

T O M E
II.

1673.

L^d Clifford lays down his place of Treasurer, upon y^e account of y^e TEST; and E. Danby, at the Duke's and L^d Clifford's recommendation, is made Treasurer.

E. Peterborow is sent first to Neubourgh and then to Modena, to find a wife for the Duke.

of the Fleet in this Summer's Expedition was put into the hands of Prince Rupert, in which there past severall * Engagements between the two Fleets, without any considerable loss or advantage on either side; and what there was of advantage was on the Sight of the English: After which, the Parliament of England was wholly bent for a Peace with the Dutch, which was at last concluded at London the winter following.

This new TEST had also the same effect upon the Lord Clifford, in ouing him (June 19th) of the place of Lord Treasurer of England, and of being any longer a Privy Councillor; who, thō a new Convert, generously preferr'd his conscience to his interests. Upon his laying down his Staff of Lord Treasurer, it was given to Sir Thomas Osborne, newly created Earle of Danby, at the recommendation of the Duke, and also of the Lord Clifford who judged him the fittest person for it, as having given proofs of his capacity and diligence when he executed the office of Treasurer of the Navy. But this kindness of the Duke towards him, was ill requited on his part, as will hereafter be seen.

The King being now sensible of the necessity there was, of his R. H. being married out of hand, order'd the Earle of Peterborow, (lately imployd in the Treaty for the Princess of Inspruck, which broke off upon the death of the Empress, and his Imperiall Majesty's resolving to marry her himself) to go incognito first to the Court of Neubourgh, and next to that of Modena, to see what Princess he could find that might be a fitt wife for his Brother; And he not finding any to his liking at Neubourg, pass'd on to Modena, where having seen the Princess of Este, and judging that a better choice could not be made then of her person, he presently gave an account of it to the King and the Duke: Whereupon he was Commission'd by the King to demand that * May 28th near Schonevelt, June 4th off Flushing, August 11th off the Dutch coasts. — EDITOR.

Princess of her Mother (who was then Regent, her Son the Duke being under age) in marriage for his Brother. It was with no little difficulty that the young Princess consented to it, she being then but fifteen years old, and so innocently bred, that till then she had never heard of such a place as England, nor of such a person as the Duke of York. Besides she at that time had a great inclination to be a Nun, in so much that the Dutchess her Mother was obliged to get the Pope to write to her, and perswade her to comply with her Mother's desires, as most conducing to the Service of God and the publick good. With much difficulty his Holiness and her Highness prevail'd upon the Princess, and the Earle of Peterborow therupon made his publick Entry at Modena, as Embassador Extraordinary from the King; and after having agreed all the Articles of marriage, upon the 30th of September N.S. he married her, by Proxy for the Duke his Master.

The noise of this Match coming to the ears of the House of Commons, who at time were mightily heated against that which they call'd Popery, as they usually are when discontented with the Government, enter'd into a hot Debate about it, and at last resolved upon an Address to the King to break the Match, because the Princess was a Roman Catholick, and that it was promoted by France. It is to be observ'd, that altho the meeting of this Parliament in October was only intended in order to their further adjournment or prorogation to January following, yet by the dexterity of My Lord Shaftsbury, who now (according to his usuall custome) had changed sides and was at the head of the factious Party, Tricks were found to delay the proroguing of the house, so to gain time enough for the violent Party in the house of Commons to pass the above mention'd address; which however had no effect upon the King to break the Match so far advanced, and in which his honour was so much engaged: Tho there wanted not at that time

T O M E
II.

1673.

The Pope oblig'd to write to the P^{re} d'Este, to perswad her to marry, as being most conducing to the Publick good and the Service of God. The Articles concluded, the E. Peterborow on the 30th Sep^r. marrys her by proxy for y^e Duke his Master.

The House of Comons allarm'd with this match with a Cath: Princess, petition the King to break it.

TOME

II.

1673.
L^d Arlington advises the King to stop the Dutchess
in France.

The Dutchess lands happily at Dover y^e 21 of Nov: and is there met by the Duke, and the marriage declar'd by Doctor Crew
B^p. of Oxford.

They arrive at Whitehall the 26 Nov.

The publick Chappell stipulated for the Dutchess by the articles of the marriage, is not allow'd her.

some Councillors, of which My Lord Arlington was one, who advised his Majesty to stop the Dutchess in France; which shamefull advice was rejected by his Ma^{ty}, who therupon prorogued the Parliament, whilst at the same time the Dutchess was upon her journey from Paris to Calais. This address of the house of Commons, thō it had not its intended effect of breaking the marriage, yet most of the Court were so frighted with it, that few or none of them accompanied the Duke down to Dover, when he went to meet his new Dutchess, who landed there upon the 21 of November, and none of the Bishops, but Doctor Crew Bishop of Oxford (afterwards Bishop of Durham) offer'd to attend his R. H. to perform the part of declaring the marriage, according to the usuall form in cases of the like nature; which the Bishop perform'd in the manner following: The Duke and Dutchess of York with the Dutchess of Modena her Mother, being together in a room where all the company was present, as was also My Lord Peterborow, the Bishop ask'd the Dutchess of Modena and the Earle of Peterborow, Whither the said Earle had married the Dutchess of York, as Proxy of the Duke? Which they both affirming, the Bishop then declar'd, it was a lawfull Marriage. After this their R. R. H. H. arrived at Whitehall the 26 of November, having been met by the King attended by the principall Nobility on the River.

This late address of the house of Commons had caus'd so great a fright at Whitehall, that even the King himself was not wholly exempt from it: for whereas it was stipulated in the Articles of marriage between the Duke and the Dutchess, that she should have a publick Chappell, and namely that of S^t James's, formerly built by the late Queen Mother, yet his Ma^{ty} was prevail'd upon by the Chancellors (Counsellors) then about him, not (to) suffer the Dutchess to make use of that publick Chappell, but only of a privat one they caus'd to be fitted up in the house ; and to give some coulour to this breack of Articles, they prevail'd with the Queen to claime a Right in the Chappell of St James's, she having formerly been possess'd of it, thō at that time she had no use for it, having her own at Sommersete house.

All these storms now rais'd, and which afterwards follow'd against the Duke in Parliament, bear their date, and had their origine from the suspicion they had of his being converted to the Catholick Faith, Nor could his privat Enemies till then gain any advantage of him. Before that time he was look'd upon as the darling of the Nation, for having so freely and so often ventur'd his life for the honour and interest of the King and Country, and for having been allways so active and industrious in carrying on every thing either as to Trade, or as to Navigation, that might tend to their advantage: But no sooner was the allarme given of his being turn'd Papist, when all these merites were blotted out of their memory, and he sett upon on every side as the common Enemy.

Many there were who at this time, under the pretence of freindship either reall or feinsed, counsell'd his R. H. to withdraw himself for a while from the King's presence and all publick busines ; Amongst the rest a certain noble Lord *, and he a Catholick, after many protestations of Zeal for his service, politickly advis'd him to write a letter from Dover to the King, and therin to desire his leave that for his own quiet, and to make his Ma^y more easy in his affaires with the Parliament, he might retire with his new Dutchess to Audly end, or some such place in the Country remote from publick busines, where he might hunt and pray without offence to any, or disquiet to himself. All these advisers the Duke thanked for their good meaning, but told them that he was quite of another opinion and resolution ; That untill his Ma^y should command him to the contrary, he would allways personally attend upon him, and do him what

The Duke look'd upon as the darling of the Nation, till they Suspect him to be a Catholick; from hence it was, that all his prosecutions took their rise.

Many of the Duke's freinds advise him to withdraw.

* Lord Barkshire.

The Duke's answer to these pretended freinds, who advised him to retire.

TOME

II.

1673.

service he could, to which both his duty and his honour obliged him, and wherein he thought both his own and the King's security were concerned; That if his Enemies had already made so bold with him when he was present and could speak for himself, what would they not do in his absence? That in that case less could hardly be expected from them than their setting on foot another address from the house of Commons, (an Engine which seldom fails of doing execution, and is allways at hand upon such occasions) to have him banish'd, and perhaps excluded from Succession to the Crown. These reasons at least Silenced the givers of this advice if they did not convince them.

The great Seal taken from the E. of Shaftsbury, and given to Sir Hen: Finch.

E. Shaftsbury's Charactere.

About the same time that the Duke was married, the great Seal was taken (Nov. 9th) from the Earle of Shaftsbury, and given to Sir Heneage Finch with the title of Lord Keeper. That Earle (who in all the Revolutions this Nation has undergone from the beginning of the Rebellion in the time of King Charles the first, was famous for turning from side to side and being still foremost in the severall turns of Government, thō never so contrary one to the other) had the great Seal in keeping not much above a year; in which time, none ever more boldly and warmly then he asserted the prerogative: He had the cheifest hand in his Majesties Declaration for Liberty of Conscience; It was he who promotted the second Dutch War, who, when the house of Commons was resty and would not grant Supplys sufficient to carry it on, advis'd the shutting up the Exchequer; and who, at the next meeting of the Parliament, in his speech to both houses, with Strong reasons maintain'd and justifyd all those proceedings, making use of that memorable Sayin, Delenda est Carthago: But when soon after, by the Clamour of the house of Commons, his Ma^{ty} was prevail'd upon to recall his Declaration for Indulgence, he seeing which way the stream would run, all on the sudden dextrously turn'd about, and clos'd in so intirely with the Republican Party, that of a high prerogative man, he became an outrageous Enemy even of the Crown it Self, and so continued to his death, as his future actions will more fully shew.

T O M E
II.

1673.

ABOUT this time (Feb. 9th) the Peace was concluded between his Majesty and the States Generall, which had been negociated ineffectually at Cologne; but by the interposition of the Marquis de Fresno the Spanish-Embassador here, who was arm'd with a plenipotentiary power from Holland, all the Articles werẽ mutually agreed, and the Peace proclaim'd in London, (Feb. 28th) as it was also at the Hague in the month of March. The House of Commons, who formerly were so eager for a War with the Hollanders, were now no less so for a Peace with him; and soon after they press the King with address upon address to enter into a War with France, whilst at the same time they were very slow and backward in giving sufficient Supplys to carry it on.

1674.
The Peace concluded between the English and the Dutch, in February.

The House of Commons press the King to enter into a War with France.

The Duke's Enemys having so far gain'd their point as to make him quitt all his Employments, still thought themselves not secure enough, unless they also remov'd him from the presence of the King, and even from his Succession to the Crown, least he should have too good a memory of their behaviour towards him. In order to the first, it was projected in their Cabals to have another TEST past in Parliament, more comprehensive then the former one, that should contain a renonciation of many other tenets in which the Catholicks differ from the Protestants, and that none should be suffer'd to come into the King's presence that did not take the said TEST, without the leave first obtain'd under the hand of six Privy Councillors. But when this new TEST was afterwards

The 2^d TEST contrived by the Duke's Enemys with design to get him removed from the King's presence.

T O M E

II.

1674.

The Duke's freinds get a Proviso added, of exception for his R. H. in the Bill for the SECOND TEST.

carryd by Vote in the House of Commons, (Oct. 30.) the Duke's freinds and the Loyall Party out of regard to the Blood Royall, had interest enough by a majority only of two Votes, to have a Proviso added of exception for the Duke's person, which put the litle Earle of Shaftsbury so out of humour, that he was heard to say, that he did not care what became of the Bill (about which they (had) taken so much pains) having that Proviso in it.

All endeavours us'd by the Duke's Enemys to exclud him from the Succession to the Crown :

First by persuading the King to a Divorce.

Then by setting up the Duke of Monmouth, to pretend to be legitimat.

E. Carlisle and Shaftsbury's proposall to the King, concerning the Duke of Monmouth.

The King receives the proposall with indignation.

The Duke of Monmouth's ambition probably first inspir'd in him by his Governor, one Ross a Scotsman.

Severall means at severall times were attempted by them, for excluding his R. H. from succeeding to the Crown. Their first enterprise of perswading the King to a Divorce, and to marry again, proving ineffectuall, they on the next place endeavour'd to make the Duke of Monmouth their tool to work with all, who had ambition enough to be wrought upon by them. To this they were not a litle encouraged by the great affection which the King shew'd towards that Duke, hoping from thence that his Ma^{ty} might be prevail'd upon to own him for his legitimat son. The Earls of Carlisle and Shaftsbury were two of the cheifest managers in this busines, and they had the confidence, not to say impudence, to tell the King, That if he would but consent to have the thing done, they would undertake to find witnesses to prove the Duke of Monmouth's Legitimacy; by which it appears, that (what is naturall to ill men) they thought the King's conscience as large as their own: But his Ma^{ty} received their proposition with indignation, and told them, That as well (as) he lov'd the Duke of Monmouth, he had rather see him hang'd at Tyburne then own him as his legitimat Son. However this did not discourage the party from pushing on their design, nor that Duke from prosecuting his ambitious thoughts which had taken possession of his brain, and were probably first instill'd into him by one Ross a Scotsman, put about him by the King to be his Governor when he first came out of France, who hoping therby to make his own fortune put those high thoughts into his pupile's head; nor was the man wanting on his part in industry to compass his design, for he applyd* himself to the old Bishop of Durham, Doctor Cosena, (Cosin) and told him, That he might do a great peice of Service to the Church of England in keeping out Popery, if he would but Sign a Certificat of the King's marriage to the Duke of Monmouth's Mother call'd M^r. Barlow, thō her own name was Walters, with whom that Bishop was acquainted in Paris she then pretending to be his penitent, and to be converted by him from her loose way of living. Ross also told the Bishop, to make the thing more easy to him, that during his life the Certificat should not be produced nor made use of: This in time would have made Sure work, for according to the English law the Bishop's Certificat is a legall proof of a marriage. But the good old Bishop rejected his proposition, and afterwards acquainted the King with it; who then thought fitt to keep it Secret, without making any noise about it, and only to remove upon some other pretence the said Ross from his Imployment; But afterwards, when the Tale of the Black Box was spread about and began to gain ground, the King incensed against the wickednes of these proceedings, divulged this passage between Ross and the Bishop.

T O M E
II.

1674.
Ross proposes to B^p: Durham to sign a certificat of the King's marriage to D. Monmouths mother M^r. Barlow.

Upon the Spreading of the Story of the Black Box, the King divulges this proposall of Rosse's.

Thō all these machinations for setting up the Duke of Monmouth as heire to the Crown, had nothing but forgery and perjury wherby to subsist; yet in regard of the persons concern'd in it, and of the great disturbances it rais'd in the Nation from time to time, till at last it ended in open war, it may not be amiss to trace here the birth, the education, and progress of that Duke's actions and behaviour, when he came to appear in the world.

The history of the birth and education of the Duke of Monmouth.

His Mother's name was Walters, thō she took that of Barlow.

his Mother's true name Walters, her character and loose behaviour.

* The Duke's Biographer in this place, is retracing events which had occurred prior to the Bishop of Durham's death, in Jan^y 15, 1671-2: He had retired to Paris in 1643. — EDITOR.

TOME
II.

She was born of a Gentleman's family in Wales, but having little means, and less grace, she came up to London to make her fortune. She was very handsom, and thō she had no much witt, she had a great deal of that sort of cunning which those of her profession usually have. The famous Algernoon Sidney (thō at that time a Collonel in Cromwell's army of Samts) having got notice of her, enter'd into Treaty about her and came to an agreement for fifty broad peices, (as he himself related this Story to his R. H.) But being in that nick of time comāded hastily out of London to his Regiment, he miss'd his bargain. After this she travell'd into Holland, where she fell into the hands of his Brother Collonel Robert Sidney who kept her for some time, till the King being then come to the Hague, and hearing of her, found means to get her from her Collonel, she not being averse to so advantageous a change; Wherupon that Collonel was heard to say, Let who's will have her, she's already sped; and after her being with the (King) she prov'd so soon with child and came so near in time, that the world had cause to doubt whose child it was; and the rather, because when he grew to be a man, he so very much resembled the Collonel both in stature and countenance, and even to a wort in his face. However the King own'd the child to a very high degree, as afterwards did appear. In the mean time his Ma^{ty} was call'd away into Scotland, and during his absence she liv'd so loosely, that when he return'd from his Escape at Worcester into France, and she also coming thither in hopes of continuing in her former post, his Ma^v would have no further comerce with her, thō she made use of all her little arts, with the help of freinds, to reingratiate herself; But when she found her hopes desperate, she afterwards so abandon'd herself at Paris, that at last she dyed of the disease incident to that profession.

Great reason to doubt whither D.
Monmouth was the King's or Coll: Robert Sidney's Son, to whom he resembled even to a wort in the face.

Monmouth
first bred up a Catholick by the name of Mr. Crafts.

As to her Son, he was first bred up a Catholick under the tuition of Father Goff, an English Oratorian, and went by the name of Mr. Crofts, and pass'd for a kinsman to the Lord of that name; till afterwards, being sent for into England by the King, who finding him well grown, and very handsome, took so great a liking to him, that he resolved publickly to own him and raise him in fortune and dignity; to which that there might be no impediment, he had him instructed in the Protestant Religion, which consists in renouncing Popery, and which was easily brought about in one of his age by the pleasures of youth, and the prospect of preferment. Soon after he created him Duke of Monmouth, and married him with a rich Heiress in Scotland, the only child of the Earle of Bucclugh, who brought him a fortune of about ten thousand pounds a year. As he grew up in years the Kings kindnes increased towards him, for thō he had no great capacity, he had outward parts that make him very agreable; he was tall, well shap'd, of a good air, of a civil behaviour, and none danced better, and with all this he was very brave, which made (him) much courted by both Sexes; Nor did he want cunning and an insinuating behaviour where he had a mind to please; and his R. H. amongst the rest had a reall kindnes for him till he came at last to be convinced of his treacherous designs, and even after that, the Duke continued to live fairly with him, as he did with all those for whom the King had a kindnes. Being then very young he accompanied his R. H. in the first Dutch war, and was in the Engagement when Opdam was blown up. Not long after, the King bought for him Lord Macklesfeild's first Troop of Guards; and when the second Dutch war came on, and his R. H. went again to Sea in the year 1672, he was sent by the King into France to serve by Land; where he had the honour done him by his Most Christian Ma^y to let him serve as Lieutenant Generall (as young as he was) at the Seige of Mastricke, at which place he behav'd himself with distinction upon the retaking of a half-moon. After that, having now gain'd reputation, he car'd not

TOME II.

Being very handsome the King takes a great liking to him, and owns him publickly, makes him turn Protestant and creates him D. of Monmouth.

D: Monmouth was very brave.

He accompanied the Duke in y^e 1st Dutch war, and was in the Engagement.

He behav'd himself with great distinction at

T O M E
II.

Mastricke in the retaking of a halfe-moon.

His ambition increases with his years, and to compass his designs he attempts to be master of the Troops.

He endeavours to obtain a Commission of Gen^l. of all the forces in England.

Addresses himself to the Duke, not scrupuling to make use of the Duke's kindnes to him; to supplant the Duke himself.

Monmouth's proposall gives suspicion to the Duke.

The Duke

much for the fatigue of the War, and remain'd no longer in the Army, neither that nor the next Campagne, then he needs must, and then the King of France himself did, The pleasures of the Court being more agreeable to him, then service in the Feild.

The older he grew, the more his ambition encreas'd, nor did he want Councillors about him to foment it. In order to compass his designs, he endeavour'd to make himself master of the Troops that were in England, that in case any accident should happen to the King, he might have a push for the Crown. To this effect he endeavour'd to obtain from the King a Commission of Generall over all the Forces in England, and knowing that in military affaires the King commonly advised with his Brother before he resolved any thing, he thought it necessary to gain his R. H. to be his advocat, and to propose what he desir'd to the King, as a thing conducing to his Ma^{ty}s Service, not scrupuling to make use of the Duke's kindnes towards him to supplant and destroy the Duke himself, and also presuming that the secret of his design was wholly unknown to his R. H. And accordingly he came to the Duke to desire his favour in this matter, representing to him the necessity of having a Generall to command all his Ma^{ties} forces within the Realm, that in case any disorder or Insurrection should happen, the Soldiers and Officers might know whom to obey warrantably in the suppressing them; for he had been told by severall of the Officers, that without such an authority it would not be safe for them to obey him, nor to fire upon any in case of a mutiny; That he desir'd such a Commission of Generall should be only during pleasure, and not to be made use of at present, but to ly by him in a readines against any such occasion. This proposall gave his R. H. ground to suspect there was more at the bottom of it then the King's service as was pretended; But without shewing any mistrust, the Duke answer'd him, That he did not see any necessity from the reasons he had given, of having a Generall, especially in a time of peace, over so few forces which could not be call'd an Army; That by his Commission of Captain of the first Troop of Guards, he was already empower'd to command any Forces that should be drawn out to quell an Insurrection, as much as he would be had he a Commission of Generall, since the words kill, and slay, would not be in it, as they were not in that of the late Duke of Albemarle's; That those Officers who gave him this advice and were so nicely scrupulous as to make a difficulty of obeying his orders upon any such occasion, deserv'd to have their Commissions taken from them, as being unfitt for military Employment; That having at the time of the Duke of Albemarle's death already advised the King not to give a new Commission of Generall to any person whatsoever (not excepting his own) he could not so far contradict himself as now to perswade his Ma^y to the contrary, there being no new reason for such an alteration of mind; and lastely he told him, That if such a Commission were fitt to be granted, he should think himself injur'd to have it bestow'd on any but himself; Wherfor he desir'd the Duke of Monmouth to desist from any such pretentions.

That Duke finding it in vain to press his R. H. any further in this matter, betook himself to other ways and means to compass his design; and at last by the assistance of his party, and chiefly by the great kindnes the King had then for him, he at last gain'd his point, and prevail'd upon his Ma^y to depart from his former resolution which he declar'd upon the death of the Duke of Albemarle, of having no Generall, and to bestow that Charge now upon the Duke of Monmouth. Of all this his R. H. was a patient looker on, not being able to hinder it, and still carryd it fair even to the Duke of Monmouth himself without making any complaint about it to the King; for thō he well perceived that Monmouth aim'd at something gives his reasons, why he could not approve Monmouth's pretentions, and advises him to desist.

T O M E
II.

Monmouth by the help of his party and the King's great kindnes for him, obtains at last his point.

The Duke bears all patiently what he could not hinder, and carrys fair even to the Duke of Monmouth himself, for whom the

T O M E
II.

King was then in the height of his affection.

The D. of Monmouth's design of getting his Commission of Generall to pass the great Seal with the word Son, omitting the word Natural, prevented by
the Duke's care, and how.

more then being Generall, and thō he knew that the King abominated the thought of that Duke's succeeding to the Crown, yet the proofs of his ambition were not as yet visible enough to work upon the King's mind, so much prevented not to say blinded with affection towards him: So that all his R. H. had then to do, was to be upon his guard; and in order therunto, having had notice that in some former Orders and Warrants signed by the King, the Secretarys at Whitehall had been so compleasant to that Duke as to put in the word Son and leave out the word Natural, he thought it time to look after it, now that his Commission for Generall was to pass the great Seal and go thorow all the Offices, that the ommission of the word Natural might be prevented: but not being willing to make complaint of it to the King without absolute necessity, he sent for Sir William Jones the Atturney Generall, who was to draw the Commission, and gave him caution about it, that according to the form of Law the word Natural should be inserted. He very honestly, thō the Warrant brought to him was with the word Son without Natural, however drew the Patent as it ought to be, with the word Natural in it; For greater security, the Duke also charg'd Sir Joseph Williamson, the Secretary of State, through whose hands the Commission was to pass, to let him see it before he brought it to the King to be sign'd. Notwithstanding all this, some few days after, when the King was rising from the Cabinet Councill, Sir Joseph layd severall Commissions before the King to be sign'd, which made his R. H. curious to see what they were; And when the King went down to walk in the Privy Garden, he stayd behind, and took up one of the Commissions, which prov'd to be that for the Duke of Monmouth's Generallship, and looking in it to see how it was drawn, he found the word Natural had been scrap'd out in all the places where it had been writt, and the word Son only left in; Vpon which the Duke reproched Sir Joseph for his breach of word, and want of respect to him, who made a shuffling insignificant excuse like one that had nothing to say for himself: But the Duke took the Commission and carryd it immediatly to the King then walking in the Garden, and acquainted him how Sir Joseph had behaved himself in that matter, and withall desir'd his Ma^{ty} that the word Natural might again be put into the Commission as it had been, and as it ought to be. Wherupon the King taking out his sizers, cutt the Commission in two, and order'd an other to be prepar'd for him to sign with the word Natural in it.

His R. H. press'd to have Sir Joseph Williamson punish'd for his misdemeanour in altering the Bill without the King's order, after it came out of the Attorney General's hands; But when the matter came to be examin'd, it appear'd that the rasures of the word Natural had been made by the Duke of Monmouth's particular order; who having sent to the Secretary's Office to see the Commission before it was sign'd, made his own Secretary Vernon do it in his presence, which as it was a great crime in them (thō unpunish'd) so was it no sufficient excuse for Sir Joseph Williamson: But this was a time in which that Duke's ambition, and the King's favour towards him, were both at the height; For he graspt at the same power in Scotland, and obtain'd a Commission of General in that Kingdom, which he would have had to be for life, and without the word Natural, but the Duke of Lauderdale refused to draw it otherways, then during pleasure, and with the word Natural in it, and so it pass'd.

I should have mention'd, that at the same time the King granted this Commission of General to the Duke of Monmouth, he also granted one of Generalissimo to his R. H., to make the other more easily digested, it being much in his Ma^{ties} nature, thō sometimes strongly byass'd by his affections, to keep measures with every body; which Commission of Generalissimo,

The Duke presses to have Sir Joseph, Williamson punish'd, for scraping out the word Natural without the King's Order.

Lauderdale refuses to draw Monmouth's Commission of General for Scotland, otherwise then during pleasure, and with the word Natural.

The King gives the Duke a Comm^{on} of Generalissimo, with which he was preparing to go to command his Ma^{ties} troopes in Flanders for the defence of

T O M E
II.

that country, but was prevented by the Peace.

The D. of Monmouth
go's over to Flanders, and is with P. of Orange in the Engagement at S^t.
Denis near Mons, w^{ch} was fought by y^e P. O. with the Peace in his pocket.

thō of no present use in England by reason of the incapacitating TEST, had never-the-less its force without restraint any where out of this Kingdom: So that not long after this the King by the importunity of the Parliament (whom nothing would content but a War with France) having withdrawn his Troopes out of the French service, and sent them into Flanders for the defence of that Country, wither more allso from hence were order'd to pass, his R. H. prepar'd to go thither to command those Forces in cheif. The Duke of Monmouth in the mean time went over, and came into the Prince of Orange's Army just time enough to be in the Engagement at S^t. Denis near Mons, which battel the Prince of Orange fought when he knew the Treaty of Peace between France and the States was sign'd, and had an authentique copie of it in his pocket. During this Voyage it was, that the Duke of Monmouth began to take his measures with that Prince, and to lay the ground work of what he undertook afterwards, using all his endeavours to gain his favour by promising him his faithfull service in England. At the same time also he applyd himself to gaine an interest in the English and Scotch Troopes, then in the States' Service, and with many of them both Officers he obtain'd his ends. After this, the Peace concluded brought him back into England, as it also stop'd the journey of his R. H. into Flanders.

This * Digression concerning the Duke of Monmouth, had let us forwards to the Relation of some publick transactions out of their due order of time, leaving some others unmention'd, which ought to have taken place, to which we must now go back.

We have already mention'd the King's firmnes in the busines

* During this Digression, The Secretary, whilst noticing events somewhat out of their due order, did not insert the date of the year in the margin of his MS. —
EDITOR.

of the Duke's marriage, to have it accomplish'd notwithstanding the great heats about it in the house of Commons, and the timorousnes of some of his Ministers, who would have had it delayd, if not broke off: Nevertheless against the next meeting of the Parliament, which had been prorogued (Feb. 24th) to make way for that marriage, his Ma^{ty} was prevail'd upon by the suggestions of those Lords who were then at (the) helm, to issue forth severall Orders of Councill and Proclamations for putting the Laws in execution against all Nonconformists, and particularly against Catholicks, forbidding them to come to Court, or any where near the Kings person: For it was the constant practice of these Ministers, that when ever any of them were affraid of the house of Commons for themselves, they presently exposed the Papists to the woored, hoping therby to save themselves from being fasten'd upon. To this end it was, that in January, 1675, S. N. the Lord Treasurer and Duke of Lauderdale came to his R. H. (as they said) from the King, to let him know, That the Bishops had an intention to propose to his Ma^{ty} that the Laws might be put in execution against all Dissenters, and particularly that the Roman Catholicks might be speedily convicted, the doing of which had hitherto been negligently perform'd; That all the English Preists might be put from attending on the Queen, and that the King's naturall Daughters, as well as Sons, might be bred up of the Church of England. Having said this, they endeavour'd to perswade the Duke of the necessity there was in the present circumstances of his Ma^{ties} affaires, that these things should be accordingly done; and further they endeavour'd to perswade his R. H. to concurr with them, in a thing so requisit at present for the King's service. But the Duke told them he could not be of their mind, for he thought it a dangerous thing to exasperate so numerous a Party as that of the Protestants Nonconformists; and as for the Roman Catholicks, he look'd upon it as a hard

The King is prevail'd on by his Ministers, to issue out Severall proclamations against all Nonconformists, and particularly against Catholicks.

1675.

The Ministers, when affraid of y^e house of Commons, Sacrifice the Papists to save themselves.

Danby and Lauderdale's conference with the Duke, upon the Subject of putting the Laws in execution against Dissenters.

The Duke reasons why he could not concur with these Lords proposals.

TOME

II.

1675.

thing for his Ma^{ty} to shew any new Severity against them, who had ventur'd their lives and fortunes for him and his Father, Especially there being no danger from them, since they were incapacitated from having any kind of Employment, either Civil or Military; That as to removing all English Preists from serving in the Queen's Chappel, and as to the breeding up the King's naturall Children in the Protestant profession, those were matters that concern'd others more than himself and therefore not fitt for him to enter into them, and so ended this Conference.

Wherupon the Duke went immediatly to the King to give him an account of what had been proposed by these Lords, hoping at the same time to diswade his Ma^{ty} from taking those measures; But he found the King allready determin'd to do what these Lords had propos'd, nor could his reasons to the contrary prevaile with his Ma^{ty}. He also found out that these two above mention'd Lords, together with the Lord Keeper and the two Secretarys, went to Lambeth house where they met the Arch-Bishop and some of the Bishops, and instead of being press'd by those Churchmen to any thing of this kind, they themselves press'd the Bishops very hard to make such proposalls to the King, to which at last they consented.

The Duke endeavours to diswad the King from the measures these Lords had engaged him in, but in vain.

Another contrivance of the Ministers to pacify the Parliament, is to have a Match made up between the P^{ee} of Orange and P^{ee} Mary.

The King consents to the proposall, and discourses the Duke about sending L^d Arlington to Holland to sound the P^{ee} of Or^{ange} intentions as to Peace or War.

Amongst other contrivances which these Ministers had on foot to pacify the Parliament, they design'd to have a match concluded between the Princess Mary, the Duke's eldest Daughter, and the Prince of Orange, to which the King readily gave his consent; but the difficulty remain'd to gaine that of his R. H., to which his Ma^{ty} took an occasion to begin a discourse with the Duke about sending the Lord Arlington into Holland, telling him how necessary it was, during this Winter to be truly inform'd whither the Prince of Orange had a mind to have Peace or no, that he might take his measures accordingly; and to that purpose he had thoughts of sending the Lord Arlington into Holland, as the fittest person to sound the intentions of the Prince of Orange. The Duke somewhat surpris'd at this choice, represented to the King, That he thought the busines might better be done by Sir William Temple his Ambassador in Holland, for by so doing he would give no jealousy to the French, wheras the sending Lord Arlington one of his cheif Ministers, would certainly make them suspect there was something secretly carried on to their prejudice; Besides, he thought that Lord so partiall to the Prince of Orange, that it might be doubted whither he would make a true report of that affaire, in case there should not be that inclination to Peace as was desired: To this the King reply'd, That as to what concern'd any jealousy which France might take at it, he had already spoken about it to Mons^r. de Rouigny their Minister, who approv'd of it, and for the other objection, he was sure that Lord Arlington would give him a sincere account of the Negociation. But the Duke further urg'd, That it would look to the World like a too mean condescension and a too much seeking of the Prince of Orange, to send such a person as Lord Arlington at upon such an arrand. All the Duke's reasons made no impression upon the King, for he had before hand resolved the matter, and what the King now said was only by way of introduction to make way for the main busines intended by his Ma^{ty}, For about two days after this he told the Duke, he had forgett to say one thing about the affaire he last spoke of to him, which was, that he had likewise resolved to send Lord Ossory together with Lord Arlington to say something, if need were, to the Prince of Orange, which he knew the Duke would not be glad Lord Arlington should have any thing to do with; And this was, that in case that the Prince of Orange should desire to know what advantage he should receive, and what his Ma^{ty} would do for him, in case he did consent to a Peace, and to what ever

T O M E
II.

1675.
The Duke against sending of Lord Arlington into Holland, represents his reasons to the King, but his Ma^{ty} had already resolv'd the matter.

The King tells the Duke he design'd to send L^d Ossory wth Arlington to Holland, to let the P. O. know that if he consented to a Peace he might hope to marry the P^{res} Mary.

T O M E

II.

1675.

The Duke Startled at this sudden proposall, of having his Daughter dis-pos'd of without his privity, represents to the King y^e undecency of proposing Such a thing to the P. O. without his first asking it.

Notwithstanding all the Duke's reasons to the contrary, the King persists in his resolution of sending Ossory and Arlington to P. O. and so the Duke is forced to acquiesce.

The unsuc-cessfulness of the journey of these two Lords, did sufficiently justify the Duke's unwillingness to consent to it.

1676.

Dr Compton
B^r of London proposes to the Duke and asks his leave to confirm the P^{re} Mary, in order to receive the Sacrament in the Church of England, Jan.
18.

els his Ma^{ty} should desire, that then Lord Ossory should be able to say, he knew the King and the Duke's mind so well, that if the Prince of Orange did what was expected of him, he might then pretend to marry the Princess Mary, and his addresses should be well received. This Sudden proposall Very much startled the Duke, to see his Daughter dispos'd of without his privity, and he told the King, He could not be of opinion to empower Lord Ossory with any such Comission, for he thought it a very undecent thing to have a matter of that nature proposed to the Prince of Orange, without his first seeking it ; That to treat of such a matter before the Peace was concluded, would raise an incurable jealousy in France, and therefore not to be thought on at present: To which the King replyd, That there should be no Treaty about it till after the Peace, and that it should be only mention'd as an inducement to it, and hinted by Lord Ossory as a thing by him wish'd, and not as propos'd from the King or the Duke, till the Prince of Orange expressed his desire of it. In conclusion the King seem'd so resolved in the matter, that the Duke had nothing to do but to acquiesce, thō afterwards the success of this journey and privat negotiation fully justified his sentiments of it ; for the overtures and proposalls made both by the Earle of Arlington and Lord Ossory, were at that time as coldly received by the Prince of Orange as they were unwillingly consented to by the Duke.

ABOUT this time it was, that the Bishop of London Doctor Compton, very eminent for his zeal against Popery, came to the Duke and told him, that now his Daughter the Lady Mary began to be of an age, to think of preparing herself for receiving the Sacrament, and that in order therunto he was come to aske his leave that according to the rules of the Church of England, he might confirm her. The Duke answer'd, That since his conscience did not permitt him to communicate with them in any religious fonction himself, he could not for the same reason give his consent that his Daughter should; and that it was much against his will that his Daughters went to Church and were bred Protestants; and that the reason why he had not endeavour'd have them instructed in his own Religion, was because he knew if he should have attempted it, they would have immediatly been quite taken from him. To which the Bishop replyd, That he hop'd his R. H. at least would not take it ill from him, if he did the duty of his fonction in confirming his Daughter: To which the Duke's only answer was, That he could not give his consent to it; and so they parted. The next day the Duke meeting the Bishop, told him, He thought he would do well to inform the King of what had pass'd between them the day before; To which the Bishop answer'd, that he came with the design to ask his leave for his so doing: Whereupon he immediatly went in to the King, and received from him his Command to confirm his Neice. The Duke was willing it should pass so, because he perceiv'd the Bishop was resolv'd to do it; and since it was not in the Duke's power to hinder it, he thought it more decent it should be done by order from the King, rather then by the Bishop's own authority, and moreover that the world might see it was done by his Majesty's Command, without his consent.

T O M E
II.

1676.

The Duke answers, that his conscience not permitting himself to communicate with them, he could not consent that his Daughter should.

ABOUT the beginning of June, 1677, The Prince of Orange sent hither Monsieur de Benting, the person he most confided in, to make great professions of duty and service to his Majesty, and to assure him he would wholly put himself into his hands, and follow his Counsell and directions both as to peace and war; but that he hop'd his Ma^y would consider his honour, 1677.

Benting's journey to England. He makes great professions of duty and service to the King and the Duke, in his Master the P. Orange's name.

T O M E
II.

1677.

The Duke's answer to the great professions of kindnes made to him from his Nephew the P. O.

and not propose any thing which might be contrary to it. He also made great professions to the Duke from the Prince his Nephew, to which the Duke answer'd, That he should allways have that kindnes for his Nephew which both his own merit and the interest of the Royall Family, which cheifly consists in being well united, requir'd from him. Upon further discourse, he told Monsieur Benting, That he must not look on his Maties unwillingnes to enter into a war, as proceeding from any other reason but self preservation; for he foresaw the absolute ruine of the Royall Family, if he should imbarke himself in a war in the condition he was now in, his magazins being empty, his Fleet not in a good condition, and above all the Parliament being in such a temper, that all he could do at present was to keep things quiet at home; which he might easily perceive by what so lately had been done by the house of Commons, in invading the Prerogative in so essentiall a point as that of Peace and War; That should his Ma^y be ingaged in a forreign War, what would they not attempt when he should be so much in their power for maintaining it, and what would not the Republican Party then do when so fair an occasion for their purpose was offer'd them.

A Project set on foot by L^d Shaftsbury and others of the factions Party, endeavouring to prove that the Parliament was dissolved.

In this year the factious Party, in which the Lord Shaftsbury was now become the cheif Engeneer, thought they had found out arguments to prove by Law, that this present Parliament was dissolved, for not having had a Session in a whole year's time. This they were very fond of because they found their Party was not strong enough in this House of Commons to carry matters so far as they would have them carried against the Crown, which they hop'd upon a new Election of Members they might be able to compass. To this end, and to gain others to be of their mind, they printed and dispers'd a State of the Case with reasons for their opinion. They applyd themselves to all sorts of people, and amongst others to some of the Catholick

Lords, telling them, They would have fairer quarter and better usage from a new Parliament then from this. The Lord Shaftsbury had the confidence to send to the Duke to know if he had read and consider'd any of the papers about the dissolution of this present Parliament, and what his opinion was upon it; that if he pleas'd, he would send him another paper with such convincing arguments, that his R. H. would by them clearly see this Parliament was absolutely dissolved, that if he would be pleas'd to joyn with them, that point would certainly be carried. To this the Duke answer'd, That he had seen the Papers writt upon that Subiect, and was willing to read any that should be sent him; but that he could not Say what his opinion was, till he had heard what could be said on both sides; that if the arguments were so convincing, they would certainly appear so upon debate in the house of Lords, and 'till then he could frame no judgment of them.

It is to be observed, that in one of their printed Papers upon this Subject, there was a Clause inserted, in which it was affirm'd that the Parliament had power to alter the Succession of the Crown. That this might not alienate the Duke, the Lord Shaftsbury sent to him the day before the meeting of the Parliament, to assure his R. H. that without his knowledge that Clause was put in. The Lord Wharton likewise send the same excuse, adding, that it was the Lawyer whom they imployd in the printing it, that put it in without their orders. The Duke of Buckingham also sent to the Duke to assure him, that Clause was not put in by his consent, but that it was the Lord Shaftsbury who had drawn it, and caus'd it to be inserted; which possibly was put in on purpose by them, hoping thereby to fright the Duke into a concurrence with them.

At the meeting of the Parliament the Duke of Buckingham began with a long sett Speech to shew that the fifteen months prorogation had dissolved this Parliament; wherupon the

T O M E
II.

1677.
Shaftsbury has the confidence to address himself to the Duke, and to desire his concurrence, offering him printed papers to prove y^e Dissolution.

A Clause added to one of these Papers, affirming that Par^{ty}. had power to alter the Succession.

Excuses made to y^e Duke by Buckingham, Shaftsbury, and Wharton, all of them disavowing the Clause about the power of altering the Succession.

The D. of Buckingham in a long Speech in Parliament, pretends to

TOME
II.

1677. shew, that the 3 months prorogation had dissolved this Parliament, and is seconded by the L^{ds} Salisbury, Shaftsbury, and Wharton.

The 4 Lords who had motion'd the dissolution, are order'd to withdraw ; after which tis resolved they should beg pardon of the King and the House.

D. Buckingham sent for to come in to the House and beg pardon, is not to be found.

E. Salisbury order'd to beg pardon in his place, upon refusal is sent to the Tower.

E. Shaftsbury refusing to ask pardon at the Bar, is sent likewise to the Tower.

L^d Wharton pretending he had already ask'd pardon, and refusing to ask it when requir'd to do

Lord Fretchewill immediatly cryd, to the Bar ! The Lords Salisbury, Shaftsbury, and Wharton, seconded the Duke of Buckingham's motion and assertion, and they were severally answer'd by some of the other Lords sitting in the House. At last it was mov'd, That the said Duke who had started, and the other Lords who maintain'd that opinion, should be call'd to the Bar. After a very long debate the question was carried, that the first debate raised by the Duke of Buckingham, should be layd aside. After which it was moved, that those four Lords should withdraw, which was warmly opposed by some, and this last debat was adjourn'd to the next day. Then the same debate was resumed, and at last the question was put for the four Lords to withdraw ; the Contents were fifty three, the Not Contents thirty. In the next place they took into consideration what was to be done with them one by one ; and first it was resolv'd, That the Duke of Buckingham should ask pardon of his Ma^{ty} and the House, at the Bar, and acknowledge his fault. The Gentleman Vsher of the Black Rod was sent to bring him in, but could not find him, he being slipt away ; Whereupon the House order'd that the Black Rod should take him into Custody, and bring him to the Bar of the House next morning at ten of the Clock. The Earle of Salisbury's turn was next, who was order'd to come into his place, and there standing up bareheaded, to receive the reprehension of the House by the Lord Chancellor and to ask pardon of his Ma^{ty} and the House ; which he being in his place, refused to do, wherupon he was sent to the Tower. The Earle of Shaftsbury was then call'd in to the Bar, and refusing, as the other had done, to ask pardon, was likewise sent to the Tower.

After this, the Lord Wharton was call'd into his place, and the same thing being said to him, as to the others, he answer'd That he had already ask'd pardon of the King and the House ; the Lord Chancellor said, what he had done signified nothing, he was to obey the Lords, and do it now : Wharton answer'd, He had done it already : After the Lord Chancellor had thrice repeated the same thing, and the other the same answer, upon his refusall to say more he was call'd to the Bar, there to receive his Sentence of being sent to the Tower. When he came to the Bar he would have obeyd the Lords, as he should have done in his place, but it was too late, and would not be admitted of, and so he fouldowed the rest to the Tower.

The day following the Lords at their first meeting received an account from the Black Rod, that the Duke of Buckingham was not to be found at his lodging nor any where els ; upon which the House order'd, that in case he did not appear before the rising of the House, they should desire his Ma^{ty} to issue out his Proclamation to seize him wherever he could be found, and to stop the Ports ; But just before the House was ready to rise, he came in, and being required to ask pardon, as had been order'd, and he refusing it, he was likewise committed to the Tower.

About this time the Duke of Ormonde (who contrary to the Duke's liking had been some years past removed from being Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, by the prevalency of the Duke of Buckingham at that time upon the King) address'd himself to the Duke to mediate with his Ma^{ty} for his being sent again Lord Lieutenant into Ireland ; which his R. H. willingly undertook, and procured his Ma^{ties} agreement and consent to it, thō the Lord Treasurer secretly opposed it as much as he could. At the same time Lord Ranelagh put the Duke of Monmouth upon being Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in opposition to the Duke of Ormonde, as not being his freind, and having a mind to get Lord Conway to be Deputy under the Duke of Monmouth. But this design was prevented, nor had his R. H. any knowledge of it, till he had first spoke to his Ma^{ty} for the Duke of Ormonde.

1677. it in his place,
is not admitted to ask it afterwards at the Bar when he would have done it. And so is sent to the Tower.

D. of Buckingham at last comes into the House, when it was just ready to rise, and being requir'd to ask pardon, is upon his refusall sent to the Tower.

The D. of Ormonde who had been remov'd from the Lieuten-ancy of Ireland, against the Duke's will, is restor'd to that Employment again by his R.
H. mediation.

TOME
II.

1677.
The P. of Orange's journey into England in Oct. after the Campagne of —77.

The design of this journey to concert a Plan of a Peace, and to propose his marrying the P^{re} Mary the Duke's eldest Daughter.

The P^{re} of Orange proposes the marriage to the Duke.

The Duke's
answer.

In the month of October of this present year, the Campagne of Flanders being ended, the Prince of Orange came into England, and landing at Harwich went straight thence to Newmarket where the King then was. The cheif busines which brought him over was to concert with the King such a Plan of Peace between France and the Confederates, as might for the futur secure Flanders, and consequently Holland for being overrun by the French ; And that in case France refused to submitt to it, his Ma^{ty} should joyn his Forces with the Confederates to bring that King to reason. In the next place he came to propose his marrying the Lady Mary (which we formerly hinted) and very much insisted to have that concluded and dispatched before he enter'd into the discusion of publick affaires, pretending that otherwise his Confederates would beleieve he had made a hard bargain for them, to make a good one for himself. But the King, and much more the Duke, were of a contrary opinion, thinking it more expedient and decent that the Negociation should rather end, then begin with the marriage. This was opiniatred on either side for the first days, which were spent only in outward Ceremony of Entertainement, without falling into any busines ; till at last the obstinacy of the Prince of Orange by the assistance of the Lord Treasurer (who from that time enter'd into the measures and interests of that Prince) prevail'd upon the flexibility of the King to let the mariage be first agreed and concluded : In order to which, the Prince in a visite he made to the Duke (having till then industriously avoided speaking of any busines) told his R. H. That he had something to say to him about an affaire, which was the cheif cause of his coming over, and which was to disire that he might have the happines to be yet nearer related to him by marrying the Lady Mary. The Duke said, He had all the esteem for him that he deserved, or could desire, but till they had treated and brought to some ripenes the public affaire of War and Peace, it was not proper that a discourse upon any other matter should take place. Nevertheless the Prince of Orange still urged that the busines of the marriage might be first concluded, and the Duke remain'd no less firm in his opinion, and so the visite ended.

The same evening the Duke inform'd his Ma^{ty} of what had pass'd between him and the Prince of Orange; and the King said he had answer'd very well, but told him with-all, that at the great importunity of the Prince, he had given him leave to speak of marriage to the Duke, At which his R. H. was not a litle surpriz'd, and said, He could have wish'd his Ma^{ty} had been pleas'd to have acquainted him before with his mind, that he might have better known how to have carry'd it with the Prince when he made the proposall to him; At which the King broke short off, and said, He would speak to him of it another time.

A day or two after the King calling to him the Duke, and the Lord Treasurer, fell into the discourse of the convenience of the Match, but not as of a thing positively resolved on, Vpon the Duke's desire that they might talk of it again the next morning; which they accordingly did, and then the Resolution was taken, his R. H. assenting to it, and receiving directions from the King to notify to the Prince of Orange both their consents to the marriage: That being done, his Ma^{ty} the next day sent for the Duke into the Councill Chamber, the Councill then sitting, and there declar'd, That the Prince of Orange having desir'd to have yet a more Strict Alliance with him by marrying the Lady Mary, he had consented to it, as a thing he look'd on as very proper to unite the Family, and which he beleev'd would be agreeable to his People, and shew them the care he had of Religion, for which reason he thought it the best Alliance he could make. After this, the Duke also declar'd his consent to the marriage, and said, He hoped that he had now

T O M E
II.

1677.

The Duke informs the King of what had pass'd between him and the P. of Orange, concerning the marriage.

The marriage discours'd of by the King, the Duke and L^d Treasurer, but not positively resolv'd on till the day following.

The marriage resolved on, assented to by the Duke, notified by him to the P. of Orange, and declared the next day by the King in Councill, his R. H. being present, the 22 Oct.

T O M E
II.

1677.

The P. of Orange's marriage with P^{re} Mary declar'd in Councill, and y^e Articles drawn by L^d Treasurer.
The Plan of the Peace.

given a sufficient testimony of his right intentions for the publick good, and that people would no more say, he design'd the altering the Government in Church or State; for, what ever his opinion in Religion might be, all that he desired was, that men might not be molested meerly for conscience sake.

After the Marriage had been thus declared in Councill, all the Articles relating therunto, by the great diligence and zeal of the Lord Treasurer, were in three days time drawn up and agreed to; which being done, they fell to work upon the Plan of the Peace. The cheif aime of the Prince of Orange was to ingage the King immediatly in the war against France in conjunction with the Confederates; And therefore, under the pretence of sufficient Frontiere for Flanders, and Barriere for Holland, he insisted upon termes that both the King and he himself knew very well the King of France would never consent to. On the other side, it was his Majesty's interest as well as inclination to get as good termes as he could without engaging in a War, so that some time and many debates passed, before they could agree upon a scheme of proposalls. At last it was resolved, That for a sufficient Frontiere and a Barriere, the Towns of Ath, Charleroy, Oudenarde Courtray, Tournay, Condé, Valenciennes, St Guilain and Binche, should be restor'd to the Spaniards, and that some person should be sent from the King with these proposalls to the French Court, and instructed to enter into no reasonings upon them, but to demande a positive answer in two days, and after that immediatly to return.

L^d Duras Sent to France with y^e Plan of y^e Peace; y^e French surpris'd with the proposalls carry it fair and give only a generall
answer.

Lord Duras was the person pitched upon to carry this message, at the delivery of which that Court was very much surpris'd, both at the thing, and at the manner of it. However in appearance they took it gently, Saying, That the King of England knew very well he might allways be master of the Peace; but it seem'd hard that Tournay and some of the Towns in Flanders, upon whose fortifications Vast treasures had been expended, should be yeilded up without any consideration for them: However they desir'd some short time to consider of a finall answer. Lord Duras told them, he was tyd up to two days stay; But at the end of them, perswasion and good nature prevail'd upon him to stay some few days longer, and at last to come away with an answer in generall, which neither granted nor denied the thing ask'd, but that the French Ambassador in England, should have power to finish the Treaty so as to satisfy his Ma^{ty}.

T O M E

II.

1677.

Soon after this, the States of the Vnited Provinces thought it their wisest course not to depend upon the Negociation on foot in England, but to strike up a separte Peace with France upon termes agreed between them, leaving room for the rest of the Confederates to come in to it within a time prefixt. The knowledge of this caused the Prince of Orange to make that rash attempt we formerly mention'd, upon the French Army at S^t Denis, out of meer spite, when he knew the Peace was actually sign'd, hoping that if he could have made a thorow Victory of it, the War might still be continued; especially having for it on his side the Spaniards, and the Emperour, and also the house of Commons, who were all of them feircely bent against the Peace. The next day after the Battell the Express arrived from the States to their General, to signify to him the Conclusion of the Peace, of which it is said, he had the Articles in his pocket before the fight began; So that in conclusion, the lives of four or five thousand men were sacrificed (I may say in a time of peace) to the violent ambition of one man.

1678.

The States stricke up a separte Peace with France.

The P. of Orange out of spite, attacks the French at St. Denis, when he knew the Peace was actually sign'd.

Soon after, the King had concerted with the Prince of Orange the project of a Peace between France and the Confederates;

The King, in prosecution of the Plan of a

T O M E
II.

1678.

Peace, raises an Army of between 20 and 30 thousand men, in six weeks time, part of which are sent over into Flanders.

The Emperour and Spaine not having yet accepted of the Peace, the King proposes to y^e Parliament the keeping up his Army for the preservation of Flanders.

The House of Commons more jealous of the King's power, then of that of France, vote to have the Army immediately disbanded.

The Factious Party make it their busines to be rid of the Duke, to pull down the Ministers, and weaken the Crown.

D. Monmouth had several private meetings with L^d Russell, &c. in in prosecution therof, and to render it effectually, his Ma^{ty} raised an Army of between twenty and thirty thousand men in six weeks time, of as good troops as any where were to be seen; part of which were actually sent into Flanders for the defense of that Country, and more were daily transporting thither at the very time when the Hollanders clapp'd up their separate peace with France. Now in regard that Spaine and the Emperour had not yet accepted of the Peace, and that in Holland a great party, together with the Prince of Orange, were wholly averse to it, and condemned their Deputys as having exceeded their Commission in so hastily signing it, his Ma^{ty} when the Parliament met propos'd to them the keeping on foot his Army, as necessary for procuring a better and safer Peace by force of Arms, if by Treaty it could not be done, and also for being a significant Garentee of it when procured; especially since the Spaniards had declared, that by their single Forces Flanders could not be preserved, and that they expected constant succours from England and Holland, whose interest it was, as well as theirs, to have it preserved: But the answer and proceedings hereupon of the House of Commons made it plainly appear, That they were in reality more jealous of the King's power, then of the power of France; for notwithstanding all their former warm addresses for hindering the growth of the power of France, when the King had no Army, Now that he had one, they pass'd a Vote to have it immediately disbanded, and the Factious party which was then prevalent amongst them, made it their only busines to be rid of the Duke, to pull down the Ministers, and to weaken the Crown.

About this time, the Duke was inform'd of severall private meetings which the Duke of Monmouth had with Lord Russell, M^r. Montague, Sir Henry Capell, and others of the Party, in which was propos'd the removing of the Duke from Court, and laying aside the Lord Treasurer; which Lord being informed of the designs against him, endeavour'd to skreen himself by putting the King upon issuing out Proclamations and Orders of Councill from time to time, from (for) executing the Laws against Catholicks, banishing them from Court, and for searching after Preists with rewards to those that should take them; And at last, when he saw the storm coming neerer upon him, to shelter himself he stuck not to advise the King to send the Duke out of England: But all these litle Arts could not defend him from being at last not only turn'd out of the Ministry, but allso impeached in Parliament.

Here it ought to be observed in how different a manner the Duke carryd it towards the Lord Treasurer; for in April, 1678, a litle before the meeting of the Parliament, the Lord Russell and other considerable men of the party, sent to his R. H. to let him know, That if he would trust them, and joyn with them in what they should propose to him for the good both of his Ma^{ty} and of the Nation, they would undertake to remove the incapacity under which he lay of being high Admiral, or exercising any publick Office, and that they would do any thing els that might be for his Satisfaction; but that they expected from him his concurrence with them in prosecuting the Lord Treasurer, and removing him from his Employment. To this the Duke's Answer was, That he willingly would joyn with them in any thing he thought was for the good of the King and the Nation, but that to fall upon the King's Minister without the King's consent, unless he were visibly guilty of some great misbehaviour (which to his R. H. did not appear) he thought to be very contrary to the good both of the King and of the Nation, and therefore could not joyn with them in it, but advised them to take other measures.

This unsettled temper of the Factious Party, which one while was for attacking the Duke and at other times called for his assistance to attack others, would easily have been crushed, or

TOME II.

1678.
wth the removal of the Duke and L^d Treasurer is propos'd.

L^d Treasurer to shelter himself puts the King upon executing y^e Laws against Cath: and advises his Ma^{ty} to send the Duke out of England.

All L^d Treasurer's arts do not preserve him from being turned out and impeached.

L^d Russell and his party propose to the Duke to stand by him, and get him restor'd to all his Employments, if he would abandon L^d Treasurer to them, wth the Duke generously refuseth.

Oate's Plot.

TOME

II

1678.

have faded away of itself, had not a certain malicious contrivance of an indigent wretch which happen'd at this time, furnished them with an opportunity of executing their designs; which soon layd their enemies at their feet, and gave them a fairer occasion then ever they could have hoped for, not only of compassing their ends against the Duke, but of bringing the King too to their termes, and of shakeing the foundation of the Government itself: And as the greatest events oft times dirive their origin from the Slightest accidents, tis certain there was never so great a flame raised from one so trivial as this, which not only occasioned the spilling of much innocent blood, but had like to have sown the seeds of an other Civil War, while the memory of that so lately quenched was still fresh in the memorys of most men.

It fortun'd that ones Oates a poor and despicable Clergieman, either touched with scruples about Religion, or with designe of doing what he afterwards put in execution, went over to S^t Omers, where under pretence of becoming a Catholick, (he) was admitted into the English College there in order to study there and be instructed as others were in that place: but the Fathers soon perceiving his insincerity, and want of due dispositions to execute what he pretended, thought fit to dismiss him, who after some rambles returning to England, either out of revenge to the Jesuits who he thought had used him ill, or to gain a subsistence, being in the last degree of povertie and contempt, pretended he had made a discoverie of a Conspiracy, carried on amongst the Catholicks against the King and Government, which he knew the Factionous partie would greedily grasp at, bein already in such terrours at the Duke's being of that Religion out of whose hands, for that reason, they had been long contriving to wrest all power and command, and to create (if possible) a jealousie betwixt his R. H. and the King.

The Duke, on the other side, was not insensible to what dangers and persecutions he expos'd himself by changing his Religion, he knew he should ly open to those who would give him no quarter ; but he could never have imagin'd, nor indeed could the fury and malice of his Enemies ever have push'd their hatred so far as to banish him the Kingdome and almost exclude him from the Succession, had not this unfortunate pretended Popish Plot come into their assistance.

T O M E
II.

1678.

It is certain there was never any thing of that nature worse concerted in itself, nor more improbable in all its circumstances ; but meeting with a prodigious credulity in the people in relation to any thing which asperses Catholicks, and an implacable malice of some managers of it against the Duke, it rais'd such a storme as had like to have overwhelm'd both him and them ; and had not his Christian patience and magnanimity, his unshaken courage, and prudent conduct, gon beyon what we scarce have an example of in antiquity, he must necessarily have perished in it ; and not only he, but the King his Brother, and all the Loyal Partie been buried in the ruins of the Monarchy itself.

This pretended Plot or Conspiracy (which made so great a noise afterwards) had so perfect an air of the fabulous " reports which preceeded the late Revolution, that those who " remember'd it, thought themselves gon back to forty one, or " that the same—— and spirit was risen to life again : For " in stead of letters to M^r Pim, of horse and foot being muster'd " under ground, all people's ears were fill'd with dismall " rumours of a design to kill the King, and subvert the " Government to bring in Popery, and Arbitrary Power ; and " all this to be effected by an inconsiderable body of men, " who had neither numbers nor power, nor places of trust ; " but being charged upon the Papists and that the Jesuits " were the managers of it, all its motives of incredibility could "

KING JAMES 2^d.
HIS OWN MEMOIRS,
Tom. 7. p. 279, writ in his own hand.

TOME
II.

1678.
The first discovery of the Plot.

“ not hinder it from being greedely swallow’d downe, and “ beleived by the multitude.

“ The first information was brought to his Ma^{ty} at Windsor “ in August 1678, by one Kirby a broken merchant, but his “ errand was only to prepare the way for one Tongue, who sayd,
“ He had a great Plot to discover which concern’d his Ma^{ty} life,
“ the Protestant Religion, and present Government, but desired “ to come privately in the night, for should he (be) knowne, the “ Papists, he say’d, who were the contrivers of it would knock “ him in the head.

“ This man being introduced to the King, repeated the same “ Story, and left with his Ma^{ty} a bundle of papers for his further “ information, but they being long, he gave them to My Lord “ Treasurer to peruse: The substance of which was a most “ detestable Conspiracy against the King and Kingdom, sayd
“ to be carryed on not only by his own Subjects, but that “ Mons^r. Louuois the French King’s Minister and Pere la “ Chaise his Confessor, were privy to it; that Don-John of “ Austria encouraged it, and that the better to compass these “ wicked designs they intended to burn the City of London, “ and raise a Rebellion both in Scotland and Ireland; and “ that one Doctor Oates had got knowlidg of this horrid “ Conspiracy, by conterfiting himself a Papist, and entring “ amongst the Jesuits, where to ingratiate himself the more “ with them, he confess’d and communicated once a week, “ thō he still remain’d a Protestant in his heart.

“ This surprising relation besides its other extraordinary “ circumstances, seem’d to afect his R. H. so much that My “ Lord Treasurer proposed the acquainting him with it “ immediately, but the King thought it more prudent first to “ examin it; to the end it might not be objected, that it had “ been communicated to any one what ever of that perswasion, “ before he had searched it to the bottom himself.

KING JAMES MEMOIRES
TOM. 8.
pag. 232.

TOM. 7.
pag. 282.

But the Duke came (to) the knowledg of it sooner than was intended, by an other way : It seems upon the first discovery, My Lord Treasurer had desir'd to see some thing under the hands of those who were accused, because the Informer pretended they trusted him still with the greatest Secretts, and even their Letters themselves ; this was too reasonable a request to be denyd, so he readily promised it, but being dilatory in the performance was earnestely pressed over and over again, till at last he writ a note to My Lord Treasurer to tell him, That if he would send to the post house and intercept certain letters directed to M^r. Bedingfeild who was the Duke's Confessor, they will convince him of the truth of all he had Sayd.

T O M E
II.

1678.
KING JAM:
MEM. To. 8.
pag. 330.

The five Letters sent to Windsor.

It fortun'd that My Lord Treasurer was not at Windsor when this note came, and M^r. Bedingfeild passing by the Post Office just as the Mail arrived, call'd for his letters himself, and had five deliver'd him made up in a thick paket, which were sign'd Whitebread, Fennick, Ireland, Blundel, and Fogarty ; the four first being Jesuits he was acquainted with their hands, and soon perceiv'd these letters were not writ by them, the last being a person he knew not could say nothing to it, but finding treasonable expressions in them all, suspected there was some Villany intended by them, both against Catholicks in general and the Duke in particular, so carryd them streight to his R. H. and he immediatly to the King ; whereby the person that was marked out for the traitor, and the Duke who was principally aim'd at in the contrivance, became by Providence the first discoverers of this pretended Conspiracy.

The first letter the King light on was signed Blundel, which as soon as he read he tould the Duke he was of his opinion, that there was some wicked contrivance in it, but

KING JAM. Mth
Tom. 7. p. 283.
Tom. 8. p. 334.

TOME “ that he was confident he could find it out, having seen a II. “ hand not unlike it and would compare them together.

1678.
 K. J. M^r.
 Tom. 8. p. 335.

“ The Duke press’d the King and Lord Treasurer severall “ times that the letters might be produced and read, and the “ business examin’d into at the Committee of foraign affaires; but that Lord, it seems, had conceiv’d some hopes that this pretended Conspiracy might stand him in stead when the Parliament met, and serve to skreen him from their displeasure (which he much apprehended) by turning their eyes and atten“ tion an other way ; so the Duke could get nothing done in “ it, till a little before the King went to Newmarket, when at “ last the matter was carryd before the Councill.

The Examination of Oates in Council.
 Tom. 8. p. 231.

“ As soon as Oates was brought in he tould the King, He “ had ventur’d his life for his Ma^{ty} at Sea, and his soul for him “ at Land, and was now come to discover a hellish Conspiracy;
 “ and then began his Narration with so much assurance, and “ accompanyd it with such circumstances, as would have “ imposed almost upon any body, and did actually so, at first, “ upon severall there present, till by cross examination the “ vilany of it began to appear.

K. J. M^r.
 Tom. 7. 286.

“ One of the first things they asked him, was If he knew
 “ the hands of those persons, which the five letters were “ pretended to come from? Which he assured them he did, so “ a line or two of each letter was shewne him, and he imme-“ diatly tould whose it was, wh^{ch} proveing accordingly (that is “ to say as they were sign’d) gave him great credit at first; but “ afterwards when M^r. Ireland and Fennick’s peapers, which “ had been seized, were compared with the letters pretended “ to be writt by them, there was not the least similitude: This “ put Oates a litle to shifts, who alledged they were their “ counterfeit hand. But when M^r. Ireland was brought before “ the Council himself, he proved, That whereas the letter bore

date from S'Omer's in August, that he was then in England, and had not been beyond Seas of a long time, and when Blondel's letter was compar'd with Tongue's depositions, it appear'd to all present, to be the same hand writeing, and the other four letters to be conterfeat also ; So that Oates his telling so readily at first sight whose letters they were, proved an argument of their forgery, and that he and Tongue had been both the contrivers and writers of them themselves: Nay Sir William Jones, thō afterwards so violent a prosecutor of the Plot, being then Attorney-General, and Sir Robert Southwell one of the Clarkes of the Council, tould the Duke, upon comparison of the narrative and letters, they were perswaded Oates writ every one of them himself; and their never producing any of them at the Tryalls afterwards, was a demonstration they looked upon them as forged peapers, that would have made against them: And it was a great omission in those who were accused, that they made not more use of them themselves; for all the five letters (besides what has been sayd) were full of false spelling, neither point, comma, nor marke of distinction in them, which had not the air of coming from men of business; and as to Oates' pretence, that it was a common artifice amongst the Jesuits to writ in that mañer to avoid suspicion, and thought that a few faults in the writing would hide it; or who can imagine, that five persons in different places and even different Nations, should agree to write their own names false (as they were in the letters) and false the same way; should write the same false English, and writ upon paper that had the same marke and same size, to agree in the same cant and affectation, which upon examination was found all to be so? Nothing less than an inspiration could worke this miracle; whereas, on the contrary, whoever compares the periods, the manner of expression, and even strokes of the pen, TOME with Oates' and Tongue's originall papers, will find they all came out of the same mint.

II.

1678.
Oates description of Don John.
Tom: 7. p: 293.

“ But Oates is not discouraged with these rebukes, nor out of countenance with the discovery of this forgery ; but continues his narration still persisting, That he was a great instrument or agent of the Jesuits, to carry on their designes, not only in England, but France and Spain too, that he had personal conferences about it with the French King's Confessor, and that in Spain Don John had admitted him into his presence, where he saw the mony tould out for Sir George Wakeman to poison the King ; but this had as litle ressemblance to the Spanish formes, as the description he made of him of his person, for the King askeing him, what sort of man Don John was ? he sayd he was leane, tall, and black, whereas the King and Duke knew him to be a litle, fat, and well complexion'd man, thō he had browne hair ; and when afterwards Oates was blamed by M^r Kirkby for so gross a mistake, he replyd by way of excuse, He might well give a wrong description of a man he had never seen in his life.

Tom: 8. p: 234.

VOL. OF LETTERS. P. I.

KING JAM. Mth
Tom: 7. p: 294.
Oates's contradictions.

Tom. 8. p. 236.

“ He was no less unfortunate in his answers in reference to France; for being asked in what house that King's Confessor lived, and where he spoke with him ? He (replied in the) Jesuits' house just by the King's house, whereas the Jesuits have no house with in a mile of the Louvre : but neither this could discompose his modesty nor interrupt his narration, so he goes confidently on accusing several persons of quality ; and when he named My Lord Arrundel and Bellasis, the King tould him those Lords had served him and his Father faithfully, and that unless the proofs against them were very cleere, he would give no credit to them : To which Oates replyd, God forbid he should accuse any one unjustly, he did not say they knew it, but were to be acquainted with it, thō afterwards he accus'd them posi- " T O M E tively, which contradictions My Lord Stafford urged with " II.

several others at his tryal, but My Lord's Chancellor's ill " = memory made it useless to him ; whereas if he had applyd " 1678.
to some others present, they both remember'd it and were " willing to have born that testimony to truth, as would have " manifested the Vilany of the wittnes, and might have saved " that Inocent Lord's life. "

But, in reality, he did not positively accuse any Lord, " till he had been before the house of Commons, and that he " saw how they relish'd it ; nor did he till then, give them " their different imployments, which how fit they were for, all " the world might judge, nor did he make so much as a pro- " bable story of it, till some Members of that House had licked " it into shape ; as if his Ma^{ty} might not be trusted with what " concern'd his own life, or that the Parliament and wittnesses " were more zealous for it than he himself : But there was no " great Signes of that, since they did not accuse the Queen and " Duke, till a considerable time after, who were certainly the " most dangerous Plotters, if they were so at all ; and when " they did, besides the improbability of that accusation, it had " the misfortune to carry its contradictions along with it alsoe ; " for when Oates gave in his information to the House of Lords, " Tom. 8. p. 238.
and had solemnly declar'd upon Oath, That he had no accu- " sation against any person of quality soever but who he then " named, yet a fortnight after he accused the Queen : but this " indeed was a Christian liberty always allow'd him of contra- " dicting at pleasure what he had sworne before, so he assured "
My Lord Chancellor when Colman was examin'd at Councill, " that he never saw him before, but at his tryal he tould " an other story : In fine he was trusted, he sayd, with their " greatest and most dangerous secretts, and yet, he con- " fessed they would not trust him with mony for his coach "

T O M E
II.

1678.

K. JAM. M^{ms}.
Tom. 8. p. 251.

“ hire, when he went to Dover, but sent Groue along with him “ to pay it ; he pretended to have deliver’d so many commis“ sions, and kept not so much as one for a proof, thō he “ assured the King his intention was from the first to discover
“ all ; he swore so many armes were brought, and yet none “ were ever found, Armyes he sayd were rais’d, and yet none “ ever appear’d ; nevertheless upon his testimony and his assis“ tant Bedloe’s (who att his first appearance too tould the two “ Secretarys he knew nothing of the Plot, onely Sir Edmond “ Bury Godfrey’s murther) so many persons were imprison’d, “ prosecuted, and put to death, and rais’d such a furious com“ motion as had like to have swallow’d up not only the Duke “ (against whom it was cheifly aim’d) but the King and “ Monarchy it self.

The designe of the Plot was the destruction of the Duke.
Oate’s Narrative Fol. 9. 17.
19. 13. 16. &c.

There cannot be a greater prooffe that this contrivance was cheifly level’d at his R. H. then the injurious expressions which were sowne and dispers’d thorough all Oate’s narratives and informations ; he makes no scruple of calling the Duke a Rascal, a Papist, and a Traitor, he shall be hang’d, says he, and I hope to live to see it, we will have no more regard for him than if he were a Scavanger of Kent Street ; he hoped (he sayd) to see him at the barr of the house of Commons, where there were many better men than he, if the devil has a hotter place in Hell than an other, he hop’d he would bestow it upon him : These were the flowers of his eloquence, and such the temper of the times as to suffer so infamous a Varlet to vomite out these outrages against the King’s own Brother, and a Prince who was it not for his Religion, would have been the darling and Idol of the People ; but it were as endless as unnecessary, to enumerate all his abuses, contradictions, and blunders, which are sufficiently layd open by *one who neither injur’d him nor spar’d him : And the King himself was so fully apris’d of the Vilany from the beginning, that he intended to

* Sir Roger L’Estrange’s Hist. of the Times.

have nipp'd it in the budd, and hinder'd it from being made publick, which he sayd would alarme all the Kingdom, and put thoughts of killing him into men's heads who had no such thoughts before, had he not been diverted from it by the Treasurer, who foreseeing a Storme gathering against himself, thought to cover his own head and elude the Parliament's displeasure, by throwing this pretended Conspiracy before the house of Commons, assoon as they met; which otherwise, as the Duke had earnestly press'd, might have been fully sifted into, and the forgery detected by the Council it self, before the Sessions, had not that Lord industriously delayd it. But such was the infelicity of those times, and the people so ready to take fire at the least rumour of a Popish Conspiracy, that when it was communicated to the two Houses of Parliament, they catch'd at it with such avidity, that all the contradictions, improbabilitys, and even impossibilitys of the narration were swallow'd downe with greedyness, and the factious Party, which was already but too much bent against the Duke on account of his Religion, were overjoyd to find themselves possess'd of so favourable a conjuncture of working his utter ruin.

The first step they made, was to petition the King to put the penal Laws in execution; which they press'd with that violence as he thought it necessary to yeeld a litle to the current, and issued out a Proclamation for banishing Preists &c. On which occasion the Duke met with a sensible mortification from a hand he did not expected it, for when it was moved in Council that the Dutchess's Preists might be excepted, as well as the Queen's, and those of Forreign Ministers, it was absolutely refused as a priviledge too great for a Subject; but, as an expedient, proposed inserting them into the Queen's List: But her Ma^{ty} (thō the Duke and King himself desir'd it) would never consent, which was a great tryal of their R. H.^{ss} patience, to find themselves soe soon

" The Parl.
petitions the putting in execution the penal Laws.
" Tom. 7. p. 297.

TOME “ abandon’d by one, from whom they expected the greatest II. “ favours and support.

1678.

It is moved in Parl: that the Duke should absent from Council and busines.

Tom. 7. p: 302.

“ But this was only a begining of the evil, his R. H. must “ prepare himself for greater tryals, who soon after had intelli“ gence of an intended banishment, which concern’d him much “ nearer. On the 2^d of November the Earle of Shaftsbury “ moved in the Lord’s House, that the Duke might be removed “ from all Councils and publick affaires. He had not yet the “ confidence to extend it to an exile from Court too; thō his “ Highness by this begining might easily see what it would “ come too. The next day the matter was taken into consi“ deration by his Ma^{ty}, who gave positive orders to all his “ servants and friends to oppose any motion of that nature, “ which might come into the house of Commons.

The King
 desires it.
 Tom. 7. p: 303.

“ But the King was not able to hould long to this resolution,
 “ the stream began to run so violently against the Duke, that “ he thought it impossible to defend him, unless he himself “ would temporise a little; wherefore the next day after the “ Commitee for forreign affaires was risen, he call’d the Duke “ aside and tould him, That notwithstanding the foregoing “ order, it would not be in his power to support him against “ such addresses, as he foresaw would be brought in his dis-“ favour, unless he would yeeld him some ground to stand “ upon in his defence, and forbear coming to the Commitee of “ forreign affaires, and decline meddling any more in publick “ busines; which, he sayd, would give him a just pretence to “ reject and obviate any farther attempts of his Enemys.

The Duke’s
 answer.

“ To this the Duke replyd, He was allways disposed to sacri“ fice his person and interest to his Ma^{ty}’s Service and ease,
 “ and would readily obey him when ever he commanded it,
 “ but could never do it willingly and of his own accord; first,
 “ he sayd, Because in stead of stopping their mouths, it would
 “ on the contrary encourage his Enemys to press on farther, if they saw his Ma^{ty} once give ground ; Secondly, that he being " T O M E in a resolution to content the people in reference to Religion " II.

 and other things, it would give such as were not his freinds " 1678.
 some coulour to say, that now the world might see so soon as " the Duke was out of the Council all things were done to the " general Satisfaction of the Kingdom ; they would infer from " thence, what a mighty influence he formerly had in the direc- " tion of affaires, and then by imagining that as soon as the " Parliament was up, he would infallibly reasume the same " again, if he remain'd at Court, they would raise from thence " an argument for his withdrawing from it too ; and he very " much apprehended the same reasons would then be urged " for his compliance to that, which were now made use of for " his absenting from Council. "

It soon appear'd the Duke was not mistaken in his conjecture, for within five days after, the House voted an Adress to be made to the King, That his R. H. might withdraw from his Ma^{ty}s person as well as Councells ; but the King finding they run on so fast, and that they already began to talke of excluding him from the Succession, thought it necessary to stop their career : He went therefore next day to the House of Lords in his Robes, and calling up the Commons tould them amongst other things, That he would pass any Bills they should devise in favour of, or for the support of the Protestant Religion, both in his own time and future ages, provided they went not about to impeach the Succession or the right of the Crown in the true Line. •

They vote that the Duke should withdraw from Court.
JOURNAL: N^o 8.
 1678.

When they saw his Majesty espouse his Brother's defense so heartily, it check'd their prosecution of him a litle, So that " when the Bill for disabling Papists from sitting in Parlia- " ment, came up to the Lords, after a hot Debate it was " carryd at last in favor of a proviso to exempt the Duke from " the penalty of that Act. It was observed that the Duke of " Monmouth went out of the House before the debate ended, "

The Duke exempted from the penalty in the Act.
TOM. 7. p: 311.

T O M E

II.

1678.

“ to avoid voteing, which the Duke could not refrain complaining of to the King, and tould him he fear’d not so much his open and his hidden enemys, especially one who had so great an interest with his Ma^{ty}; that for a long time he had suspected the Duke of Monmouth’s friendship, he saw plainly he affected popularity, and was great with the Earle of Essex and Lord Wharton, and had reason to believe there was no ill understanding betwixt him and My Lord Shaftsbury himself; and that he frequently permitted his health to be drunk under the title of Prince of Wales: in fine, this complaint was too well grounded for the King to take amiss, nor did his affection to the Duke of Monmouth hinder his Ma^{ty} from blaming him for his cariage on those occasions.

Tom: 7. p: 313.

“ This proviso in favour of the Duke sustain’d a hot Debate, when it was carryd back to the house of Commons; but thō the Presbiterians to a man, and those they term’d the moderate men amongst the Country Partie, voted against it, however by the helpe of the Lord Treasurer’s friends, which some fancyd would have taken an other ply, the Court Partie carried it for the Duke, and on the 30th of November the Bill pass’d accordingly.

The credit of the Plot which hithertoo had but the support of one witness, and that a blasted one too, seem’d very much to abate; people began to lay things together, and make use of their eyesight and understanding which at first they were haired out of; but the death of Sir Edmond Bury Godfrey was so menaged (Oct. 17.) as not only to revive, but highten the fury of it to a great degree.

S^r ROGER ESTRANGE HIST: THE TIMES.
PART: 3: p: 185.

This gentleman being a justice of peace was the first that took Oates and Tongue’s information, of which he made no formal discovery, but on the contrary treated it as a ridiculous Story; but finding afterwards he made such a noise, he was terrifyd with the apprehensions of having committed a sort of Misprision, which being lighten'd with some threats from those who were displeas'd at his endeavouring to stifle the Plot, and most of all by his own melancholy, no one doubts but this unfortunate Gentleman layd violent hands upon himself.

T O M E
II.

1678.
Ibid. 181.

Bedloe's Information.

But the People sufficiently disposed to charge the Papists with whatever was amiss, fail'd not to credit the rumour industriously spread a broad, That he was murther'd by them; and thereupon his Ma^{ty} was prevail'd with, to issue a Proclamation with a reward of 500*l*, for the discovery in what manner he dyd. Such a summe, and so great incouragement to informers, was sure to bring them another at least, which was much wanted; accordingly the Proclamation was no sooner out, but Bedloe came to one Brewer and tould him, If he could possibly procure a description of Sir Edmond Bury Godfrey, he doubted not but he could get the 500*l*. and oft times consulted with his Brother (who had been his partner on like occasions) how to compass that affair: In fine his necessitys pressing, and 500*l*. quickening his invention, the matter was soon concerted, and on the 8th of November he depos'd before the Lords, “ That “ Sir Edmond Godfrey was murther'd in Sommerset house by “ My Lord Bellassis' directions; that he himself, with some “ Jesuits had decoyd this Knight into the Court, where others “ suddenly rushing upon him out of a door, forced him into the “ house and there murther'd him; that his body remain'd
“ there two days, and was at last carryd to the place where it “ was found: He made a long narration of the manner which “ amazed people at first, but upon recollection the King “ remember'd he was at Sommerset House himself at the very “ time he swore the murther was committed; this made his “ Ma^{ty} doubt the truth of what he sayd, and to send the Duke “ of Monmouth with Bedloe to Sommerset house, to shew him “ upon the place where every thing pass'd. When the Duke “ of Monmouth return'd, he tould the King the room, where

T O M E “ Bedloe Sayd he saw the body ly, was the Queen’s backstaires, II. “ which being the common passage for all the Queen’s Servants, 1678. “ the place through which her meat was carryed, and where “ the footmen constantly waited, confirm’d the King in the “ beliefe of its being all a fiction ; besides his haveing been there “ at that time himself, made it impossible that a man should “ be assaulted in the Court, murder’d, and hurryd into the “ backstaires, when there was a Centry at every door, a foot “ company on the Guard, and yet nobody see or knew any “ thing of it.

Tom. 7. p. 331. The King, therefore, was as early aprised of the Vilany of his information as he had been of Oates’s which made him deny “ at first to prolong Bedloe’s pardon, thō earnestly begg’d by the “ house of Commons ; and there is no doubt but all judicious men would have been of the same opinion, had not the violence of those factious men frighted people out of their understanding, by flying into great heats upon this refusall, charging it upon the Ministers and Chancellors, whose advice, they sayd, had been always of fatal consequence to the Nation.
 They found this ferment the world was in, a fit occasion to carry on their darke designes against the Duke, and true or false were resolved not to let it dye ; for in the bottom it was not so much a Popish Conspiracy that frighted them, as a Popish Successor, and their apprehensions were soon removed from the Plot, to the Religion of those who were Sayd to be the authors of it ; it was not so much out of love for their present Sovereigne, as the fear of him that was to come after, so that under the notion of preserving one, they were resolved, if possible, to prevent and ruine the other.

They begin to project how to disapoint the Duke of y^e Succession.

Their first project, in order to this, was to put the King in a capacity of having Children of his own to succeed him ; there was no hopes by the Queen, and the readiest way to get rid of her, was to bring her into the Plot : her dignity, they knew, would be no discouragement to their Champion Oates, he was too good a Christian to bear respect to Persons, but like a Son of Thunder was ready to strike the lofti opt cedar, as well all (as) the Lowest shrub, as his managers thought fit to direct him.

T O M E
II.
1678.

On the 25th of November, therefore, he repeated before the Council what he had sayd the night before to his Ma^{ty}, That the Queen was privy to the whole designe and n one more foreward to carry it on than herself; that he had heard her Majesty say in Sommerset house, she was resolved to poison the King for the injurys he had done her; they doubted not but the King's inclinations to liberty would favour this project: So they had sent one M^r. Elliot as from Oates before hand, to acquaint him with this information; which when the King seem'd to discredit, and urged the impossibility of it, she tould him, She thought he would have been glad to have parted with the Queen on any terms.

TOM: 7. p: 333.
The Queen is accus'd of the Plot.

TOM. 7. p: 309.

But this, instead of proving a temptation, made no other impression on the King, than to give him a greater horreur then ever of those infamous practices; for when My Lord Ossory and Bridgwater were sent with Oates to Sommerset house, to shew the place where he pretended to have heard the Queen say those words he accused her of, he directed them first to the guard room, then to the Privy Chamber out of which, he sayd, went up a pair of backstaires into a great roome; but unfortunatly for him, there were neither any such staires there about, nor any large roome in that story. But this unexhaustable fountain of impudence as well as invention, was not dejected, nor out of countenance at all these disapointments, nor would discover (thō earnestly press'd to it) who put him upon this detestable project.

Ibid. 333.

It was now perspicuous enough what all the management of the Plot tended to, The Duke saw plainly that all droue at his head, that his Enemys were resolved to move heaven, earth,

TOME

II

1678.

Tom. 7. 349.

Tom: 7. 325.

Ibid. 349.

and even hell itself to prevent his coming to the Crown ; this made it more necessary for him to arme against them, and endeavour to fix the King in his good resolutions and prepare him for the assault by representing the difficultys before hand, and what he knew would be urged against him ; he was not insensible of the King's ductile spirit, and the opinion his “ Subjects had of him ; That M^r. May had sayd lately at a factious “ meeting in reference to My Lord Treasurer, that they need

“ but opiniate the matter and he was sure the King would “ yeeld at last, which method he knew would not be neglected

“ by those who sought his destruction ; he begg'd therefore

“ of his Ma^{ty} to take his condition into mature deliberation,

“ and weigh well with himself how far he was resolved to “ support and stand by him, in case the Parliament press'd

“ to have him removed from his presence, and perhaps to have “ his person secured : He acquaint him likewise with the “ Cabals the Duke of Monmouth had of late with My Lord

“ Russell, M^r. Montague, Sir Henry Capel, and others of that “ gang, where it had been proposed, that he should be “ removed from Court and My Lord Treasurer layd aside ;

“ that the Duke of Monmouth proffer'd to joyne with them

“ in any thing for the attaining these two points, that they all “ agreed to these resolutions except M^r. May ; that at all these “ meetings they flattered the Duke of Monmouth with what “ pleas'd him best, and that Sir Thomas Armstrong had sayd “ upon Severall occasions, That the Duke of Monmouth had “ assured him that the King had promis'd to declare him very “ soon Prince of Wales ; but that if he did not, and that his “ Ma^{ty} should dy, he had four wittnesses ready to swear that

“ the King was marryed to M^{rs}. Barloe the Duke of Monmouth's “ Mother.

The Lord Tresurer had already acquainted the King with these Scandelous reports, who had rebuked the Duke of Monmouth for them, and therefore promis'd his R. H. he would doe what was proper, to satisfy the world of the falsety of those discourses, but those reprimands made no great change in that young Duke's conduct; the cunning managers who had him now in their hands had dazled his eyes with the glimering of a Crowne, they saw the King would not give into their project of parteing with the Queen, so they resolved to try if they could make the world belive he was married before, for all ways were alike agreeable that lead them to the Duke's destruction.

It is not to be wonder'd that the Duke of Monmouth, who had more ambition than judgment and more adress to Court an interest than prudence to manage it, should fancy himself within reach of a Scepter, when he saw the Duke (whom he thought the only obstacle) Soe furiously batter'd on all hands, especially being flatter'd in his folly not only by his great freinds, and in privat meeting, but his very footmen began to " Tom. 8. p. 1.
talke publickly of the wittness that could prove the King's " marriage with his Mother, and Collonell Birck a great leader " in the house of Commons made no mistery of it, but " Tom. 7. 361.
proposed it with other expedients to the Lord Treasurer, " telling him it was in his power to bring that about which " would make the Kingdom happy and endear his memory " for ever to it, but the Treasurer tould him the King abhor'd " the owning such an untruth; whereby that project of " tempting his Ma^{ty} to concurr with them in excluding the " Duke, proved as unsuccesfull as the other.

That Lord's credit with the King as yet was very great, which made Collonell Birck think it in his power to persuade him to any thing, but it was now nearer a period than either of them imagin'd; he had been long maligned by the factious " party who in their privat meetings had projected his ruin, " and commission'd the Duke of Monmouth to acquaint the "

The L^d Treasurer's ruin projected.

TOME II. “ King, they would furnish him with whatever mony his 2678. “ necessitys requir’d, on condition he would lay aside the “ Treasurer ; for besides the common envy (which never fails “ to attend great favorits) they suspected him (thō very “ undeservedly) to be great friend of his R. H. This was not the least of their motives to seeke his ruin, which these litle contrivances would never have brought about in all probability, had not another accident given a fitter opertunity to compass their ends.

Tom. 7. 365.

“ Sir Lyonel Jenkins inform’d the King, that M^r. Montague
 “ when Ambassador in France had several private meetings with “ the Pope’s Nuntio : this probably was only a pretence, but “ the King being otherwise ill satisfyd with his seruices a broad,
 “ and his carriage at home, thought fit to order his papers to “ be seiz’d, and S^r John Earneley was directed to acquaint
 “ the House of Commons with the reasons his Ma^{ty} had to “ proceed in that manner against a Member of theirs ; But it “ seems M^r. Montague had some apprehension of what was “ intended, and had secured those peapers elsewhere, which the “ King designed to have taken ; this he acquaints the House “ with, intimating at the same time they contain’d matters of “ consequence, which he knew was enough to rais their “ curiosity and make them be sent for out of hand.

This Gentleman, thō so lately imployd by the King, was now linked with the discontented partie, whose study it was to inflame the people ; and these papers containing the substance of a certain negociation with the French King, which he knew would be no ways agreeable to the House and ruinous to the Treasurer (which was an other of his aims) made him use this contrivance to publish them, because the sole direction of that affair had been in My Lord Danby’s hands : nor was he mistaken in his conjecture, for the Treasurer was soon after impeach’d upon it. The King indeed staved it off for a time, but was forced to leave him to the Law at last, and thō they wanted matter to bring him to a tryal, he endured severall years imprisonment, and had a long contest with the formalitys of Westminster-hall and Priviledges of Parliament ere he get clear of his accusation: But M^r. Montague will never clear himself of that infamous brand of treachery, that being trusted in a forreign Embacy divulged his Master's secretts to satisfy his own private malice against the Minister, and help on the prosecution against the Duke which he knew was so disagreeable to the King his Master.

In the mean time the credit of the Plot was supported by taking up people of all ranks, and promises of reward to who Soever should make farther discoverys, which with a secure protection, and weekely pension could not fail of bringing in a recrute of Informers: Accordingly one Prance, Dugdale, Dangerfeild, Smith, and a numberless crew of indigent wretches offer'd themselves for that Service, who in the end became as burthensome to their Masters, as they were for a time to his Majesty's Treasury; for notwithstanding the Parliament would not give the King a groat, yet forced him to maintain this rabble of witnesses thō the tooles which he Saw were made use of to worke his own and his Brother's ruin.

Being now provided with So strong a body of Evidences, the Plot managers enter'd upon action; and the King leaveing the Law to its course, they left likewise bloody markes behind them wherever they pass'd. The first object of their fury was M^r. Colman; to be sure his haveing been of the Duke's family recommended him to the honour of his precedency, for it was there they stroue to fix a suspicion and odium, he had been " long look'd upon as a busy man, and formerly accused by one " Luzansy, but being of ready wit and good tongue brought " himself of; however he was generally hated, which the Duke " perceiving had oft forwarn'd him to be careful how he "

Colman condemned.
K. J. M^r.
Tom: 8. 381.

T O M E

II.

1678.

“ carryd himself, not to be so busy and meddlesome, and that “ if he run himself again into troubles, he must (not) thinke that “ being the Dutchesse’s Secretary would protect him; and “ indeed he was soon after discharg’d from that imployment “ by his Majesty’s Command, so that he appear’d seldome at “ Court, but being known to depend on the Duke, Sir Edmond “ Bury Godfrey made choice of him, to send his Highness an “ account of Oates’ and Tongue’s depositions assoon as he had “ taken them. The Duke perceiving Oates had named Colman, “ bid him look to himself, for he was sure to find no favour,
 “ and therefore if he had any papers that might hurte him, to “ secure them immediately; but he apprehending no danger, “ let them be seized, however kept close himself, and sent to “ advise with the Duke whether he should deliver himself up “ or not? The Duke replyd, He knew best what was in his “ papers; if they contain’d any expression which could possibly “ be wrested to an ill sence, he had best not apear, otherwise “ the surrendering himself, would be an argument of innocency;
 “ he did accordingly, but found by experience that innocency
 “ was no protection in such turbulent times, nor did Oates’s “ having tould the Chancellor in Council he had never seen him “ before, hinder his being a Witness against him at the tryal;
 “ so he was condemned on the 27th of November and executed
 “ soon after.” (Dec. 3.)

K. J. M^{rs}.
 Tom. 8. 238.

Haveing now dipp’d their hands in blood they run on with greater fury, and cut themselves out more worke of the same nature. M^r. Irelands, Pickeing and Groue were condemn’d, and the House of Commons impeach’d the Lords Stafford, Arundel of Vardor, Bellasis, Powis, and Petre, and were running up higher, when the King thought it necessary to stop their career, and take a litle time to breath: So prorogued them till the 4th of February, and on the 24th of January dissolved them quite: thus ended that Parliament which had sat 17 years, 1678.

 The Long Parliament dissolved.

and had been assembled to heal those National wounds which had bled neare 20 years before; and thō it had then concurr'd " with unexpressable joy to reestablish injured Monarchy, it " was broaken for endeavouring with as much ardor and " earnestness to pull it downe again. But who could have " imagin'd, they had been capable of forgetting so soon the miserys of the late Rebellion, as to run headlong into the same abbyss again? and to fly with so much fury in the face of the Royall Family, whose reestablishment had so lately been the worke of their own hands, and to whose return they owed the Peace, Laws, and Libertys of the Nation?

TOME II.

1671.
K. J. M.
Tom. 7. 358.

The morning before the King prorogu'd the Parliament, " Prance one of the Witnesses desired to be brought to him; " where he fell upon his knees, and asked pardon for what he " had done, and in the presence of M^r. Chiffins, and Captain " Richardson, declare that all he swore about the Plot or Sir " Edmond Bury Godfrey's death was false; but when he was " reconducted to prison, the condemn'd hole and My Lord " Shaftsbury's charitable exhortations so refresh'd his memory, " that he stood to his first depositions, and remain'd as vallide a " Wittness as ever. "

K. JA. M.
Tom: 7. 369.
Prancerecants.

These publick reproaches and the Parliament dissolution, hinder'd not the tryals of those who were accused; so Green, Bary, and Hill were soon after condemn'd and executed for S^t Edmond Bury Godfrey's death, chiefly upon the evidence of this very man that had made so sollem a recantation before, and thō Bary always had lived, and now dyd a Protestant, and to the last denyd the facts he was condemned for, as all others did who suffer'd; nevertheless it made little or no impression on the publick, no more than the innumerable Wittnesses as well as Dyery from the beginning of August till the end of September, That M^r. Ireland was travelling all that time in Staffordshire when Oates deposed he was in Flanders and writt a letter from S^t

Green, Bary, and Hill condemned.

LETTERS,
Vol. I. pag: 17.

TOME
II.

1674.
K. Jam. M^{rs}.
Tom. 8. 254.

Mr. White-bread and Fenwick condemn'd.

Omiers; upon which he was notwithstanding condemned. (Feb. 10.)
“ Mr. Whitebread and Fenwick had been arrain’d at the same “ time, but there being no Wittness but Oates against them, “ they were remanded to Prison, for Bedloe then declared he “ had nothing to say against them, yet soon after upon pre“ tended recollection he accus’d them, and they were condemned “ and hang’d upon his evidence: Such in fine was the prepos“ session of all ranks of people in favour of the Plot, that the “ highest improbabilities, the absurdest contradictions, the most “ apparent falsetys, the asseverations, of dying men, the infamy
“ and manifest perjury of the Wittnesses, made not the least “ impression in behalfe of the accused, either upon Parliament, “ Judge, or Jury.”

The disposition of the Parliament when dissolved and the present temper of the people was such, as gave little hopes the next would be better; so the Duke drew no great argument of Safety from thence, but cast about how to shelter his head
“ from the storme which both his Catholick and Protestant “ friends thought impossible for him to wether, and therefore “ agreed it would be as unsafe as difficult to remain’d any longer
“ at Court, So My Lady Powis was deputed from the Lords
“ in the Tower to beg of his Highness to withdraw into som “ neighbouring Country, France excepted.

The Duke considers his condition, and lays it open to the King.

But thō the Duke was sencible of his danger, he was neither discouraged nor dejected; his inclinations rather lead him to bear up against adverse fortune, than tamely to submitt, he knew very well how to distinguish betwixt Christian patience and pussillanimity, and whenever he gave way, it was his obedience, not his fear that caus’d it, for whatever his Ma^{ty} commanded, had always the force of a most sacred Law with him.

K. JA. M^{rs}.
To: 8. p. 19.

“ About the middle therefore of February he lays open his “ condition and his heart again to the King; he tells him, “ That in obedience to his Commands, he had withdrawn himself from his Councells, and the meddling in publick affaires, that neverthelesse whatever was ill relished by the people was still layd at his door; this did not Surprise him, he sayd, for he foresaw it would be so, and was always of opinion that his absenting from Councill and business would be of no advantage to his Ma^{ty}s affairs, or his own, but only serve his Enemys for an argument to follow the blow, and have him removed from Court likewise, without which he knew they would never be Satisfyd, and therefore expected his Ma^{ty} would be press'd hard upon very speedily to doe it: He was not insensible, he said, in how ill a situation his Ma^{ty}s affairs at present were, and how hard it would be for him to sustain such a battery as was raising against him, and therefore begged of him to consider well with himself how far he was resolved to stand by him, and that he would pleas not to flatter him with the believe that he would and could doe more for him than in effect he should be able to performe; that he saw clearly enough the odium he lay under, and therefore was fully prepar'd to make a sacrifice of his Country, Liberty, and Life itself, if necessary for his Ma^{ty}s Service and ease.

This discours as it confirm'd the King in the opinion he always had of his Brother's sincere affection, and perfect obedience, so it endear'd him the more; at the same time he thought it impossible to keep him with him: but before he tooke a final resolution in that matter he gave way to another tentative, which if it had succeeded would not only he knew calme the fury of his Enemys, but make him even the object of the people's love whom now they Seem'd to hate and persecute so grivously.

The Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of Winchester came one morneing and desired an Audience from the Duke, who being brought into his Closet, the Archbishop began a

The Bishops perswade y^e Duke to become a Protestant.
K. JAM. Mth.
Tom: 8. 23.

T O M E
II.

167.

“ well order’d discours representing the great trouble it was to “ him in particular, to his Breethren, and all the Nation, that “ his Highness should withdraw himself from the Communion
 “ of the Church of England, in which he was born and bred,
 “ and for which his Father of blessed memory had suffer’d so “ glorious a Martirdom; and enlargeing in commendations “ of its doctrine, sayd, It was not only more agreeable to the “ word of God, but more sutable to Monarchy than that of “ any other Church; that thō it had been always persecuted,
 “ it still florished like a lilly amongst thornes, so wonder’d “ his Highness could leave it, to embrace the communion of “ the Church of Rome, which if he would given leave to lay “ before him the arguments he was prepared with, he would “ convince him; held many doctrines contrary to the word of “ God; for which reason, he sayd, it was a standing artifice “ amongst the Priests, to hinder the people from reading the “ Scripture’s bookes of controversie, that by keeping them in “ ignorance they might be govern’d the easilyer in that blind “ obedience, which was so pressingly imposed upon them: So “ beg’d his Highness would consider well a matter of so great “ consequence, and thō he knew he had too generous a soule, “ to be frighted into a change bay danger, or tempted by in“ terest, yet he hoped truth would always prevail, and force “ him to return to his Mother the Church, which open’d her “ armes to receive him again.

The Duke’s
 reply.
 KING JA: M^{rs}.
 Tom. 8. 25.

“ This discours which lasted near half an houre his High“ ness heard without interrupting him in the least; but when “ he had done, the Duke tould him, He was much surprised “ when the Bishop of Winchester some days before, desired
 “ they two might wait upon him as from the rest of their order;
 “ for thō he thought it not proper to refuse them, yet he look’d “ upon it as a thing of very ill consequence to him, to be moved “ on such a subject just before the meeting of the Parliament;

that he lay already under great pressures on account of his Religion, which this must necessarily agravate. So asked the Archbishop, if what he sayd was by his Ma^{ty} directions, or from the Bishops only? He sayd, the King knew of it, but it was only by direction of his Breethren, The Duke then replyd, He doubted not but they two, and some others of their order meant well in it, but that he could not hinder himself from believing, that those who put them upon it intended his prejudice; That as to the discours they had made, it would be a presumption in him, who was an illiterate man, to enter into controversial disputes with persons so learned as they; that nevertheless he would have acquainted them with the reasons of his conversion, did he think it proper at that time, or had leasure for it; He assured them he had taken all the pains he could to informe himself in matters of Religion before he changed, that he did not doe it hastily, nor without a previous foresight of the inconveniences which have already happen'd, and which were like to follow on that account; and, having Sayd so much, tould the Bishop they must not wonder, if by reason of the greater hurry of business, he was forced to dismiss them without entring into any farther debate about what they had urged. But for that reason, one of the first letters he writ after his departure was to the Archbishop, to tell him that his coming away was so sudden as well as unexpected, he had not an oportunity of speaking with him as he intended, to lay before him the motives of his conversion; for thō he did not think it so proper, for the reasons he then alledged, to discours such matters at that time, yet he never refused speaking freely with any of his persuasion, and particularly himself, whom he allways looked upon as his friend, and had a great esteem for his person. He tould him therfore he had remain'd for many years a zealous son of the Church of

T O M E
II.

167^l.

The Duke writes to the Archbishop.
Tom. 8. 35.

T O M E “ England, in whose doctrine he had been educated and fully II. “ instructed by that worthy and learned man Doctor Steward :

1677.

“ that during the (time) he was abroad, never any one speak
 “ to him about Religion except a Nunn, who, when he tould
 “ her he was too young to enter into disputes of controversy, “ she only desired him to pray that God would direct and “ enlighten him if he was not in the right ; and that thō he “ receiv’d many civilitys from the Jesuits while he remain’d “ in Catholicks Countrys, yet never any one went about to “ perswade him to change his Religion ; so that he might be “ assured it was both in his riper years, and a full conviction “ in all controversial points that forced him to embrace a “ Religion, he well foresaw would change his condition in this “ world, frōm one of the happiest Princes in Europe to that “ of the most unfortunate and abandon’d man upon earth.

The King
 resolves to send the Duke away.
 KING JAM: Mth.
 TOM: 8. 29.

“ Two days after this Conference the King asked the Duke “ what had pass’d betwixt him and the Bishops ? Of which he “ gave him an account, whereby his Ma^{ty} found that project “ was ineffectual, and therefore thought no other way remain’d “ for quieting people’s minds, but to give way at present to “ their importunitys ; he would have been glad the Duke him“ self had advised it, so asked his opinion what he thought “ proper to be done, but the Duke answer’d, It was hard for “ him to direct his Ma^{ty}, that knew not to dispose of himself ;
 “ that if he gave moderate Councells it would be looked on “ as an argument of fear ; if vigorous ones, the world would “ say, he cared not how he embroil’d the King, now his own “ condition was so desperate ; besides he had little reason to “ presume, he could influence his Ma^{ty}’s Councels, when he saw “ those who were in the greatest trust and credit, steer a con“ trary cours to his judgment, as well as interest, to affect “ popularity and court and esteem amongst his greatest “ enemys, and that therefore all he could doe was to be entirely resigned to his Ma^{ty} pleasure, and would, as he had " T O M E ever done, render a perfect submission to his orders. " II.

 1679

The Duke saw plainly enough wither all this tended, " and that he must fall a sacrifice to the people's jealousys, but " was resolved to make a merite of it in obeying the King's " will, not following his own ; so reiterated his request to his " Ma^{ty} to consider well with himself how far he would stand " by him in case his Enemys attack'd him in Parliament ; but " the resolution was already taken : So the King tould him he " was convinced it was absolutely necessary to yeeld to this " torrent, accompanying his discours upon it, with great " expressions of kindness for his Person and sorrow for the " occasion, and in conclusion desired he would withdraw for " some time out of England. The Duke who knew better " how to obey the King than give way to his enemys, most " readily acquies'd, never putting his own satisfaction or advan- " tage in balance with his Ma^{ty} interests ; he only desired to " have some thing to shew the world, what was the motive of his " compliance, so begg'd a letter under his Ma^{ty} own hand " expressing an order for his departure, which on the 28th of " Febuary the King writ accordingly in these following " terms.

I have already given you my reasons at large why I think it fitt that you Should absent from me for some time beyond the Seas ; as I am truly Sorry for the occasion, so you may be sure I shall never desire it longer than it will be absolutely necessary both for your good and my Service ; in the mean time I think it proper to give it you under my hand, that I expect this compliance from you and desire it may be assoon as conveniently you can. You may easily believe with what trouble I writ this to you, there being nothing I am more sencible of, than the constant kindness you have ever had for me, And I hope you are so just to me as to be assured that no

The King's Letter to the Duke, to order his leaving England.
 K. JAM. M^o.
 To: 9. p. 59.

TOME
II.

1679.
The Duke and Dutchess goe for Bruxelles.
K. JA: M^{rs}.
Tom: 8. 33.

absence nor any thing els, can ever change me from being truly and kindly your C. R.

The resolution being once taken, nothing remain'd on the Duke's part, but a ready performance without reasoning or " reply : Only a day or two after he tould the King, what " objections Several judicious and discreet persons had made " against it, but the King being fixed in his judgment as well
" as resolution, no more was Sayd of the matter : So making
" all necessary preparations for such a journey, with much " more expedition than could well be imagin'd, the Duke and " Dutchess (who was to bear a part in all his traverses and misfortunes) left England the 4th of March, went for the Hague and from thence to Bruxelles, to wait there the designes of Providence to which they always bore an entire submission.

The Lady Anne not permitted to go.

KING JAMES's
M^{rs}.
To: 8. 33.

It is more than probable that the Duke's Enemy's haveing gain'd this point, fancyed they should be able to keep him all his life in banishment; for thō upon the first resolution for " his going, he asked the King leave to take the LADY ANNE
" with him, which was readily granted, yet the Sunday
" following the King tould him, many persons found it strange " that she should go, and accordingly obliged the Duke to " leave her; whereas had they thought his return would have " been so speedy, they could never have deny'd him the " Satisfaction of her company, for fear of her Religion, " especially she haveing an elder Sister marryed, who would take place of her in the Succession.

The Parliament meets.

Two days after the Duke's departure the Parliament mett (March 6th) and the King acquainted them with what he had done in order to calme people's apprehensions; that he had excluded the Popish Lords from Parliament, that Several executions had been made both for the Plot and S^r Edmond Bury Godfrey's death, that he had disbanded the Army as far as his mony would reach, and to the end all coulour of his being influenced by Popish Councells might be taken away, he had comanded his Brother to absent himself, and order the penal Laws to be put in execution against the Papists; so would now see whether the Protestant Religion, and peace of the Nation was as truly aim'd at by others, as they were really intended by himself: This together with the rest of his Speech concerning the Navy, Traide, Subsidys &c, the Chancellor seconded and tould them, He hoped they would not overdo the business of the Plot, and in stead of making Laws for their security against Popery, hurry the Kingdom into confusion; which, says he, are the only hopes the Papists have to see our Zeal out run our discretion, and that we our selves should be the unhappy occasion of rendring our own Councells abortive.

T O M E
II.

1679.

The King finding so many men of Estates were chozen Members of this Parliament perswaded himself they would be more moderated, and haveing such good Stakes to loose, would be very unwilling to throw Cross and Pile again, for all they had in the world; but contrary to his expectation, this new Parliament was as far from any such healing temper, as that which went before it, they run as violently upon the Plot, as if nothing had been done in it hithertoo, and had not their malice to the Earle of Danby given him the honour of the first ranke in their intended prosecutions, the five Catholick Lords in the Tower had forthwith been tryd and in all probability sufferr'd too; but the difficultys and delays which attended My Lord Danby's Tryal gave the Catholick Lords more time to prepare, and their Inocency to appear, whereby none but My Lord Stafford, to whom they gave no respit, felt the weight of that mercy less and bloody faction.

KING CH:
LETTERS. p. 6.

Ibid. p. 10.

The Earle of Danby, then Lord Treasurer, finding himself under the displeasure of the Commons, after haveing endeavour'd his justification, surrender'd himself (April 15th) to the

The Earle of Danby surrenders himself.

T O M E Vsher of the Black Rod, and immediately after was committed to the Tower, and impeached; the King granted him his pardon, but the Commons questioning its velidity in cases of Impeachment, great debates and arguments were held upon it, and he press'd to declare whether he would stand to his pardon or plead to the Articles? He insisted on the former, but yet so as to leave room to justify himself too; this was so dissatisfactory to the Commons that it was believ'd they would have proceeded by Bill of Attainder, but the matter they had against him being insufficient, they could not go on in that method, and yet were resolved he should have the first lash of their displeasure which suspended for a time other prosecutions.

The Duke's opinion of y^e Earle of Danby.

King Jam. M^o.
Tom. 8. 39.

Had the Duke been capable of delighting in revenge this furnished him with a fit occasion; he was perswaded he owed his banishment to the Treasurer's advice, and one of the first things he heard after his arrival at Bruxelles, was the fall of that " great man, and that it was in great measure unpittyed: This " the Duke wonder'd at, because he had been free enough of " his Ma^{ty} treasure, where it could be applyd to make him " friends; he owned he always had a good opinion of him, as " a man of abilitys and resolution, till his late behaveour and " manner of quitting made him question his Loyalty, as well " as his judgment; the first thing, he sayd, that turned his " head as well as his heart was the readmission of the Duke of " Buckingham to Court, after his committment to the Tower; " the Treasurer had notice before hand of what was intended, " and thought he had diverted his Ma^{ty} from it, but soon after " when he least expected such a thing, the Duke tould him, " he was inform'd the Duke of Buckingham had kiss'd his " Ma^{ty} hand at a privat supper at M^r. Chivin's: The Treasurer " was mightely surpris'd and struck when he heard it, and " burst out into complaints, How impossible it would be for him to serve the King, who published thus to the world how little credit he had with him ; that it would discourage men from being Loyal and dutifull, when they saw the King no less kind to those who were not so ; that for his part he had venter'd his fortune and life itself for his Ma^{ty} Service, but finding his pains thus render'd fruetless, he was resolved to give up his staff and retire, rather than discredit and ruin himself to doe his Ma^{ty} no good. The Duke did what he could to appeas his passion, and tould him There was a great intervale betwixt pardoning and trusting, he needed not fear, that the Duke of Buckingham (who was so lost in the opinion of the world as well as the King's) would ever be in credit with him again, that he was sorry indeed the King had done a thing which he granted would discourage his true friends, but to throw up the game for one cross card were to fly in his Ma^{ty} face for a trifle, which became him the least of all men, who had been so highly advanced and favour'd by him.

With this discours the Treasurer was diverted from those hasty purposes, however * the Duke with the same bouldness and fidelity, but in all events kept a steady eye to his owne security than his Ma^{ty} interest ; which the Duke soon after perceiving thought it his duty to advertice his Ma^{ty} of, cautioning him not to confide so entirely in him as formerly he had done ; but this it seems made no change in the King's opinion, or at least in the trust and confidence he put in him afterwards : Nevertheless the Duke was perswaded it was this that stuck on the Treasurer's stomach, and made him (when the informations were given in of the pretended Plot) preferr his owne Security (or what he thought so) before his

Ibid: 42.

* Some words appear to have been here omitted, perhaps, " however the Duke acted with the same boldness and fidelity;" and, " but in all events the Treasurer kept," &c.

T O M E

II.

1679.

“ Ma^{ty} apparent interest, by keeping the thing on foot till the “ Parliament met ; which might easily have been made an end “ of before, and so prevented all the confusion, bloodshed, and “ hazard of a Rebellion, that ensued upon it.

“ Some were so malicious (thō the Duke never believ’d that)
 “ as to think him the first raiser of that Devil, but tis certain “ he might have laid him sooner if he had pleas’d ; but on the “ contrary he opposed the Duke, My Lord Lauderdale, and “ all honest men, who advised the King to put of his journey “ to Newmarket in order to sift those informations to the “ bottom before the meeting of the Parliament, which would “ have laid open the Vilany of the first informers, and prevented
 “ the coming in of others, who were tempted by the great offers “ of reward. But My Lord Treasurer would not joyne with “ them in that advice, fancying by the helpe of his pretended “ Conspiracie and crying out against Popery he should pass “ for a Pillar of the Church, and ward the blow which he fore“ saw was falling upon his shoulders ; but My Lord Shaftsbury “ who soon found out his drift, sayd, Let the Treasurer cry as “ lowd as he pleases against Popery, and think to put himself
 “ at the head of the Plot, I will cry a note lowder and soone “ take his place ; which he fail’d not to make good, and by “ that means turned to the Treasurer’s poison what he tooke “ to be his only prerogative ; so shallow and weake are the “ views of wisest men in the hands of Providence, whose “ designs are never frustrated whether theirs succeed or no.

One would have thought the Plot managers had wanted no spurrs, nor that the Duke’s Enemys were too remiss in their prosecution ; but those it seems who desired to drive on more furiously found means to have the Committee of Secrecy inform’d by My Lady Shaftsbury’s buttler, that the French King was to be on the Sea coast by the middle of June with an Army of Sixty Thousand men, who were to be transported into England to assist the Catholicks, and that the Duke, who was run away, they sayd, to save his head, was to return along with them: The House tooke fire immediately at this new discovery, and without farther doubt or examination (seeming to be in mighty apprehension) proposed sitting next day, thō Sunday, to provide for their Security.

Many set speeches and proposalls were made on this occasion, which at last ended (April 27) in this Vote, That the Duke of York being a Papist had being the principal encouragement to the Papists in their designes against the King; this was warmly prosecuted by many of that partie, and opposed at that time by none by (of) the Duke's friends but M^r Secretary Coventry: The reason they alledged for this Silence was, that those violent men would sooner come to Soberr thoughts upon their own reflections, than by any thing that could be offer'd by private men whose interest might render them suspected to have consider'd that, more than the publick good; this was thought but a poor excuse for abandoning his cause on so urgent an occasion, but shew'd how violent the torrent run when his greatest friends durst not make the least head against it.

But thō others trembled, his Highness had one powerfull support, which in this point at least stood immoveable; the King had often assured the Duke that nothing could alter him from the kindness he had ever for him, and that he would be watchfull on all occasions to defend him and all his concerns, and that thō he would be willing to doe any reasonable thing to please the people, he was resolved to stick firme to the Crowne; he saw whither this Vote tended and that the Duke's Succession was aimed at; he forthwith therefore call'd a Councel, and express'd himself with so much vehemence and energie against any such attempt, that had the Duke been present, he could not have inspired him with a greater resentment of that matter;

T O M E
II.

1679.

The Parliament Votes that y^e Duke's Religion gave rise to the Plot.

Ibid. 43.

The King resolves not to abandon his Brother.

KING CH.
LETTERS. p. 1.

KING CH.
LETTERS p. 10.
LETTERS,
V. I. p. 44.

T O M E

II.

1679.

The King offers an Expedient.
K. CH. LET-TERS, p. 14.

he rebuked the Duke of Monmouth for the share he well knew he had in those contrivances, and the hopes his Majesty had (he Sayd) of reclaimeing him was the only thing that hinder'd him from falling out with him for good and all.

He saw plainly they designed not only to fly at the Succession, but were endeavouring to get a Vote that no Papist should ever Reign, which he thought such a downe right rebellion, as that the House would never be brought to it; but they were capable of going much further, than he could then think possible, and thō he lived not to see them make such an Act himself, the Duke at least did. The King therefore thought no properer means could be imagin'd, to put a stop to these proceedings, than to offer the two Houses (April 30th) to agree to any Law they could devise for the security of Religion, provided the descent in the right Line were not defeated: he consented that in case of a Popish Successor, all Spiritual and temporal imployment should be given to Protestants, and none to be displaced of the latter sorte, but by consent of the Parliament, and if any further Security was necessary for Religion, he would agree to it provided the Succession were not interrupted.

LETTERS
VOL. I. pag 46.

One would have thought such large offers might have contented reasonable men, but nothing could do it, unless they had the Duke at their feet, nor even then could they be secure against him (said M^r. Sacheverell) unless the King would grant these things he offer'd in his own life time. This put the House upon various proposalls, and to shew how united they were in their malice (thō they could not agree in what manner to execute it) what ever any old manager moved, the new factious Members still cryd up and applauded, like so many young spaniels that run and barke at every larke that springs; some were for destroying the Monarchie it self by setting up cross titles in the Royal Family, and so make it necessary to rid

Various debates against
the Duke.

themselves of it, others were for a Bill only to exclude the Duke, and for fear of a War have the Crown to go to the next in succession, and if the Dutchess had a Son to have him educated a Protestant; others were for setting the Duke aside like an infant or lunatick, which they said alter'd no fundamentals: In fine it was generally agreed, that unless they could find means during the King's life to prevent the Crown's descending to the Duke, it would be too late afterwards, which in effect was strikeing at his life itself, and their intent undoubtedly was to have proceeded to an Impeachment if not an Attainder; for which reason a Committee was appointed to search Colman's letters, or what other information could be had to charge his Royal Highness with the greatest crimes.

T O M E
II.

1679.

Vpon the Sunday following they reassumed this debate, and thō they owned the King's proposalls were plausible, yet was far, they said, from giving England her wished Security, if once the Crown fell to a Papist, For that no Parliament or power could be of force to act without his consent, which could not be expected he would give against himself; no Oathes, they said, which were the common cements of humane Society could bind a Papist, that tyranny and arbitrary power must be its infallible concomitants, and that thō a Popish Prince had bowells of mercy for his people, it would not be in his power to act otherwise than by direction of the Priests, especially in all matters wherein the Pope's authority and jurisdiction might be advanced.

LETTERS,
VOL. I. p: 61.

The Duke's friends finding how violently they run on, and that if no stop were put to these bitter and false insinuations, it would soone be too late, venter'd at last to open their mouths in his defence, now the King had shewne them the example; they replyd, therefore, that thō many Attainders had pass'd to barr the Lawfull pretender in former times, they only served for the most part to let out the best blood in the Nation, but sooner

The Duke's friends reply.

T O M E
II.

1679.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 63.

The Commons Vote to exclude the Duke.

The King dis-pleas'd with their Votes.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 65.

Ibid: p. 70.

or later the Crowne still devolved to the true heire; and therefore how could it be esteem'd a providential care of the people's welfare, to intail an endless war upon the Kingdom? Many examples were brought how fruetless such precautions had always been, and amongst the rest the Settlement made by Henry the 8th, wherein after his own Children he gives the line of Suffolke preference to that of Scotland, and yet how litle it was regarded. But no argument was more insisted on, than the great probability that Scotland one of the antientest Monarchys in the world, would never joyn in changinge the Succession which had continued in so long a descent, but, on the contrary, would catch at such an occasion to separate again from England, and have not only their Lawfull King, but a King that would live amongst them; the consequence of which needed no rethorick to convince the world how fatall it would be to England: But in spight of all the arguments that wit and reason could produce, faction and numbers carryd it; and (May 15th) they Vote to bring in a Bill to disable the Duke of York from inheriteing the Crowne of England, and that if his Ma^{ty} should come by any untimely death they would revenge it upon the Papists.

It was happy for the Duke that the King stuck so close to him in this dangerous conjuncture, but in reality their interests were as much united in this case, as their inclinations, which made the King so oft declare That he made no difference of friends betwixt him and his Brother, and that was the reason the Duke found so many, nor was it a small encouragement to them, that the King never in his life appear'd more passionatly concern'd for his R. H, than in this occasion; but the King was sencible his own preservation depended upon it, and that his chief security lay in haveing a successor they liked worse than himself, otherwise in such turbulent times no one could answer what might be attempted upon his person, especially.

considering the late Vote about revenging his death : It was apparent enough that thō the Duke was the first branch of the Royal Family they design'd to lopp off, the axe was layd to the root itself, and Monarchy was to go down too, or bow exceeding low before the Almighty power of Parliaments. He resolved therefore to stick to the main chance, and suffer no diminution in the Prerogative during his time, and by consequence never to consent to any such Act ; however (he) thought it necessary to yeeld, as far as he could, to convince the world of his sincerity, and to put his enemys so much in the wrong (without parteing with any essential thing) as that if they forced him to breake he might have friends enough to assist him.

T O M E
II.

1679.

KING CH:
LETTERS p: 13.

When the news of this Vote and the King's behaviour upon it, was brought to the Duke, his pleasure was so great to see the King's kindness, that he took off all feeling of his own misfortunes. I can never (says he) sufficiently acknowledge " the Sence of gratitude I have for your Ma^{ty} goodness to me, " I do assure you I can bear any misfortune with patience so " long as you are so kind ; I have but one life to loos, and I " shall always be ready to lay it downe in your Service, and " at the rate the things now go there is too great a probability " an occasion may not long (be) wanting : They will never be " satisfyd, unless your Majesty unking yourself, and if you " deny them any thing they aske I am confident they will fly " out, especially if you permit the Militia of London and partes " ajacent to draw together ; I know there is danger and hazard " in makeing those steps that are necessary to keep your " Crowne, and more than would have been some months ago, " but you are utterly lost if it is any longer differr'd ; let not " therefore knaves and mean spirited people flatter you into " an opinion, that you may be safe by yeelding and tempori- " seing, for nothing less than the destruction of your family and "

The Duke's letter to the King.

KING JA. Mth.
Tom: 8: 49.

T O M E

II.

1679.

“ the Monarchy itself will content them : Now therefore is the “ time to breake in upon them before they are formed or have “ a man to head them ; and the only person capable (I think)
 “ of that imployment (pardon mee for nameing him) is the “ Duke of Monmouth, for I am sure the same reasons and “ perswasions that has prevail’d with him to behave himself to “ you and me as he has done, will make him stick at nothing “ that favours his ambition ; and therefore I beg your Ma^{ty}
 “ will have a watchfull eye upon his actions for your own “ security ; and that you will please to give some signal marke
 “ of your displeasure to Sir Thomas Armestrong and young “ Gerrard, who were such earnest agitators against me in the “ House, for unless some thing of that nature be done, many “ will not think you in earnest. Suffer not Ireland or Scotland “ to be put in other hands as they are at present, you may “ count upon their assistance, and the Prince of Orange too “ has given me all immaginable assurancethat he will stand and “ fall by you ; wherefore I beg of your Ma^{ty} to make use of “ those partes and courage God has given you, and not rely “ upon concessions already made, or to make any more ; be “ pleas’d to use all possible diligence in provideing your fortes “ and garisons ; and certainly the speediest way of breaking “ their measures, is to breake the Parliament itself, and pro“ portion your way of liveing to your revenue, rather than to “ ly any longer at the Mercy of those men, who by that “ vilanous Vote to revenge your death upon the Papists, can “ have no other meaning, than to expose your life to the “ bloody hand of any desperate fannatick, who shall think “ fitt to attempt so unhumain an Act.

KING JAC: M^{OR}.
 TOM 8. p: 58.

LETTERS
 VOL. I. p: 79.

When this letter was given to the King it was further represented to him, that the Duke of Monmouth’s ambition gave life to all these commotions, as the only person capable of being made a property by the Partie, who of late haveing acted so bare faced, fancyd he could expect no quarter, and had therefore openly declar'd by his creatures, that he would do all he could to hinder the Duke's return.

T O M E
II.

1679.

The King in some conflict with himself, about falling out with the Duke of Monmouth.

The King read the letter with great attention and consider'd what was urged upon it, which one might see rais'd a sort of conflict in his breast betwixt his sincere affection to the Duke his Brother, joined with the reasons and necessity of self preservation; and the natural love he could not divest himself of in reference to the Duke of Monmouth: He sayd, he was sencible he had done amiss, but was not out of hopes he might be reclaim'd, and rather blam'd the Duke for begining too harshly with him, but his Ma^{ty} being shewn the contrary, how kindly his Royal Highness had always treated him, how many faults he had pardon'd and forgot; the King, who was fixed in his resolution never to deserte the Duke, declared he would turn Armstrong out of all, and proceed with the like severity in respect of such as should apear against his Brother in the present debates, and that he would make the Duke of Monmouth the last man in the Kingdome if he persever'd in those ways: Nay such was the King's sollicitude in this matter, that while the Bill was passing the House of Commons, he tooke the pains to speake almost to every Lord himself, to diswade him from assenting to it when it came up to them; and tould them at the same time, let what will happen he would never suffer such a vilanous Bill to pass; he thanked the Duke for his advice and assured him he would stick firmly to him, and to himself; and that he was confident should that detestable Bill concerning the Succession pass the House of Commons, it would be thrown out by the Lords with indignation as it deserved.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 70. 71

KING CH:
LETTERS. p. 17.

But it went not so far this time at least, for on the 27th of May (which had been apointed for the tryall of the five Catholick Lords) they were brought to Westminster hall accordingly, where all things were in readiness for it, except an accord

TOME
II.

1679.

betwixt the two houses; the Commons would not allow that the Bishops should be present at the tryalls, which the Lords opposed as contrary to use, only that they should withdraw when judgment was given; and the Bishops thinking to find a medium, desired leave to withdraw of themselves during the tryalls, with liberty to enter their protestation; but the Commons not satisfyd with that, would have the right itself decided, and insisted likewise upon haveing the validity of the Earle of Danby's pardon determin'd before they would move one step further.

The King
prorogues the Parliament.
LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 91.

The King to put an end to this disput and not unmindfull at the same time of the Duke's advice, sends for the Commons up, and instead of proceeding to the tryalls, prorogued them (May 27th) to the 14th of August: He never speak better nor with greater energie, thō his speech was extempore as well as his resolution; this was so little expected, it struck them like thunder and left them all at a gaze, not knowing what way to turn themselves nor what measures to take.

The Duke is well pleas'd with the news, and desires the King to pursue that method.
KING JA: Mth.
To: 8. 66.

“ When the Duke heard of it he beg'd of the King to “ follow his blow, he tould him they were stunn'd and dis-“ harten'd, that their measures were broaken, and if he gave “ them time to piece again and recover their spirits they “ would fall on with greater fury than ever; for which reason “ wishes the King if possible to put a stop to the disbanding, “ and call for him home; that after so much experience of his “ Ma^{ty} kindness he might on this occasion expose his life “ again for his seruice, as the only acknowledgment worthy
“ the favours he had receiv'd, and which the present posture “ of affairs gave too much reason to expect a necessity of.

He knew very well, that when the Parliament was up, those factious men had no other way to compass their ends, but by open force; which considering the flame they had blowne themselves in too, was no ways improbable; wherefore he ceas'd not conjuring the King, to pursue the method he now was " in, and not to imagin those men's good nature would be " wrought upon by compliance, which was the fatal rock on " which his Father miserably split, and which by that means " was so visible to him, that if he shunn'd it not, his fall would " be unlamented : Which representations thō they did not " worke his Ma^{ty} up to those vigorous resolutions the Duke aim'd at, they led him however by degrees to boulder measures than it's believ'd his Councelors and Favorits at that time durst venter to inspire him with.

But while his Highness preaches resolution to the King, the Duke's friends preach a contrary doctrine to him, and if his spirit had been capable of being broke with contradictions, there was no circomstance or agravation wanteing to have done it ; for besides the malice of his Enemy's, he had the fears and reproofs of his friends to struggle with ; they exhorte him to be cautious in his expressions, and on all occasions to declare, if ever the times comes, he will preserue the libertys of England and the Religion as by Law establish, which, they said, he might do, as well as other Princes who are of different Religion from their Subjects ; they tould him the world complain'd he was of an Arbitrary disposition, and loved the French government ; they wished him to remove to Breda to avoid the concours of Papists, and suffer none about him, but such as by the Laws of England are permitted to attend upon his person. This caution no doubt was good, and what the Duke understood very well, nor was there ever any Prince in the world less inclined to force others in point of Religion or to invade their Libertys than he ; But for his friends to give soe readily into every false and malicious insinuation, and to endeavour to toss him from place to place, and add to his exile a banishment from all his friends and fellow sufferers, was to deprive him of the conforth whis is not deny'd the greatest slaves, who in their

TOME
II.

1679.

The Duke's friends find fault with his conduct.
LETTERS
VOL. I, p. 33.

TOME
II.

1679.

The Duke presses his returne.
KING JAM: Mth.
To: 8. 62.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 95.
KING CH:
LETTERS. p. 21.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 95.

Ibid. 101.

chains can tell their miserys to one another: But their zeal for his service, had a great mixture of personal views and advantages to themselves; as it appear'd in several of them afterwards, who, thō they had a mind to preserue him, it was for their owne sakes principally they endeavour'd it.

“ The Duke nevertheless persisted in his opinion that if “ his Majesty pleas'd to call him home it would quite dispirite “ their enemys, and perhaps discourage them from attempting “ any thing; but thō he press'd it earnestly it was still with “ an entire resignation to whatever his Majesty thought best “ for his owne service: Severall of the Duke's friends did the “ same, but the King was still unresolved, he tould the Duke he might easily believe the first thought he had after prorogue-ing the Parliament (which he ownes were no longer to be sufferr'd together) was relateing to him and what he should advise him to do, but as yet not being able to make any judgment what effect it might produce, must consider with himself and those he assured him (who) were his friends no less than his own, what was best, and would then give him his opinion.

But those friends were the men the Duke apprehended most, it was My Lord Essex, Halifax, Sunderland, and the Dutchess of Portsmouth, who had gain'd this credit with the King by appearing against the Exclusion, thō in the bottom they desired the same thing another way, and would therefore, he knew, certainly advise the King against his return; who they foresaw would ever oppose their timerous measures, and eclips them in the King's favour which now they soly possess'd; so under the notion that an insurrection was still to be apprehended, and that if his Highness return'd it would highten the present discontent, and drive those who had appear'd in opposition to him into some desperate action against the government, they did not only advise the King not to recal the Duke, but press'd him to promis never to doe it, till it was aproved of in Councel; but thō the King yeilded to the first part of their advice, he rejected the later with some sorte of indignation.

It was for the same reasons the Duke thought his return more seasonable, for if an insurrection happen'd, he hoped no one could be better trusted at the head of his Majesty's forces, than he, whose interest, as well as gratitude obliged him to venter what was most deare to him in the King and Kingdom's defence; But there was no such danger, but in their own immaginations, on the contrary it appear'd, the people were rather more displeas'd with those violent Members of Parliament, than with the King for prorogueing them; because the world saw those turbulent proceedings tended more to the nurrishing some faction, or the prosecution of some personal pique, than the security and defence of the Nation; however the Duke's friends gave into these reasonings against his return, and desir'd him not to press it at present, and the King himself after haveing fully consider'd the matter, thō he owned this prorogation had not produced any thing but blame upon the Commons, for doing those extravagant things which obliged him to treat them so ill, yet, says he, I am sorry to tell you, that the temper of the people is such in all places, especially in London, that the Lords in the Tower being not yet tryd (by which men's minds (are) as full as ever with the apprehension of the Plot and Popery) that if you should come over at this time, it would be of the last ill consequence both to you and me. I am sure there is nothing troubles me more than to be deprived of your company, nor can I write any thing more against my heart than this, but when I consider it is the last stake, I would not let my inclinations sway me so far as to give a Councel so much to the prejudice of our intrest, as matters stand at present.

This positive answer obliged the Duke to submit out of obedience rather than conviction, till such time as his friends

T O M E
II.

1679.
The King refuses to lett the Duke return.

Ibid. p. 100.

Ibid. p. 30.

T O M E were come off from those groundless apprehensions, who thought
II. it not improper to move the King again upon that subject, but 1679. there were too many obstacles to be conquer'd at present considering what hands he had put himself and his affairs into.

The King formes a new Council.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 25.

Ibid. 131.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 133.

Ibid. p. 145.

The Insurrection in Scotland.

His Majesty it seems had thought it necessary amongst other regulations, to model a new Council and place My Lord Shaftsbury at the head of it in quality of President; whom the King thought to keep from doeing hurt, by keeping him in his service: (a method which seldom succeeds) however when he opposed any motions which were made in the Duke's favour (which he never fail'd to do) the King had no regard to it, as knowing him his profess'd enemy; nevertheless being seconded in many things by Halifax, Sunderland, Essex, &c. who were supposed to be the Duke's friends, he gain'd upon the King in several points particularly this of keeping the Duke in banishment, thō the King was tould that such friends as would exclude the Duke from his native Country, would not stick in time to exclude him from the Throne too: But the King was not yet disposed to follow those vigorous Councells to the hight, which the Duke advised; he hoped by temporising a little to gaine upon his enemys, and in fine upon the more urgent solicitations of the Duke's friends, (and) tould them positively, there was no thinking of his return till after the tryall of the Lords in the Tower, with which, he sayd, the people would never be Satisfyd, if the Duke were here; that he was resolved first to have the Plot off his hands (the noise of which was now somewhat abated) but that the Duke's comeing back would certainly give it new life, neither durst he answer that his person would be in safety, such was the hatred the people were in against Popery and him, as its cheife support.

Nevertheless there happen'd an accident which might have furnished the King with a good pretence of recalling him, had not the bent of his Council been so extreemly against it. Some desperate fanaticks in Scotland haveing most barbarously assassinated the Arch Bishop of St. Andrews (May 3.) and broken out into open rebellion, it was necessary some forces should be sent against them, and to be sure none could be better trusted than the Duke; but in stead of that, he had the mortification to see that honour conferr'd on his greatest enemy, and to serue for an occasion of augmenting the credit and reputation of the Duke of Monmouth, to whom that command was given. The business being soon over, he return'd therefore with tryump leaving a mighty reputation behind him in Scotland, for the clemency and indulgence procur'd by his means; and in his way back, he was treated in many places with the title of Highness which was no ways ill taken by him, and at his return to Court receiv'd with great tenderness by the King, even Armstrong himself found no markes of disfavour, thō the King ceas'd not complaining of him. This gave the Duke's friends too much ground to apprehend the worst, which they fail'd not by long relations to advertice him of, so that to the King's flat denyall to recall him, he had continuall accounts of the Duke of Monmouth's advancing in his Majestys favour, and of the mighty credit of Halifax, Sunderland, and Essex, who undertooke the next Parliament should give the King full satisfaction, mony, and what not, if the Duke were but kept away; in so much, that it was believ'd they would soon put it out of the Duke's power to come back or even the King's to recall him; which accounts following one on the back of an other would have broken his spirit if any earthly consideration could have done it, but his letters to the King during all these transactions, will be eternal monuments of his Christian resolution in all these traverses of fortune; If nature suffer'd any thing on these occasions it was more for the King, his friends, and his ungratefull Country, than for himself; he

T O M E
II.

1679.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 139.

Ibid. p. 148.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 151.

KING JAM. Mth.
TOM: 8. p: 49:
57.61.

T O M E

II.

1679.

The Duke's friends press him to change his Religion.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 112.
136. 154.

was So far from wanting courage either to suffer with patience when there was no remedy, or to bear up against his enemys where the case was not desperate ; that under his great oppressions he would comfort and encourage others when he seem'd most to want it himself, and animate his Majesty against that unsteddy and yeelding temper which his own nature as well as his chief Councillors inclined him too : But these were not all the difficultys his Royal Highness was to fence against, his friends relaps again into their fears, which was more grievous to him than all the rest, and had the bouldness to press him to change his Religion as the only resource he had left, and that without it both himself, the King and Monarchy too, would infallebly be lost.

These menaces would have Staggar'd a Prince of less Christian resolution, but no earthly motive could shake his perseverance when justice or truth was concern'd, so he replyd with some “ thing more asperity than ordinary, That he wonder'd those “ to whom he was known, could fancy him capable of so much “ levity in a business of that high nature, as either to have “ chang'd his Religion at first without full conviction or to “ relinquish it now for temporal ends ; that what he had done “ was upon full deliberation, and that he was resolved, let the “ consequence be what it will, to persever in the truth he had “ already imbraced.

Severall
executions for the Plot &c. and the Queen and the Duke accused again of it.

But amongst all his contradictions, scarce any went more to his heart, than the cruel treatment his friends met with in England, on account of this pretended conspiracy. On the 20th of June the five Jesuits, Mr. Whitebread, Harcourt, Fenwick, Gaven, and Turner were executed at Tyburne, and on the 14th of July Mr. Langhorne a Barister of the Inner Temple ; in the different Countys the Catholicks suffer'd a grievous persecution by the Seizure of the therds of their estates or paying twenty pound a month, and the Priests by tedious imprisonments, amongst which one M^r. Poskett and M^r. Thwing suffer'd death at York, and M^r. Plesington at Chester. There were still new discoveries and the Duke himself render'd suspected by a Merchant in Venise averring that S^r Henry Tichburne had tould him, he was going to Rome by the Duke's orders, to prosecute the design in Cardinal Norfolke's letters; this the King himself thought might be of ill consequence, or at least was made use of as an argument against his returneing. The Queen too was brought again into suspicion upon the accusation of one Buss the Duke of Monmouth's cooke, who informed the Secret Committee, That being at Windsor in September last, he heard one Hankinson who had belong'd to the Queen's Chappel, desire Antonio the Queen's Confessor's Servant, to have a care of the four Irishmen he had brought along with him, who he sayd would do the business for them; the Committee had slighted it, but it being again sworn before the Recorder, Antonio was examin'd, and thō he denyd any such words, was committed for high treason: The King seem'd highly sencible of So injurious an aspersion on so vertuous a Princess, however nothing was done to vindicate her, in such awe did his Majesty stand of that popular rage, whose drift being to disapoint the Duke's Succession, there was no way of compassing it but by ruining him or the Queen; and therefore they would rather there had been no Plot than that they two should not be thought to be in it.

T O M E
II.

1679.

LETTERS.
VOL. I. p. 130.

Ibid. p. 123.

The King still positive against the Duke's return.

These were discouraging relations to the Duke who could not expect much should be done for him, when the King durst not thoroughly vindicate the Queen; thō indeed the tryall and acquitting of S^r George Wakeman who was her Phisician, which follow'd soon after (June 18) did indirectly at least free her from that aspersion; but this gave the Duke no ease, on the contrary it served but to turn the fury of the partie more upon him, when they saw their other projects fail, and he had

TOME

II

1679.
KING CH.
LETTERS. 33.

small hopes the next Parliament would be more inclined to favour him, notwithstanding the King's fancy they would be better humour'd, that they were sensible of their late errors and that their eyes began to open in reference to the Plot, especially since S^r George Wakeman's trial; but then least the Duke should lay hold of that for an argument to be recall'd, he obviates that inference by acquainting him That should he return, it would raise fresh commotions and renew the Plot which was now almost a ground, and which he conceiv'd would absolutely vanish after the trial of the Lords; and if that business, says he, be but well gon over the strength of the villenous partie will be much lessen'd and many arguments taken away against the Duke's return, which yet subsist and blind the understanding of many honest men; but that if on the other hand, things go worse and tend to a rupture, he apprehended the Duke's appearing would raise more enemies, especially if the Plot were not at an end, for that tho' what they have to say against him out of Colman's letters be weak and frivolous, yet, says he, I should be very unwilling to have a question brought upon the stage, whether or no you should be secured, and you at the same time present, considering how easy it is to have false witnesses, till Oates and Bedloe have their due.

This was the opinion the King had of the Plot and its witnesses; while the seeming necessity of his affairs, made this unfortunate Prince (for so he may well be term'd in this conjuncture) think he could not be safe, but by consenting every day to the execution of those he knew in his heart to be most innocent; and as for that notion of letting the Law take its course, it was such a piece of Casuistry as had been fatal to the King his father, and too shallow an excuse, to hinder him from a sensible remorse for those injustices and a hearty repentance of them when they were set in a truer light, which it pleased God to doe some litle time after or at least before his death. TOME

II.

And as (to) what related to the Duke's return, thō those reasons were far from convinceing him, yet his dutifullness and never failing obedience made him submit, and assure the King over and over, he would rather sufferr an eternal banishment, than " bring the least detriment to his Majesty's affairs; but " haveing always had the liberty of speaking his mind freely " to him, could not forbear representing, he said, his opinion " in that matter, That he (the) riseing the King apprehended " could only be of the Green Riban Clubb (a factious marke " of distinction then brought up) who he was sure would do it " as soon as they were ready, whether he came or no; and that " if the Lords in the Tower must first be tryd he doubted not " but the King's intention being known, would make that " Partie delay it only to keep him away; he was confident, he " sayd, the rebellion in Scotland was contrived to make the " King stand in greater need of his Parliament, and to deliver " him bound hand and foot into their power, but he begg'd " of him to catch them in the snare they had prepared for him, " and make use of those troops for his protection and security " against those very men, who by this insurrection had obliged " him to call them from Holland on whose fidelity he doubt'd " not but he might safely depend: The Duke knew very well " from what fountain these arguments sprung, and that so long " as Little Sincerity (a cant word betwixt the King and him " for My Lord Shaftsbury) sat at the head of the Council, the " King would be eternally byased against him; but that factious spirit could not smother, it seems, any longer his vilanous designes, so that the King who had long suspected him, was at last convinced he nurrished a snake in his bosome, and owned he began to play the devil and could no longer be sufferr'd, however he continued him in his station till the 15th of October 1679.

The Duke answers the objections against his being recall'd.

KING JAM. Mth
Tom. 8. p. 101.

KING JA. Mth
To: 8. p. 110.

KING CH:
LETTERS. 41.

T O M E

II.

1679.
KING JA. Mth
To: 8. 133.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 111.

KING CH:
LETTERS. p. 41.

The King falls ill, and sends for the Duke.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 178.

following, so fearfull the King was of breaking absolutely with so popular a man, his inclination ever leding him rather to flatter such sorte of people than to set them at defiance. And now that his Ma^{ty} found this corruption had crept into his Council, he began to apprehend the Parliament would not be so free from it, as he had flatter'd himself in the beginning; and therefore thought it necessary at all events, to have another string to his bow and try if from another source he could supply his pressing necessitys for mony, which was the main hank the Parliament had of him; and accordingly set up a Treaty with the French Ambassador promissing not to obstruct any of the King his Master's designs, provided they related not to Flanders or Holland, upon condition he might find his account in it, So far at least as to be able to live without other helps. The French catch'd greedily at this overture, only were desirous that the Duke's consent might be had, because the year before some sharpe expressions of his against the French had given much disgust at that Court: For this reason My Lord Sunderland acquaints the Duke at large with the Project; advising mighty Secrecy, for that none he sayd but himself and another knew of it; the King likewise assures him, it was his kindness to him put him upon this method, that he might not ly so entirely at the mercy of the Parliament and be more at liberty to stick to the true Succession of the Crowne.

But before the Duke could make any answer, an accident happen'd which put an end for the present not only to this project, but to the great contest about the Duke's return: Upon the 22nd of August the King was taken ill at Windsor, he thought at first it was nothing; but finding himself wors, and more fevorish after Physick and letting blood, he order'd My Lord Sunderland to send away an Express to the Duke to come to him immediately but with as small a retenue as possible, and therefore to leave the Dutchess behind and likewise to be ready to return when ever it should be thought proper; he was directed likewise to give it out both at his parting from Bruxells and arriuall in England, that he did it upon his own motion, so fearfull his Majesty was of giving the least disgust, and that if any fault was found, it might fall upon the Duke's shoulders which were more accustomed to such burthens, and this he knew would make no great addition to what they already bore.

Before the arrival of this express, the Duke finding he " stroue against the stream was resolved to submit to Providence " and press the King no more about being recall'd; which " made this news more unexpected, and thō it was very " agreeable in one respect he was sensibly troubled for the occasion, which doubled if possible his sollicitude and expedition; for besides the great desire he had to return, the sincere and Brotherly affection he always bore the King, made him uneasy till he had the satisfaction of seeing how he was, and therefore made little account of being censured by the world for disobedience in coming without leave, provided he acted not against his conscience, nor his Loyalty, he was not much in pain to please the Publick which he knew was prejudiced against him, and therefore generally judged blindly and unjustly, and were not in a disposition to be gain'd that way.

Vpon the 8th of September he began his journey from " Bruxells acquainting no body but the Dutchess with his " intentions, and tooke only My Lord Peterborough, Mr. " Churchil, and a Barber with him, leaving orders with Sir " Richard Bolstrod to acquaint the Duke of Villa Hermosa " with the occasion of his sudden departure: The first night " he arrived at Armentiers, and the next at Calais, but the " wind blowing fresh and contrary, could not get out till the " 10th in the evening, and the next morning landed at Dover in " a French Shallop, not being discover'd (by reason of the " disguise he had put himself in) neither by the Crew nor at "

TOME
II.

1679.
LETTERS,
VOL. I. p. 190.

KING JA: Mth
To: 9. 69.

The Duke partes from Bruxells.
KING JA: Mth
To: 9. 63.

T O M E
II.

1679.

KING JA. Mth
To: 9. 64.

Ibid. 73.
The King receives the Duke Very kindly.

The Duke of Monmouth
surpris'd and troubled at the Duke's coming. Ibid. 65.

“ Dover itself, except by the Postmaster who was an honest “ man and held his tongue; he tooke post from thence, leaving “ My Lord Peterborough behind, who was not able to go so “ fast, and arrived that night at London; Assoon as he light
“ he call'd a hackney Coach and went first to M^r. Frowd the “ Postmaster to know what news, where he found to his great “ satisfaction the King was much better, from thence he went “ to S^r. Allen Apsley's house where he lay all night, and send “ for M^r. Hide and M^r. Godolphin to him; they tould him his “ comeing was still a secret, that neither the Duke of Mon“ mouth nor any of his gang knew or suspected it, and there“ fore they advised him to make all the hast he could to “ Windsor, while the thing was undiscover'd; accordingly
“ he came thither next morning by seaven a'clock just as his “ Majesty was shaveing, and was himself the first man that “ adverticed him of his arrival.

“ The King thō seemingly surprised received him very “ kindly, and the Duke after his compliments and telling “ his Majesty how extream glad he was to find him so well “ recover'd, pursued his directions and speaking aloud, sayd,
“ He hoped his Majesty would pardon him for comeing “ without his leave, considering the occasion, but that as he “ had already gon out of England in obedience to his Ma^{ty} “ commands, so now that he had the Satisfaction of seeing him, “ he was ready to go into any part of the world he should “ appoint. This Scene being over, all the Courtiers flock'd “ about him to make their compliments, his Enemys as well “ as his friends, for his presence always forced an awe and respect even from those who were the worst affected to him.

It required a resolution such as the Duke was master of, to venter himself in this manner considering how all orders of “ people were set against him; the Ministers that had agreed to his return he knew were not his friends in the bottom; and " T O M E My Lord Sunderland himself denyd positively to the Duke " II. of Monmouth that he approved of it, but on the contrary had " 1679.

 don all he could to prevent it; for it seems upon the King's " Ibid.
 falling ill, the Duke of Monmouth apprehended what would " happen, and had press'd vehemently to have the Duke writ " too not stir, and therefore was the more surprised when he " saw him there; however could not avoid paying him his " respects, haveing the King's directions so to do. The Duke " received him civilly, but discover'd a sort of disorder and " disturbed cariage in him all the while he remain'd at Windsor, " neither did the Duke of Monmouth nor his Wife (thō the Duke " had made her two visits) ever offer at any excuse for what "
 had pass'd, or imployd any body to bring them to a good " understanding; there was one indeed that wished well to " them both, who would have mediated an accommodation, " and proposed it to the Duke of Monmouth's chiefe adviser, " but he would never give any ear or incouragement to it. "

His Royall Highness tooke care to return the Dutchess of " KING JA: M^s Portsmouth and all those Ministers thanks, who had been " To. 9. 75.
 privy to his being sent for; and finding the King had ex- " press'd so sencible a satisfaction in his presence, hoped he " would have parted with him no more; but those hopes were " short lived, for the very next morning the Earles of Sunder- " It is resolved land, Essex, Halifax, M^r. Hide and Godolphin, comeing to " to send the wait on him, My Lord Sunderland began a formal discours " Duke back. to acquaint him, how upon his Majestys first falling ill they " judg'd it necessary his Royal Highness should be sent for, not " knowing what might happen, that they had taken care to " prepare the Lord Major and Aldermen, and the most con- " siderable persons in the Fleet and Army, who they found " well disposed in case of an accident (which indeed was true " but it was oweing to the care and endeavours of others who were "

T O M E

II.

1679.

“ more truly zealous for the Duke’s interest than most of them)
 “ but that now, thanks be to God, the King being well again, “ those apprehensions and preparatives were at an end, and “ by consequence their sole business was to do all the pleasing “ things they could imagin, to put the Parliament in a good “ humour at their meeting which was drawing nigh, and that “ therefore it was thought necessary his Highness should return “ back to Bruxelles: However to take all manner of umbrage “ from him of the Duke of Monmouth’s undermineing him in “ his absence, they tould him, They doubted not but the “ King would agree to the sending him out of England too, “ and take away his Commission of Captain General of his “ Ma^{ty} forces; and that his Highness should be sent for back “ immediately after the Sessions of Parliament was over; and “ that if he approved of this they would propose it to the “ King, who they doubted not but would be well pleas’d with “ all the particulars of it.

Ibid. 76.
 The Duke saw it was in vain to argue, Soe Submitts.

“ By this discours the Duke saw plainly his return was “ decreed, So thought it in vain to argue the point, but rather “ by a cheerfull compliance to make his court more gracefully
 “ to the King; he left them therefore at full liberty (he say)
 “ to follow their own measures, who accordingly waited upon “ the King next day with the proposal, and found him willing “ enough to send away the Duke of Monmouth; for besides “ his foolish and ambitious fancys, which the King was highly “ displeas’d at, he was well informed of his privat meetings with “ My Lord Shaftsbury, M^r. Montague and other factious “ people, to the great prejudice of his Majesty’s affairs.

It is resolved
 the Duke of Monmouth Shall be sent away too.

The credit that Duke had lately acquired in his expedition against the Scottish Rebels, hinder’d him not from falling soon after into his Majesty’s displeasure; who found out he had managed those fanatticks, as if he rather intended to put himself at the head of their forces, than repell them, and as if he had more inclination to court their friendship, than punish their rebellion, nor was the Duke after his arrivall at Windsor wanting to his own preservation in makeing the King more sensible of this danger ; not out of ill will to the Duke of Monmouth (whatever might be maliciously insinuated) but purely for the King's and his own Security, for so long as the Duke of Monmouth's comportedment was dutyfull or indeed Supportable, he experienced all imaginable markes of kindness and friendship from his Royal Highness, but when he set up to be Prince of Wales and the head of the discontented partie, there was no farther measures to be kept with him ; the Duke knew how to distinguish betwixt patience and a slavish subjection, and thought it both just and commendable to stand up in his own defence, when he could doe it without prejudice to his Majestys affairs.

Before this Conference betwixt his Highness and those persons above mention'd, they had sent one of their number to him (to try his temper without doubt) by desiring him to joyn with them in prevailing with the King to lay aside the Duke of Lauderdale ; but the Duke replyd, He had served his Majesty a long time very faithfully, and was his particular friend, of which he had given many testimonys during his absence; that it would be a great discouragement to his Majestys Servants, to see a person who had supported his authority with so much zeal, so ill requited for it, and that therefore he could by no means concur with them there in : This person replyd, that their intention was only to lay him gently aside, to sweeten things before the Parliament met, who had a pique against him and would otherwise certainly fall fowle upon him, so hoped upon that account his Highness would pleas to be passiuue at least in the matter ; but he tould them he could not promiss that neither, thinking it his duty "

T O M E
II.

1679.

The Ministers propose to the Duke to joyn with them in getting the King to lay aside the Duke of Lauderdale.
KING JAM. Mth.
To: 9. p. 78.

TOME “ to speak his mind freely and sincerely to his Majesty on IL “ such occasions.

1679.

Tis not improbable but this answer gave a helping hand to the resolution of sending him back ; the Ministers immagined after the late favour they had done him, the Duke would have thought himself obliged to enter blindfould into all their measures, but they found his spirit was not yet so broke with his adversities, as to hinder him from acting by those principles he ever thought his duty to be govern'd by, that he had the same firmeness wherever he thought justice, honour, or the King's interest engaged him, and they had reason to suspect that his credit with the King would always be too hard for theirs ; therefore is it not to be wonder'd the sending him away again was so soon resolved on amongst them.

KING JA: Mⁿ
To: 9: 80.

“ The King indeed had promis'd he should be recall'd a few “ days after the Parliament was up, but desired it might be a “ secret as also what he had resolved in reference to the “ Duke of Monmouth, till he thought fit to acquaint him with “ it himself, which when he did surprized him extreamly.
 “ He used many arguments against it, and press'd them with “ more heat than well became him, and to shew his dissatis“ faction tould the King, since his Majesty thought him not “ fit to command his troops as General, it seem'd improper he “ should doe it as Captain of his Guards, and therefore desired “ his troop might be given to the Duke of Grafton ; but after “ he had slept upon the matter, he came next morning in a “ more submissive manner, and acquainted the King, he was “ ready to obey his orders, and accordingly went that evening “ to London ; where instead of keeping to his promise, he had “ a private meeting with M^r Montague and other factious “ persons, telling them what had happen'd, and that he was “ sent away for perswading the King to comply with his “ Parliament, and for his zeal to the Protestant Religion.

When this resolution of sending back the Duke became publick, many of his antient friends were hugely troubled at it, and particularly Mr. Secretary Coventry, who thought fitt to represent his reasons to the King against it; but they not prevailing, he urged at least the great unadvisedness of putting the Heire of the Crowne into the power of a forreign Prince, and that if his Majesty would not suffer him to remain in England, it were more prudent to send him to Scotland: this was the first time that designe had been named or thought of; and appear'd so reasonable that My Lord Sunderland and the King himself soon enter'd into it, only would have him goe first back to Bruxells to fetch the Dutchess and from thence streight into Scotland.

When the Duke found so many of his friends thus bent against his leaveing them, (he) thought fit to discours that matter again with those who first proposed it to him, but he perceived they were all so positive for it (except Mr. Hide) that he soon desisted: Mr. Godolphin sayd, should the Duke not goe, after his consenting to it, upon condition of haveing the Duke of Monmouth's Commission taken from him and he sent away too, would looke like an artifice only to get that done, whereupon the Duke assur'd them he would not move his Majesty any more in that matter but rely on their words, and comply exactly with what had already been resolved on: But the Duke had underhand a pretty good assurance from My Lord Sunderland and others, that when once he was return'd to Court, he should remain there and not be oblig'd to go to Scotland at all.

Before the King came back to London the factious partie had got wind of this project, and as his Majesty was informed by a spy he had amongst them, were hugely disturbed at it, which made the Duke less avers to the journey; and so fear of a counter order to remain at Bruxells when once he

TOME
II.

1679.
It is proposed
the Duke should rather be sent to Scotland, than to Bruxells.

KING JA. Mth
To: 9. 84.

T O M E

II.

1679.

“ was there, desired to fix the matter so far at least as that he “ should be called from thence under pretence of going for “ Scotland, and therefore got the King to communicate it to My “ Lord Essex and Halifax. The former readily assented, the latter “ with some hesitation ; so then his Ma^{ty} declar’d it to all those “ five persons together, who had been consulted with all along “ in those matters, viz. Essex, Halifax, Sunderland, Hide and “ * Godolphin, but would have it order’d so, as that he (it) “ should appear to be a thing of the Duke’s own proposing,
 “ who was directed to write from Bruxells at his arrival there,
 “ to beg leave of his Majesty to goe for Scotland, and then “ under pretence of carrying his Daughters the Princess ANNE “ and ISABELLA (who had lately been permitted to make the “ Duke and Dutchess a visit to see their sister the Princess “ of Orange) he should goe into Holland, where the Yachts “ were to be sent to him, and some frigates to be ready in “ the Downes to carry him stright to Scotland ; but this

* The insertion of the Character which Bishop Burnet has drawn of this Statesman, who continued to possess much influence in the succeeding reigns, may not be deemed irrelevant. “ The last of these was a younger brother of an ancient Family in Cornwall, that had been bred about the King from a page, and was now considered as one of the ablest men that belonged to the Court : He was the silentest and modestest man that was perhaps ever bred in a Court. He had a clear apprehension, and dispatched business with great method, and with so much temper that he had no personal enemies : But his silence begot a jealousy, which has hung long upon him. His notions were for the Court : But his incorrupt and sincere way of managing the concerns of the Treasury, created in all people a very high esteem for him. He loved gaming the most of any man of business I ever knew ; and gave one reason for it, Because it deliver’d him from the obligation to talk much : He had true principles of Religion and Vertue, and was free from all Vanity, and never heaped up Wealth : So that all things being laid together, he was one of the worthiest and wisest men that has been employed in our time : And he has had much of the confidence of four of our succeeding Princes.” (Vol. 2^d. 8^o Ed. P. 113.) — EDITOR.

contrivance to keep it secret seem'd of no use, unless for the greater ease in leaveing the Spanish Territorys, since the discontented partie had alredy notice of it in England.

T O M E
II.

1679.
The Duke
returns to Bruxells to fetch the Dutchess.
KING JA: Mth
To: 9. p. 66.

On the 25th of September the Duke therefore tooke his leave of the King, and by the way of Ostend arrived safe at Bruxells, where after a very little stay following the methods which had been agreed upon, pretended to goe and see the Princess of Orange, that the government there might not know of it till he was out of their Dominions, nor did he advertise them of his designe till the Yachts were come to the Hague; when his Highness sent a person of quality with his compliments and a letter of thanks to the Duke of Villa Hermosa, for his kindness and civility dureing his stay there, then went on board at Mesland Sluce, and from thence streight to London (after a little stop by the way) as the King had agreed underhand, without waiting for the frigates as was pretended he should.

My Lord Essex and Halifax seem'd much concern'd at this, but were tould, the Duke had leave only to take London in his way, the Season of the year being not proper to make the journey by Sea, whereas the Duke was all along assured underhand he should remain there, and not be obliged to goe to Scotland at all. It is true there was a seeming mistery made of permitting him to come to London, and the Duke and Dutchess were obliged to wait in the Downes till leave was sent, and till the Dutchess was fallen so ill as to vomit blood, which furnished too reasonable an excuse for their been permitted to come a shore; but that juggle was understood by the Duke, who was only caution'd for that reason to talke still of goinge to Scotland, and the Dutchess herself desired to concur in that little deceit (as some of the Ministers term'd it) till it were more seasonable to make the thing publick: But the deceit fall at last upon him who had been most accustomed

The Ministers
are trobled at the Duke's coming to London.
KING JA: Mth
To: 8. 121.

T O M E

II.

1679.
The Duke
after all is sent to Scotland.
KING JA. Mth
To: 8. 122.

to suffer them, so that about a week after the Duke's arrival “ My Lord Sunderland and M^r. Hide came to acquaint him, “ that his Majesty thought it for his service he should really goe
 “ to Scotland, thō not to stay longer than the middle of “ January following.

The King's will was always a Law to His Royal Highness, so without contesting the matter or complaining at these “ vexatious changes of Councells, and endless fatigues in “ traveilling, he sets out accordingly towards the end of the “ month (Oct^r 27) leaveing the two Princesses ANNE and “ ISABELLA at S^t. James's. The Dutchess notwithstanding “ her late illness and vomiting blood at Sea, the short time it “ was designed the Duke should stay in Scotland and the “ King's pressing her for that reason to remain at Court, “ would nevertheless accompany him; and thō she was not then above twenty years old, chose rather even with the hazard of her life, to be a constant Companion of the Duke her Husband's misfortunes and hardships, than to enjoy her ease in any part of the world without him, But it was a sensible trouble to his Royal Highness to see the Dutchess thus obliged to undergo a sort of martirdom for her affection to him, and he to humour the peevish and timorous disposition of some Councillors be thus sent a sort of vagabond about the world, not only to his own, but to the King his Brother's visible disadvantage; he was therefore much perplexed to guess from “ whence this new resolution arose, whether it was to content “ My Lord Essex and Halifax who were so ill satisfyd with “ his comeing to London and to make them believe it was “ never intended otherwise but that he should goe to Edinburg;
 “ or whether haveing at that time projected the violent pro“ ceedings against Catholicks, which followed soon after, they “ had a mind the Duke should be absent while that was a “ doing; or whether they really thought it the best to keep all quiet in Scotland, especially since it cast such a dampe upon My Lord Shaftsbury and his gang when they first heard it:

 In fine whatever was the true cause, the Duke patiently submitts without reply to the King, or expostulation with those he thought the authors of it; for thō he was tould by some friends, that those two Lords were come over to his interest, they advised him at the same time to menage them tenderly, that their Stomachs were squemish and could not digest a great deal at once, that things must be communicated to them by parcells, and it was hoped they would be brought at last, to relish whatever should be offer'd to them for his Highness's advantage and become stout and strenuous assertors of his interest; but how much those advisers were mistaken in one of those two Lords apear'd soon after, and whether the other was ever sincerely the Duke's friend, is still as great a mistery as the rest.

T O M E
 II.

1679.

LETTERS
 VOL. I. p. 195.
 212.

When the Duke arrived at York he met not so good a reception as he had reason to expect; the people of that Towne to cover their ill disposition found for an excuse, that formerly upon the like occasion they had directions sent them, how to behave themselves, which now not being done, they were puzzled what respect to pay him. But this saved them not from being reprimanded for their neglect, wherein they were the less to be excused, because others shew'd so good an example, for in most other places on the road the gentry express'd great duty and Loyalty, which his Highness fail'd not to advertice his Majesty of; who in return assured him, they could not have obliged him more, that his and their affections were reciprocal, and therefore was resolved to stick to his true friends, and old resolutions to the last.

The Duke arrives at York.
Ibid: p. 226.

KING Ch:
 LETTERS. p. 53.

Before his Royal Highness left London, he tould the King " he thought it both just and reasonable that since he had been " always named of the Council of Scotland he should Sit in it "

KING JA: Mth
 To: 8. p. 123.

T O M E “ when he was there, which the King readily agreed too, and II. “ the Duke of Lauderdale was order’d to give directions 1679. “ accordingly; but My Lord Montrosse met the Duke at Yorke
 “ to tell him, there was difficulty made of his siting in Council, “ unless he took the Oath of Allegiance as it was called (thō in “ reality it comprehended the sence of the Oath of Supremacy “ too) and that some of the Council had writ to Court about
 “ it: The Duke thanked him for his advertisment, but tould “ him at the same time, that all the while he sat in the English “ Council no Oath had been ever tender’d him, that he had “ the same privilege in Scotland, and should not depart from “ it: Upon which the Marquis return’d and the Duke continued “ his journey, saying nothing of it till he came to Liythenton,
 “ the Duke of Lauderdale’s house; where the Lord Advocate “ spoke to him of it again, insinuating as if this difficulty had “ been chiefly moved by the Lord Chancellor and the Duke “ of Lauderdale’s friend; he confess’d it seem’d positive to him
 “ by the Act that the Oath was to be taken, and that My Lord “ Chancellor had sayd, both he, and the Lord Advocate might “ be question’d in Parliament in case the Duke sat in Council “ without dœing it: But his Royal Highness replyd, It was “ his priviledg as the King’s Brother not to have Oathes re“ quired from him as from other Subjects; that it had been so “ practiced in England and he saw no reason why it should “ be denyd him in Scotland. He acquainted My Lord Murray
 “ and Lord Hatton with this, who were of the same opinion
 “ and layd the blame chiefly upon the Lord Advocate himself.
 “ Nothing more was say of this matter (only the Duke “ mention’d it to My Lord Argyle) till his arrival at Edinburg, which was on the 4th of December, where he was receiv’d with all imaginable expressions of joy and gratitude, for the honour, they say, the King and his Royal Highness did the Country, in his coming to reside amongst them. The Chancellor made him

The Duke arrives at Edinburg.

a speech in the name of the Council, which his Royal Highness replyd to in the most obligeing and affectionate termes imaginable, asureing them he would always make it his utmost endeavours to promote the King's honour and Service together with the interest of the Scottish Nation.

T O M E
II.
1679.

After this cerimony was over, the first thing was to adjust " the difficulty about this Siting in Council, for even before his " arriual he met with letters both from the King and Duke of " Lauderdale, who upon Second thoughts were of opinion it " was necessary the Oath Should be taken ; his Majesty Sayd, " he Saw no more in it, than in the English Oath, and therefore " advised the Duke not to boggle at one since he had taken " the other : The Duke of Lauderdale endeavour'd to reinforce " the same arguments ; but all this changed not his Royal " Highnesse's opinion, he made the Act of Parliament which " enjoins it, be read ; upon hearing of which, he sayd, he was " more convinced than ever, for it appear'd manifestly to be " level'd against fanaticks, and such as had been in the late " Rebellion, which could no ways relate to him ; that he had " sat in the Scottish Council in England, had been Admiral of " Scotland ever since the Duke of Richmond's death, all which " was since the Act, and yet never any Oath was offerr'd to " him ; that indeed he had taken the Oath of Allegiance once " in the English House of Lords, because he found it in the " journal of that House, That the late King his Father when " Prince of Wales had done it, and that but once, and had he " not been in different circomstances then to what he was now, " he would not have done it all ; he confesses he layd done " his Employments rather than take the Oath and Test made " in —73, but that was level'd directly against him, and so " maliciously penn'd that he could not have been obeyd, had " he kept his employments without taking it : In fine these "

KING JA: Mth
To: 8. p. 128.

KING CH:
LETTERS 57.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 232.

TOME
II.

1679.

The Duke of Monmouth returns from Holland.

“ reasons so far convinced his Majesty that at last he order’d
“ the Duke to sit in Council, and that no oathes should be “ tender’d him at all.

But before this difficulty was adjusted his Royal Highness had a more Sensible mortification in another point, for the first news he heard from England, after his arrivall at Edinburg, was of the Duke of Monmouth’s been return’d to London; he had left England about the same time the Duke was sent back to Bruxells, and had been at Vtrecht, but made no great stay in those partes, for whether he was jealous that the Duke’s journey to Scotland would breake his and his partie’s measures, or whether he thought he should have a clearer stage when the Duke’s back was turn’d, and was resolved to profit by the occasion; he arrived from Holland, or at least appear’d publickly in Town the very next day after the Duke set out for Edinburgh, at which the factious partie shew’d great joy by ringing of bells bonafires &c: he immediately sent M^r. Godfrey to beg leave to See the King, and that he would pleas to permit him to offer what he had to say in his justification, and to asure him at the same time that in case it proued not satisfactory, he would most readily submit to his Majesty’s pleasure.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 244.

The King much Displeas’d at it.

The King was hugely surprised at his ventring to return without leave, and sends to him to be gone immediately out of the Kingdom. But instead of obeying, he goes streight to his lodgings in the Cockpit, and it being late when he did it, the King knew it not till next morning, who was then advertised, where he was, and that all the people of his partie flocked to him thither. This put his Majesty out of all patience, who sent to him again that if he went not forthwith out of his house, and the next day out of his Kingdom, he must never expect to see his face any more, and as a farther mark of his displeasure order'd a Commission (Nov: 28th) to be drawne out of hand to constitute the Duke of Albemarle Captain of the troop of guards in his room.

Vpon this message the Duke of Monmouth thought fit to leave the Cockpit, but instead of goeing to Holland he went to his house in hedge lane, and sent repeated instances by My Lord Falconbridg, My Lord Gerrard, and at last by the Dutchess of Monmouth herself to beg the King would pleas to see him at least; but his Majesty stuck firme to his resolution, and finding him not less firme in his disobediance, he took from him likewise the Government of Hull and the Lieftenancys of the Northrideing of Yorkeshire, which he gave to My Lord Mulgrave, and that of Staffordshire to the Earle of Shrewsbury, he order'd Sir Thomas Armestrong to be turned out of the Guards; so that nothing remain'd but the Master of the Hors, which the King forebore depriveing him of for some time, that he might not drive him to dispair, but soon after order'd (Dec: 20) that employment likewise to be menaged by Commissioners.

All this severity made no impression upon him, he declar'd he would live upon his Wive's fortune, since the King took all from him, and accordingly continued at his house, where all the discontented party had free access to him, to project and cabal without the least constraint; at one of their meetings in the City, they layd a plan to prove the King was marryed to his Mother, by means of a letter under the King's hand, owning her to be his Wife, which letter they pretend'd was taken out of her pocket, when she was carryed to the Tower, and in confirmation of this, affirmed they had a news book printed in 1652 which mentioned her under the title of Charles Stewart's Wife.

No body could be more sensible than the King of this affront and disobediance, however suffer'd him at his house, thō fixed

T O M E
II.

1679.
LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 236.

KING CH:
LETTERS. p. 69.

The Duke of Monmouth would not leave the Kingdom.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 253:

The Duke is not allarm'd at it.

T O M E

II.

1679.

in his resolution not to see him. The Duke in the mean time had an account of all this from his friends, who advis'd him not to be allarm'd nor to come back upon it, for that would be improved by his enemys as a no less breach of the King's orders, than the Duke of Monmouth was new accus'd of; which the Duke readily submitts too, and seeming in great measure to slight it, gave his whole attention to the affairs of Scotland, where, by his industry, and application together with his affability and kind reception of the gentry and nobility, he gain'd such credit as did not only much better the King's affairs in that Kingdom, but acquired to himself such an universal love and esteem, that his enemys were hugely dejected at it, and Shaftsbury some time after bewaleing as it were the impotency of his malice, complain'd that the persecuteing of him in England, served only to make him reigne as it were in Scotland.

The Duke
avoides engageing with any party in Scotland.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 268.

There was one Rock his friends apprehended he might split upon in that Country, which however he had the dexterity to avoid; no one doubted but the splendidness of the Duke's first reception there, was in great measure oweing to My Lord Lauderdale's care, which in gratitude might have engaged his Highness to espouse his partie; but he soon found it necessary to keep a newtrality in those matters, for thō he might by generosity and affability, gain all parties to serve the King, and be friends to himself, he saw he could never make them so to one an other; wherefore he prudently shun'd any such partialitys, as would but have layd My Lord Lauderdale's burthen on his own shoulders, which were too hard loaden allready, and had no need of such an adition. But while the Duke gain'd friends in Scotland his absence made them fall away in England, the unsettledness of affairs in that Kingdom stagar'd many men of substance, and Some quite flew off both from him and the King. My Lord Essex had been long

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 224.

wavering and at last surrender'd his place of Commissioner of the Treasury ; he complain'd the Duke had not kept his promise with him of doeing nothing without his advice, he apprehended, he Sayd, there was designes in the bottom against Religion, and he was resolved to have no hand in such Councells: 'Tis certain men of great fortunes may be allow'd to be apprehensive of venturing too far in such turbulent times, and had he stuck there, no one could have blamed him ; but, as the King observed, both he and My Lord Halifax hung after something he was in hopes they had forgot, and it soon appear'd what it was the former drove at, the latter had the good fortune to take both wiser and juster measures.

T O M E
II.

1679.

KING CH:
LETTERS p.58.

The Parliament had been prorogued to the 26th of January, nor was it then designed they should meet ; which assoon as the factious partie got wind of, all hands were at work to procure petitions to the King, they might then sit and do business. The King foresaw this storme and sent to the Lord Major to forewarne him not to encourage any such practices, and issued out a Proclamation declareing it against Law, threatening the utmost Severity to the transgressors ; but the Earle of Shaftsbury and his partie laugh'd at such menaces, and were as active and industrious in raising discontent, as the King in endeavouring to apeas it ; accordingly he and 9 Lords more gave the King a formal Petition to that purpose, they had sollicitated the Citie to joyn with them, but while the Parliament was up the King's authority was of some weight there, which was one reason against their meeting, wherefore notwithstanding this and several other petitions the King resolved in his Council to prorogue the Parliament till the 11th of November following, and took all necessary precautions by forewarning the Lord Major very resolutely against any irregular practices, and by furnishing Portsmouth, Tilbury, Sheerness, and all places of strength with a fit number of

LETTERS
Vol. I. p. 277.
Ibid. 272.

Ibid. 280.

TOME
II.

1679.

troops and select Officers in case of an insurrection ; which these tumultuous proceedings and the Duke of Monmouth's declaration, that he would not stir from London, gave too much reason to apprehend ; for besides his disobediance to the King's reiterated orders, he had given for a reason of his stay, that he knew the King's life was in danger, and therefore for his sake he would not leave the Kingdom, that he might be ready to revenge his Ma^{ty} death upon the Papists if any misfortune happen'd to him, which were dangerous insinuations, and made it more necessary for the King to look to himself.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 280.

284.

Immediately upon the King's resolution to prorogue the Parliament, the Duke had notice from his friends to prepare for his departure from Edinburgh, but not to doe it too hastily least the world might think he only waited for that, and in the mean time to be settling matters in Scotland, that the fruites of his journey might be not lost there ; he goes about therefore to put the King's order in execution which his Highness had lately advised, and obtain'd leave accordingly that the Scottish troops might be exercised in the same manner with those in England, and that the fines and the defaulters might be set apart for any emergent occasion.

KING CH:
LETTERS. 69.

The Duke
waits for the King's orders to returne, which is differ'd:

The Duke expected every day the King's orders without which he would not move, but instead of that his Majesty writ to him, That he thought it necessary he should not stir, till the prorogation was over, which could not be till the 26th of January ; that he would send away the Yachts that very day for him, and hoped he would acquiesc in what both he and all his friends thought equally necessary for both their advantage ; that his being in Scotland had had so good an effect as to put a damp upon the discontented partie here, and no time being more to be apprehended than when the prorogation was made, his presence in Scotland would keep all quiet there, and his absence contribute very much to the same in England, whereas

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 300.

any change or motion (such as his coming especially) might create a new disturbance. TOME II.

Though this fresh disappointment considering how his Royal Highness's patience had been exercised, was very mortifying; however it met with usual compliance, and thō he could not helpe being apprehensive what these frequent changes might end in, yet that made no so deep an impression upon him, as the resolution he heard was taken of exercising certain Severitys against Catholicks; this touch'd his Royal Highness more than what related to himself, so that he could not forbear complaining of it to the King, who assured him he was far from a persecuteing temper, especially when it must fall upon persons who have deserved well of him, but in the present circumstances could not avoid doeing what indeed was very hard in it self, but hoped might prevent greater Severitys; it was conceiv'd the Nation would not be satisfyd, that by this long prorogation the further prosecution of the Plot should be suspended, if in the mean time this method were not used to remove the chief of the Catholick partie out of the Kingdom, that the people in the intrim might think themselves safe at least, and for that reason no passes were denyd to any Catholicks who desired to go into forreign partes.

1679.

KING CH.
LETTERS. 77.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 302.

This fine spunn excuse which the Duke saw very well the drift of, and which his Protestant friends gave so willingly into, made him tell them likewise he perceiv'd all sides concurr'd in oppressing those who had no ways deserved it, they replyd, that this method was necessary to open the way for his speedy return to Court, and his quiet abode when there; but his Highness's principles were not to build upon the ruins of inocent men, and (he) therefore expostulates so severely (at) their concurrence in this affair, that M^r Hide seem'd extreemly surpris'd at it, and sayd, He was no longer (he found) capable of serveing his Highness if he could not

The Duke is much concern'd for the intended prosecution of the Catholicks.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 317.

T O M E preserve his countenance, protection, and even approbation
II. in what he did ; expressing a desire rather to retire early, than 1679. by acting longer in his Highness's affairs draw a greater burthen of displeasure, where he expected to have merited most ;
 but such was the Duke's generosity and justice that thō it had really been for his advantage that the Catholicks should have laine under this persecution, he was resolved never to have it on such termes, as that those who had shared with him in his sufferings should have the like treatment procur'd them by his prosperity too.

1680.

THE 26th of January being come the King * prorogues the Parliament and writes to the Duke to return to Court, but as his life was made up of mortifications and crosses, so even the few satisfactions he had, were seldom without a mixture of disappointments ; for thō the King had resolved to prorogue the Parliament till November, it seems he did it only till the 15th of April, and for reason alledg'd, that the French were using all imaginable endeavours to engage the Dutch into an Alliance, that Mons^r Davaux their Minister at the 1680.

T O M E
II.

The Parliament is prorogued, and
the Duke
order'd to return from Scotland.
KING CH.
LETTERS p. 81.

* RAPIN dates the rise of WHIG and TORY from this period. " At the time I am speaking of, we have seen Petitions sent to the King, to pray him to hold the Parliament ; but as soon as the Parliament was prorogued, and the DUKE OF YORK at Court, a great number of contrary Addresses were presented in Abhorrence of the former, so that two Parties were formed called the Petitioners and the Abhorrrers ; and as the animosity between the two Parties gradually increased, they bestowed upon each other Names of reproach, and from hence came the so much famed distinction of WHIG and TORY. The Petitioners looking upon their adversaries as persons entirely devoted to the Court and the Popish Faction, gave them the name of Tories, a title given to the Irish Robbers, who were ready to act any daring or villanous Enterprize, these are the same that were since called Rapparees. The Abhorrrers on their side considering the Petitioners, as men entirely in the Principles of the Parliament of 1640, and, Presbyterians in their hearts, gave them the name of Whig or Sour Milk, formerly appropriated to the Scotch Presbyterians and rigid Covenanters. These Names have been transmitted, with the Factions to which they were applied, down to our Age." (Tindal's Translation. — EDITOR.

TOME
II.

1680.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 304.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 319.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 224.

The King's reasons for recalling him.

Hague partely by wheedling and partely by threats began to work upon them, and that in order to remove the main obstacle which ris from their union and dependance upon England, he insinuated they could expect no helpe from thence, pretending he had intelligence that the Parliament was to be prorogued for a long time, and that without it they knew the King could do nothing: The King therefore on the other hand thought it necessary both for the preservation of Flanders and the common peace of Europe to obstruct this Vnion, and had no way to perswade the Hollanders that he should be both willing and able (according to his Allyance) to assist the States if the French broke in upon them, but by letting them see, that he and his Parliament were not at such a distance but they could meet readily, and would in all probability, as readily concur, if need requier'd it, in a war against France, and for the support of Holland, as he and they could desire; so doubted not by this short proroguation and haveing the Parliament always at a call, he should keep France from invadeing Holland, and Holland from joining with France, which otherwise, that people's aversion to war would have forced the States to consent too. He resolved therefore (he sayd) to keep such a countenance in the matter as to perswade the world the difference betwixt him and his Parliament was not irreconciliable, that he durst meet them, and by that means keep his neighbours so well composed, that in reality he should not need to meet them at all, which was certainly the properest medium in this conjuncture, and what he most desired; for in the bottom the King never intended they should then meet to do business unless the exegency of his forreign Allyances forced him to it.

This reasoning held upon so slender a thread, that the Ministers apprehended the Duke's comeing to Court might endanger the breakeing it, which put the King to his witts again, to find an excuse for that too: so when he acquainted the Council with his designe of calling his Brother out of Scotland, he tould them, he found no such effect from his absence as could perswade him to continue it longer, considering that probably the same questions might be put again in Parliament not only of as high nature in themselves, but of so great concerne particularly to him, that he thought it agreeable both to reason and justice, the Duke should be present at the next Sessions to make his own deffence, and in the mean time assures them he will answer for such a compliance in him to all things necessary for the general quiet and tranquility, as no body should have reason to be alarmed at his return, or apprehended his presence might have the least ill influence upon the publique; by which plausible turn the King made the Duke's journey rather an argument for the Parliament's meeting than a hindrance to it.

Assoon as the King's Letter pursuant to these resolves came to his Royal Highnesse's hands he acquainted the Lords of the Privy Council of Scotland with it, assuring them that though his joy was great to go to the King, yet he could not part from them without a sensible trouble, and real reluctancy, haveing met with such demonstrations of civility and kindness from all ranks and orders, particularly the Council, as must ever endear them to him, and make him bear a most greatfull memory of their favours; that he would not fail to meet their loyalty and affection, with all the services he should be capable of doing them; that he would acquaint his Majesty he had in Scotland a brave and Loyal Nobility and Gentry, a regular and wise Privy Council, and the Judicatures fill'd with learned and upright persons, that the disaffected partie was not so considerable as those in England represented them; and then haveing recommended peace amongst some Highland familys, who he found firme to his Majestys interest, he tooke his leave takes leave of the Scottish Council.

The Duke
BAKER. p. 777.

TOME
II.

1680.

of them. The Chancellor in return assured his Royal Highness they could never express the sence they had of the honour of his presence, or of the advantage they had receiv'd from his conduct and advice, declared how devoted they were and ever would be to his Majesty's and Royal Highnesse's service, and that they could not bear the trouble they had to part with him, were it not for the pleasure he would have to be with the King, and that they must always prefer his satisfaction before their own; and to leave nothing undone which might testify their gratitude on this occasion, The Privy Council sent a most dutifull letter after him to the King fill'd with acknowledgments for the honour his Majesty had done them, by sending the Duke thither, with huge commendations of his conduct and prudence, as likewise all immaginable protestations of their readiness to serve his Ma^{ty} and Royal Highness to the utmost of their powers.

He comes away by Sea.

Though the season of the year was improper for a journey by Sea, yet the Duke and Dutchess too (who was now made to hardships as well as himself) counted that for nothing, but immediately went on shipboard and arrived happily at the privy stairs on the 24th of February; he was no sooner there but it appear'd who had Suffer'd most by his absence, and that it was so far from being necessary for the King's affairs, that nothing could contribute more to their advancement than his being at Court again, which cast So great a damp upon the discontented partie, that though My Lord Shaftsbury stroue all he could to keep life in the Plot and in the Councells of his factious Clubb, yet the credit of both grew faint and wavering, the very Townes and Countrys which had been most active in promoteing Petitions, did publickely declare their abhorrance of such practices, in which none were more zealous than the City of Westminster it self, and the address from Norfolk thank'd the King even for recalling the Duke.

BAKER. 778.

This put a necessity upon those furious Zealots to redouble their endeavours of keeping up (if possible) the jealouzys and ferment in the people, no accident could happen but it was immediately about to be some new designe of the Papists. One Atford was secured for certain undue practices in the City, which Sir William Waller immediately proclaimes to be a new Popish Plot, that the Guards were to join the Papists to cut the Protestant's throats, and that the same was intended in Ireland.

T O M E
II.

1680.
The factious Partie alarmed at his returne.
KING JA: Mth.
Tom. 8. pag. 135.

Soon after My Lord Shaftsbury acquainted the Council with an other Plot in that Kingdome said to be carryd on by Bishop Plunket the Catholick Primate and the reste of the Clergie for delivering it up to the French: The King bein then at Newmarket a Commitie of Lords was appointed to receive this information, and to send for whom and what they pleas'd, which was done it seems without acquainting the Lord Lieftenant of Ireland or his Majesty himself or so much as knowing the enformers names, which My Lord Shaftsbury thought not fit to trust them with; for no irregularitys were esteem'd dangerous in any proceedings against Catholicks, or the Duke himself who was brought into this Plot too, for they Saw well enough that So long as these accusations only affected private persons, it was but like lopping of the branches which would spring again, unless they could reach the head of the Cedar itself which would bring all downe along with it.

There could not be a boulder Stroke in order to this, than the pretence of a Black Box, in which was sayd to be found a writing, importeing a contract of mariage betuixt his Majesty and the Duke of Monmouth's Mother; the King was resolved to serch into the bottom of it, and S^r Gilbert Gerrard who was sayd to have seen it, was carryed before the Council, but he positively disowned that he had either seen or knew any such thing ; this insolence however stuck upon the King's “ stomach, and therefore in May following when his Majesty “ was indisposed haveing two or three ague fitts, the Duke of “ Monmouth it seems writ to him to enquire of his health “ signeing at the bottom your dutifull Monmouth, and inclosed “ it, in one to M^r. Godolphin ; which when he deliver'd to the “ King his Majesty bid M^r. Godolphin tell him, That if he “ would make his actions answerable to the conclusion of his “ letter and obey his orders, it was the only way to a recon“ ciliation, but that if he flatter'd himself with the Support of “ the factious partie, or that the Parliament might interpose “ for him, he should find it would but make things worse ; and accordingly about a month after perceiving no change in the Duke of Monmouth's conduct published a declaration (June 3)* protesting upon the word of a King and faith of a Christian, that he was never marryed to M^{rs}. Barlow, alias Walters, the Duke of Monmouth's Mother, no to any other woman but the Queen, which together with the Oath of all the Lords present was registred in Chancery.

T O M E

II.

1680.

The Duke is presented for recusancy.
 KING JAM: M^{rs}
 Tom.8.pag.145

LETTERS
 VOL.1. p.364.

The discovery of this Mine hinders not My Lord Shaftsbury from driveing on an other, the Success of which he thought would not be so easily prevented. On the 16th of June therefore accompanyd with severall Lords and Commoners, he came to the grand Jury at Westminster, where after haveing represented the mighty dangers of Popery, and spoke with great bitterness against the Duke, he * indicted him for being a * TINDAL, in his translation of RAPIN, gives the names of those persons who attested the bill, “ the Earls of Huntington and Shaftsbury ; the Lords “ Grey of Werk, Brandon Gerard, Russel and Cavendish ; Sir Gilbert Gerard, “ Sir Edward Hungerford, Sir Scroop How, Sir William Cooper, Sir Thomas “ Wharton, John Trenchard, Thomas Thynne, and William Forrester Esquires. “ By the sudden dismission of the grand jury, the matter had no consequence in “ the forms of the court.” — EDITOR.

Recusant, accompanying his information with proof of his haveing heard Mass, and desired them to present him as such to the end two thirds of his estate might be Seized, thinking it of dangerous consequence, he sayd, that the Plot office should remain in such hands, and then (to put him in good Company) he desired at the same time, the Dutchess of Portsmouth might be presented too as a common neusance: The formalitys of the Law required some time ere this could be brought to an issue in reference to the Duke; but the Dutchesse of Portsmouth stayd not so long ere she was frighted into a reconciliation, and did it so effectually as to become even a Patron to her pretended prosecutors, to give them private meetings, and particularly the Duke of Monmouth; and in order to shew her new friends her Zeal for their service, did all she could to enforce those Councels which were for removeing the Duke from Court again; and alledged for a reason of her coudness to him, that the Dutchesse had not shewn her so much respect or markes of kindness as she thought her due: This was but a frivolous excuse, the true motive was security, and * interest (which generally are the only Idols such

KING JAM: Mth.
Tom: 8. pag. 157.

* BURNET says (vol: 2^d.) "She was hearty for the Exclusion: Of which, adds he, I had this particular account from Mountague, who I believe might be the person that laid the bait before her. It was proposed to her, that if she could bring the King to the Exclusion, and to some other popular things, the Parliament would go next to prepare a Bill for securing the King's person; in which a clause might be carried, that the King might declare the Successor to the Crown, as had been done in Henry the eighth's time Mountague assured me, that she not only acted heartily in this matter, but she once drew the King to consent to it, if she might have had 800,000*l*. for it: And that was afterwards brought to 600,000*l*. But the jealousies upon the King himself were such, that the managers in the House of Commons durst not move for giving money till the bill of Exclusion should pass, lest they should have lost their credit by such a motion: And the King would not trust them." (8th: Ed.) — EDITOR.

T O M E

II.

1680.

The Dutchesse of Portsmouth brought over to the factious partie, upon which they think of sending the Duke away again.

persons offer incense too) that influenced her in that affair, for those generous principles of supporteing oppress'd inocency make but a weak impression upon people of that Character.

Shaftsbury's cunning therefore on this occasion deceiv'd him not, thō hers did in the end ; for he by seeming to declare war against this mercenary woman, frighted her into an Alliance with him against the Duke, and she haveing the greatest influence over the King was the enemy of all others that wrought his Royal Highness the greatest mischief. Nor is it to be wonder'd that when the partie got such a reinforcement, they began to shake the King's resolution, which assoon as the Ministers were

KING JAM. Mth.
Tom:8. pag. 149.

“ aware of, they turn likewise with the wether and fall into “ expostulations with his Highness himself, telling him, That “ all the misfortunes that have befallen the King and him too, “ were to be charged to his account, that the factious Partie
“ could never have rais'd such a storme against the Govern“ ment had not his declareing himself a Catholick given them the first handle : This was perpetually buss'd also in his Majestys ear by those who had greatest credit with him, which made the Duke think it necessary to justify himself, and shew the true origin from whence all those misfortunes sprung. It is

Ibid. p. 159.

“ true, says he, one day to the King considering how low the “ Monarchie is now brought, it has not vigour enough left to “ crush those who rise in opposition against it, and therefore “ such attacks as these make a sencible impression upon it ;
“ but had those persons who now complain most, or their “ greatest friends, who had the management of affairs at the “ Restoration done their duty, the Crowne had been out of the “ reach of such attempts as now shake it So grievously. A “ weake distemper'd body is sencibly affected with any light “ accident, which makes not the least impression upon one in “ perfect health ; it was they therefore, who brought the “ Crowne so low who ought to bear the blame of its present agony; for had that opportunity been prudently managed " which the Restoration afforded, the Crowne might have had " such a revenue settled upon it as would have answer'd all its " expences, and so cut the ground from under the Republikan's " feet, who have no other to stand on when they invaded the " Throne. The next fault was the engaging the King in a " war with Holland; which is not, says he, to be layd at my " door, all the world knows it was the House of Commons " and the Merchants that press'd it, on account of the injurys " they had suffer'd from the Dutch in the Indies, on the Coast " of Guinia, and els where, and I was not lead into it any " otherwise than by the cry of the people, and the desire of " being at the head of such a force, which considering my " temper and education could not be wonder'd at. And thō it " had not the Success that might have been expected, nō fault " was ever found with my conduct or management. But the " most fatal blow (says he) the King gave himself to his power " and prerogative was, when he sought aid from the House of " Commons to destroy the Earle of Clarendon, by that he put " that House again (in mind) of their impeaching privilege, " which had been wrested out of their hands by the Restoration; " and when Ministers found they were like to be left to the " Censure of the Parliament, it made them have a greater " attention to court an interest there than to pursue that " of their Princes from whom they hoped not for so sure a " Support.

T O M E
II.

1680.

But notwithstanding all the Duke could say to shew from " what spring all these troubles flowed, still the cry went against " him, as the Jonas for whose sake these stormes were rais'd; " and therefore the King had no sooner declared in Council on the 18th of August, that the Parliament should sit on the 21st of October, but all the world cast about to save themselves, and the Duke like that Prophet must be sacrificed for the publick

KING JAM. Mth.
Tom. 8. pag. 151

T O M E “ quiet. Some of his friends informed him that an Impeach-
II. “ ment would certainly be brought against him for High 1680. “ Treason, others told him they would drive at a bill of KING JAM. Mth. “ Limitation, which once pass’d, they would look upon a TOM. 8. pag. 151. “ Common wealth in a manner settled, others sayd they would send him away again; in fine their was no evil that malice or envy could contrive but by some hand or other it was levell’d Ibid. 143. “ at his head: However none of these informations troubled “ him so much as an account he had, that the Ministers them“ selves had resolved to have a bill brought in the next Parlia“ ment, to banish all Catholicks out of the Kingdom; he “ knew My Lord Halifax had long meditated this project, but “ thought it would never have gon farther, whereas now he “ found it was both embraced and advised by those in greatest “ power, thinking to make their court to the Nation by it, and “ settle all things at quiet: but he (was) astonished that men “ of sence did not see that Religion was only the pretence,
 “ and that the real contest was about Power and Dominion, “ that it was the Monarchie they designed to banish, without “ which the other banishments would give them little Satis“ faction.

The King pre-vail’d upon to send the Duke again into Scotland.

KING JAM. Mth.
 TOM. 8. pag. 165.

However as yet no new measures were taken in reference to the Duke, the Ministers had some courage left, till a Parlia“ ment stared them in the face; and had the King been able “ to live without the assistance of that Assembly, the Duke “ had found more friends and he himself better served, but “ when once the time of its siting aproached, all eyes were “ fixed upon it, and every head turned by its influence: In “ October following while the Court was at Newmarket, the “ Duke began to find the effects of this, his being sent away “ again began to be more discours’d of than ever: Upon “ which his Highness spoke to My Lord Sunderland and M^r “ Godolphin who assured him there was no alteration of measures, and that his Majesty thought of no such thing, " but their couldness soon after to the Duke's friends made " him suspect there was more in it than they pretended, and " (he) was at last convinced of the change when the day after " the King's arrival in Town, they both came to M^r Hide and " tould him they thought it for his Majestys service that the " Duke should go again out of England and the next day " tould the Duke himself the same thing; who upon discours " found they had determin'd to this by My Lord Essex and " Halifax, the first where of was for his going to Flanders, the " latter only for his absenting from Court: The Duke say he " was not astonished that those two Lords should give such " advice, but that My Lord Sunderland and M^r Godolphin " should concur with them in it, surpris'd him to the last degree, " especially since they never gave him the least advertishment " thereof, but on the contrary bore him in hand with continual " assurances there was no such thing intended; he tould them " he was not conscious to himself to have given them any reason " to treat him so, but had used a greater condescension to them " than ever he had done to any in their Station before. "

These supportes failling him so unawares struck him with " a wors apprehention, and made him suspect the King himself " began to waver, and accordingly he soon found by discours's " on that Subject that his Majesty now doubted whether he " could stand by him or no: The Duke represented to him his " constant and late engagement to the contrary, but found him " So changed, that it gave him great reason now at last to " apprehend what he had been oft tould but never believed, " That his Majesty would abandon him in the end. He put " (the King) therefore in mind how My Lord Shaftsbury had " given his Majesty's instability for a land marke, as he call'd " it, to dissuade all men from trusting or relying upon him, " and that he was pleas'd to reply to it, He was glad that Lord "

The Duke's discours to the King on this occasion.
KING JAM. Mth.
Tom. 8. pag. 171.

T O M E

II.

1680.

“ had put such marke upon him, for he would prove him a “ Lyer and so turn it against himself: His Ma^{ty} could make “ no reply to this, nor to the complaint his Highness made of “ his two Ministers’ conduct towards him. Nevertheless the “ Duke tould him if his Majesty thought his absence would “ be for his seruice he would go to any part of the world, but “ believ’d it would have a quite contrary effect, that it would “ discourage his friends, hearten his enemys, and ruin his “ credit; wherefore he begg’d of him before he came to a “ positive resolution, to advise with those who were no ways “ byas’d in their Councells, whereas My Lord Sunderland and “ M^r. Godolphin were influenced he fear’d, one by his three “ Uncles, the other by his Brother in Law; that My Lord “ Essex his principles as to government was too well known,
 “ and his late reconciliation with My^d Shaftsbury made it “ without doubt; that My Lord Halifax was an Athist and “ had hithertoo been no good friend to Monarchie: In con“ clusion the King promised he would take the advice of his “ Privy Council, which accordingly he did, and a much “ greater part was against it; but the King and those who “ had most credit with him continuing in their former opinion, “ cunningly moved such questions in Council, as they saw “ would both distract and terrify the rest, as whether the “ King should break the Parliament if it should impeach the “ Duke and such like perplexing suppositions, which diverted “ their comeing to any resolution in reference to the matter in “ hand, and made those who were against the Duke’s going “ be silent: Whereupon his Majesty proposed his returning “ again to Scotland, as the best expedient, and sayd he would “ advise him to it, which he did accordingly the Sunday “ following; but the Duke had the same answerd ready he had “ formerly made him, That he neither thought (it was) for his “ Ma^{ty} seruice, nor had he any business of his own in that Country, but that if his Majesty thought fit to command " T O M E him, his obedience was the Same it ever had been, and if " II.

 so desired he would pleas to write a letter to the Council " 1680.
 of Scotland, acquainting them he had commanded his repair " 1680.
 thither to look after his affairs in that Kingdom, which was " 1680.
 done accordingly. "

There was one thing his Highness thought might be of use " The Duke to him before he went, which was to have a Pardon and " desires a Par- therefore asked it of his Majesty as a thing that would take " don, which is away all grounds of impeachment ; the King Sayd, that had " denyd.
 been already proposed to him by Secretary Jenkins, but he " KING JAM: M^{rs} conceiv'd it would be better (if the Parliament went to that) " Tom. 8. p. 177.
 to break them, than to give him a Pardon, w^{ch} he conceiv'd " 1680.
 would create as much tumult and disorder as the other ; and " 1680.
 when the Duke replyd, It was a favour had scarce ever been " 1680.
 refus'd any Minister and hoped it would not be denyd him ; " 1680.
 the King nevertheless persisted in his resolution of not doing " 1680.
 it, which gave his Highness but a melencolie apprehension " 1680.
 of what his future fate might be, when he Saw his enemys so " 1680.
 furious against him, those he tooke to be his friends so treacher- " 1680.
 ously abandon him, and the King himself so unsteddy in his " 1680.
 resolutions of standing by him : This made him lay aside the " 1680.
 thoughts of absconding for awhile about the Town to see " 1680.
 how matters would go, which some had advised him too, " 1680.
 and think it even necessary for his preservation to be gone " 1680.
 haveing reason to believe it was his life they aim'd at now. "

However he did not so abandon himself to Providence as " The Duke's to neglect all reasonable endeavours for his own support, he " discours to was always resign'd but never despair'd, so fail'd not at his " y^e King at parteing to represent to the King the danger his Majesty " parteing.
 run in following the Councells of unsteddy, weak and " KING JAM. M^{rs} treacherous men ; and forwarn'd him not only with the " Tom. 8. p. 179.
 example of several of his predecessors, but particularly with "

TOME

II.

1680.

“ that of the late King his Father ; that Zeal for Religion was “ the pretence now, just as it was then, but that the drift and “ designes of the Parties were the same, and therefore not to “ credit those who were so ready to undertake for the good “ Success of such compliances they moved him too, which “ might perhaps put off the evil day, but would make it much “ more formidable when it came. He then fell upon what “ methods his enemys might probably take against him, as “ Impeachment, bill of Attainder, or Exclusion, that it was “ to guard him from the first he had desired a Pardon, because “ if once an Empeachment were lodged in the House of Lords,
 “ the Commons would certainly press his Majesty to issue out a “ Proclamation, for his apearance at such a day, which if he “ complyd not with, he should be declar’d a Traitor, and then
 “ if he dyd before his Majesty, his bloud being tainted, his “ Children could not be restor’d but by Act of Parliament :
 “ The King sayd there was no danger of their takeing that “ method, but that if they did, he would never consent to any “ such Proclamation ; he sayd he would tell them, to make “ what Laws they pleas’d for security of Religion, where in he “ would concur, but not in the pursute of their malice against “ the Duke his Brother, and if they press’d hard upon him “ would certainly break them ; but he rather thought they “ would prosecute him by bill, and then he should have more “ time to fence against it, and let what will happen was “ resolved (he sayd) never to consent to any unreasonable “ demande either in reference to him, the Militia, their time “ of sitting, or in fine any thing that lessen’d his power or “ prerogative.

KING JAM. Mth
 TOM. 8. p. 184.

“ This resolution, the Duke Sayd, he was glad to hear, but “ still apprehended the same reasons and reasoners, who had “ prevail’d thus far might stretch out his Majesty’s compliance “ even to yeildeing any of the points he mention’d ; that he fear'd when his back was turn'd, there would be no one " T O M E found, who would venter to advise resolute Councells, espe- " II.

cially haveing so fresh an example of his Majesty's mutability, " 1680.
in sending him away after haveing so positevely resolved the " " contrary; and lastely he enlarged upon what methods he " " thought necessary for the King's own preservation, where in " " he left nothing unsayd which was fit for a Loyal Subject and " " a most affectionate Brother to say. "

There was more reason for the Duke's endeavouring to fortify the King in his good resolutions, seeing in what hands he left him and what artes had been used to influence him, and which would always be ready on the like occasions; he was now " fully Satisfyd that those Ministers which formerly he took so " much for his friends, were the very first projectors of this, and " had consulted and layd the matter together with the Dutchess " of Portsmouth, long before they acquainted the King with it; " and to prepare him by degrees and bring him over to their " opinion, represented his Majesty's condition to be much " worse than in reality it was, that the heartes of the People " were quite alienated from him, that the Fleet would abandon " him, and that the very Guards themselves began to be " poison'd, and could not be depended on. This was tould " the King by each separately as if it were their single opinion, " with which he was so terrifyd he could hould out no longer " but at last agreed to send the Duke away. "

The continuance the Ministers had to bring the King to consent that the Duke should be sent away.

There is no doubt but the Dutchess of Portsmouth had " made her conditions with My Lord Shaftsbury and the " factious Partie; she had been Several times at London that " Summer from Windsor, in one of which journeys she had a " Conference with My Lord Howard of Escrike, which when " the King tould her of, She sayd it was to bring him over, " but it soon apear'd who was brought over by it, for besides " her picking quarrels with The Dutchess that she was "

T O M E “ not So kind to her as formerly, nor shew’d her so much II. “ respect as to Mad^e Mazarine, she took likewise occasion to 1680. “ complain of the Duke, that dureing the King’s late sickness “ he made her no offers of kindness, whereas in effect she “ could not but be Sencible it had been highly improper for “ him to have done it, had his Majesty’s distemper been more “ dangerous than in reality it was : She knew very well (and “ so did those who caball’d with her) that the Duke never “ abandon’d his friends, in which they might have rested “ secure, had they been realy so ; however both he and the “ Dutchess used all the artes they could to pleas her, but that “ not being the true cause of her disgust, such applications “ wrought no cure.

The Parliament meets.

The day after the Duke’s departure bein the 21th of October, the Parliament met. The King acquainted them in his Speech of his haveing made Allyances with Spain and Holland, that Tangier had been very expensive of late for which he demanded a supply, that he would not have them meddle with the Succession but was ready to concurr in any thing els for security of * Religion, and therefore minded them to proceed in the discovery of the Plot and the Tryalls of the five Lords in the Tower.

The Bill of Exclusion brought in.

The Commons gave litle attention to what his Majesty proposed, but running quite counter to his directions fell immediately upon the Succession, and therefore what pass’d in the House was of little moment till the 11 of November, when they were ready with a Bill to exclude his Royal Highness from the Throne and to make him incapable of inheriteing and possessing the Crowne of England or Ireland, and that if he ever clam’d or made any attempt to possess himself thereof,

LETTERS
 VOL. I. P. 429.

* The fact of Charles the second having abjured the Protestant Religion before his Restoration, is stated by Rapin when noticing this Speech. — EDITOR.

or exercise any such power, Jurisdiction &c, that he should be deem'd a Traitor, and suffer as such ; that who soever should assist him in any such clame, or by word or writeing assert his haveing a Right, should incur the like guilt, that if he the said Duke of York should after the 5th day of November, 1680, enter into any of the said Dominions, or those who were aiding to him therein, shall be guilty of High treason and that neither he nor they should be capable of any pardon or Noli prosequi allowed, but that it should be lawfull for all Magistrates, Officers, or other Subjects to resist the said Duke of York if he attempt'd to return, and were thereby required to do it, and to apprehend or subdue him by force ; but in the end (they) insert a proviso that this Act should not affect the next, or any other heire to the Crowne, who may succeed as if the Duke of York were dead, and then orders it to be read twice every year in all Churches and to be given in the Charge at every Assise or Session during the life of the Said Duke of York.

The Debate (Oct. 26.) concerning this Bill was so solemn and the case So extraordinary that it seems necessary to give an abstract of the particulars of it, not only for the honour of those who durst in opposition to all the terrours and threats of those violent men discharge their duty and conscience in the defence of justice, but also to shew how fury and malice hurryd men (otherwise of good partes and learning) to outface the common maximes of reason, justice, and Religion itself under pretence even of defending it.

My Lord Russell first open'd the matter by telling them that since they were assembled to consult and advise about the great affairs of the Kingdom, that he conceived none to be of greater consequence than the preservation of the King's life together with their Libertys and Religion, all which were in eminent danger from Popery, so that if the Parliament did not suppress the growth of Popery, Popery would soon suppress it

T O M E
II.

1680.

The Debates in the House of Commons concerning the BILL of EX-CLUSION.

TOME and therefore moved they might begin with considering how to prevent that and a Popish Successor in the first place.

II.

1680.

S^r Henry Capel seconds him and makes the Papists to have been the chief instruments of all that was ever done or happen'd amiss of late : It was their diabolical Councells, says he, that made war be declar'd with Holland that the Protestants might destroy each other, it was they brought division into the Fleet under Prince Rupert and General Monk with design to ruin it, and were the occasion of the Shipps being burnt at Chattam It was they set the City on fire and by their Councell those who were taken in the fact pass'd without tryal, and a Papist that confess'd he was one of them, was hang'd in hast, that the business might be huddled up ; it was they caus'd the violation of the triple league, and sacrificed the King's honour by perswading him to make an Alliance with France, and to seize the Dutch Smirna Fleet before war was declared ; that in Ireland the Papists contrary to Law wore armes, that in Scotland they had chang'd the Government, there being now a standing force and almost no Parliaments in that Kingdome ; that the French Ambassador's frequency at Court look'd as if he were one of the King's Cabinet Council rather than a Minister of a forreign Prince, that the truth of all this appear'd by Colman's Letters, and that it was the hopes of the Duke's Accession to the Crown, that gave life and encouragement to these enormitys, and therefore it behouded them to prevent it. Severall other Members concured in chargeing all the misfortunes and mismanagements they could think on, upon the back of the Papists as the main authors of them, So that if it had not looked too * little the power of the Prophet Elias (which would have suted ill with a Religion they decryd at such a rate) they would undoubtedly have charged them with the irregularitys of the Season, as they did the Christians in the primitive Church, and that they hinder'd the rain from falling, or the Sund from shining upon the earth; and truly they might as well have arraign'd them for governing the influences of the heavens, as that a handfull of men in no credit or imployment (the Duke only excepted) should govern that of State; however this pass'd for good and solid reasoning, and a sufficient argument to take into consideration how to prevent a Popish Successor, preferable to all other business.

* Here the word little appears to have been inserted by the Secretary for that of like. "if it had not looked too like the power," &c. — EDITOR.

That point being therefore determined Coll: Titus stood up and said, He had observed from the cours of the evidence concerning the Popish Plot, that it was the expectation of the Duke's Accession to the Throne that had given life and encouragement to those designes, that it was not to be hoped, their interest could be lessen'd while his expectancy stood, and therefore moved that a Bill might be brought in to exclude him. My Lord Russel sayd, There apear'd no other means to prevent the certain miserys which would otherwise infallebly fall upon the Nation; and M^r Harbord sayd, The Duke influenced all Councells, as to Peace and War, forreign Allyances and domestick affairs, that the meeting, sitting and dissolving of Parliaments depended on his pleasure, that the prosecution of the Plot had been discouraged by him, and that thō he bore a great respect to his person, he could not think the King and Kingdom safe without his exclusion and therefore press'd it might be brought in accordingly.

M^r Granvill then stood up, and agreed that the dangers from Popery were great, but hoped however other means might be found for their security than so extraordinary a method; that the King had offer'd to agree to any other, provided it impeached not the Succession, so that to proceed upon such a bill would disoblige the King and obstruct all other

T O M E

II.

1680.

T O M E
II.

1680.

business, which might be of ill consequence both at home and abroad; and therefore moved a bill might be brought in to banish Papists, and another for frequent Parliaments and good Magestrates, which he hoped would do the worke as well, and not proceed with severity against the Duke without hearing him in his own defence.

S^r Henry Capel sayd in answer to the first objection That it was no new thing for Parliaments to give advice contrary to the King's directions, that it was his great Council and could not be restrain'd; that there were precedents where Kings have had advice offer'd to them by the Parliament, which thō not gratefull at first, yet upon further consideration they have enter'd into and aproved of, as it happen'd, he sayd, in the case of the late tolleration, which at first the King declar'd he would not departe from yet afterwards thought fit to recall it: Coll: Titus, in answer to the expedient, sayd, That banishing the Papists without the Duke would signify nothing, that it would be in his power alone to do any thing when once he was on the throne, for that it had been found by sad experience that the strength of the Laws was not sufficient to defend them from Popish Tyrants, that no Prince of that Religion ever thought himself bound to keep faith with Hereticks.

M^r Hyde in opposition to this, sayd, He was concern'd for the honour of the House's equity, not to condemn a person without hearing him or any process against him, he questioned whether such a Bill would be binding, that he believed many Loyall persons as well as himself would be of that opinion, and so it might occasion a Civil War, the King, he sayd, might well out live the Duke, and why should they * to prevent a thing they could never answer for? He did not aprehend the cause was so desperate but that they might secure themselves without overturning fundamentalls. T O M E

* Here some words seem to have been omitted, thō no vacant space was left in the MS. — EDITOR.

II.

S^r Lyonell Jenkins seconds this and was of opinion let the danger be what it would, it was more eligible to try expedients than to run at first to so desperate a remedy as he tooke the bill to be, which was so manifestly against both Law and Conscience that nothing less than an Army could maintain it; he therefore moved for a tryal of expedients, and that it was time enough to proceed to extremity when all ordinary ways and means were found insufficient.

1680.

M^r Bennet in answer to this, wonder'd, he sayd, any one could doubt of the legality of such a proceeding; that the Legislative power was unlimited, that the Commons could offer what they thought proper to the Lords, and so to the King, and surely, says he, they want not a Law to make Laws. Nor can any Law be against the Laws they make; and as for the arguments from conscience, he slipp'd that over with a slight piece of sophistry too, that he saw no conscience against it, unless they were in conscience obliged to introduce Popery; the expedients he fear'd, when they came to be examined would be found insufficient, that no Law would bind Papists who never thought themselves obliged to keep either Law, word, or promis, to Protestants any longer than it was necessary to compass the cutting of their throats, and as for the danger of Civil Warrs, he fear'd it not, in favour of Idolatry, especially if they were once backed with a Law to defend the Protestant Religion.

This way of reasoning agreed not with M^r Seymour's sentiments, who thought it very unbecomeing the modesty of the House, to fall upon that which was the only thing the King had prohibited; he Saw no such danger of Popery as to have recours forthwith to so desperate a remedy, they were secure while the King lived; and the Duke's affection to the Nation, his love of justice and moderation, made it as litle to be

TOME apprehended should he survive him : He had not only shewn as great respect to Protestants as others, but as a marke of his moderation, let his Children themselves to be bred up in that Religion ; besides, he sayd, it would be so desperate an attempt to offer at changing the Religion so well established by the Laws, that it was highly improbable a Prince of his prudence and wisdom should endeavour a thing so impossible to be affected, that this Law, if made, would not be counted binding by all in England, by few in Ireland, and none in Scotland, which must needs occasion a fatal seperation and a Civil War in the end ; it were to act on the papists' principles to dis-
II.
 1680. enherit for Religion and by declaring that the ground of the quarrell, engage all Catholick forraing Princes against them, and by consequence require a standing Army for its support, which would not only endanger the Religion but the Libertys of the Kingdom much more than any Popish Successor or King could doe.

To this S^r William Jones replyd, That expedients in Politicks was like Mountebank's tricks in Phisick which oftener doe hurt than good, that a Government is too weighty a building to be supported by pillars that have either flaw or crack, and he fear'd no expedient would be free from them. He saw more reason to apprehend their Religion and Liberty should they not exclude the Duke than Civil War if they did, he gave it for granted a Popish King would have a Popish Council, Popish Judges, and Justices of Peace, Popish Commander at Sea and land, and Popish Bishoppes too ; and since none even now, have any employments given them, but who are for a Popish Successor, what an influence will a Popish King have ! and therefore inferr'd they must be very credulous and inconsiderate to trust their Religion and Liberty to the good will of a Prince who will be in subjection to the Pope and influenced by Priets and Jesuites ; he believ'd it would rather unite Scotland and Ireland more strictly than occasion separation ;

that the major part of Scotland, and the Protestants of Ireland hated Popery as much as they, and as for forraign Princes, he sayd, by that bill, England would become more formidable to their Enemies and usefull to their Allyes; and lastely for the conscientious part sayd the Duke was not excluded for his Religion but for his incapacity of governing according to the English Laws, which incapacity whether it proceed from Religion or any other cause was all one to them.

These answers thō shallow and superficial, especially in reference to the main objection of conscience arriseing from the Oath of Allegiance which binds to the Successor without exception as much as to the present possessor, as also on account of the Standing Law of the Land by which the Crown was always declared to be Monarchical and hereditary, and that all Subjects by the force of natural Allegiance were tyd to the observance of it; however, faction and number overpower'd, and the bill is brought in accordingly. After the first reading S^r Lyonel Jenkins stood up and sayd He thought it contrary to nature, and justice, they should condemn any one not only before conviction, but before the Partie is heard or witness examined in his defence, and to doe this by a new Law, while there are old ones in force to punish that crime, he conceived to be extreamly severe and against the right of every English man. 2^{dly} He sayd it was against the principles of the Church of England to dispossess any man of his right because he differs from it in faith, unless it were a doctrine universally receiv'd; that Dominion is founded in grace, for his part, he sayd, he thought there was more Popery in the Bill, than could possibly be in the Nation without it, for none but Papists and fitt Monarchy men did ever go about to desinherit men for their Religion, that the Kings of England have their right from God alone, and no power on earth can deprive them of it. So hoped that House would not go so manifestly against both the

T O M E

II.

1680.

Law of God and the Land too by changeing the Monarchy and making the Crowne elective, for by the same reason that this Parliament disinherits this Prince for Religion other Parliaments may doe the like upon other pretences, and by such exclusions elect whom they please ; in fine it was against the Oath of Alegiance, he sayd, which they had all taken in its litteral sence without Jesuitical evasion, whereby they were bound to the Duke as Presumptive Heire, and he knew no law could dispense them from it ; and thō he was cautious in disputing the power of Parliament, yet he was of opinion the Parliament could not disinherit the Heire of the Crowne and if Such an Act should pass it would be invalid in itself, and therefore thought it his duty to oppose it.

M^r John Hampden replyd to the first That there were precedents more than sufficient, of persons being condemned by bill without being heard, that the government would be too weake to subsist without such a power in the legislative authority of the Nation. To the 2nd he answer'd, It (was) manifest that the Papists aim was to introduce Superstition and Idolatry together with a forraign power, and that it was folly to think the using the only means for the preservation of their Religion was inconsistant with the principles thereof. To the 3rd he sayd That nothing but the like cause could have the like efect, and that since the Succession of the Crown had been often changed and yet continued hereditary, why must it be fear now ? And to the last he sayd This Bill was no such unreasonable expedient, for that if the Dauphin of France or Infanta of Spain, should become Protestant he doubted not but those Kingdoms would be more impatient than we for this remedy.

These replys fell mightly short of giving that satisfaction, which sincere and judicious persons looked after, they saw no such danger of Popery, as that this should be the onely means to prevent it, or if there were, they agreed not to that principle that it was lawfull to use any means whatsoever for the preservation of their Religion; for by that rule rebellion, murther, or any other crime would be justifyd, if but conceived necessary for that end, and so in efect abollish all Religion and morality, under pretence of supporteing it: and thō men of calmer spirites were ashamed of such horrid positions and doctrine, yet nothing could bring the majority of the House to their right witts in this matter, so long as the Phantom of Popery hover'd in their imagination, So the bill was order'd to be engross'd, and then M^r Vernon desired it might be read again; upon which S^r Lyonel Jenkins repeated what he had formerly Sayd, alledging there had never any direct answer been made to it, and added It was a very hard case that the Duke, who had so many excellent endowments which he had imployd in the Service of the Nation and had venter'd his life in fighting its battles, should be so used by those people he had merited so well of. M^r Hide spoke much to the same effect, and sayd The Duke had harder measure than the late King's murtherers, who had fair tryalls and liberty to speak for themselves: Upon which S^r William Hickman stood up for the Bill, but first enumerated all the objections, as that it was against natural justice to condemn a man unheard, and too severe a judgment for so small a crime; 2^{dly} that it was against the Oath of Allegiance and the Principles of the Protestant Religion, and by consequence would be a scandal upon the Church; 3^{ly} that it would be void in it self and that there would be a Loyal partie that would never obey it; 4^{ly} that it would make the Crowne elective and occasion a Civil Warr; and Lastly that the proviso in favour of the Duke's Children was not strong enough: As to the first, he answer'd it by beginning (begging) the question, and supposing that the safety of the King and Kingdom depended upon it, and therefore inferr'd, they were bound to preserve them

TOME

II.

1680.

by rules of justice and Religion before any man's right or intrest whatever; to the Second, he admired, he sayd at such an objection, for he never heard the Oath of Allegiance pleaded in favour of Popery, nor ever conceived that Oath extended to a Successor during the King's life, and by consequence no dispensation was needed, and that it was no discredit to the Church to secure it self against Popery by all lawfull means: This gave as little satisfaction to the Duke's friends as the rest, for the Oath to be sure would oblige, when the case happen'd whether it did now or no, or otherwise the Swearing to a Successor are words that have no signification, and by pretending it was no dishonour to the Church to seek its security by all Lawfull means, was supposeing the means Lawfull, which was the point in question again; to the Therd and Forth, he Sayd It was a Strange argument to doubt whether the Legislative power of the Nation could make Laws to bind its Subjects, and therefore it could not be supposed, that any person would not acquiess to it; that it would rather be a means to avoid a Civil War by encourageing the Protestant Partie to stick together in defence of their Religion when it was backed by a Law. This answer was as unsatisfactory as the rest, for their being a Law already which enjoins the taking of an Oath, which in itself is just and had been complyd with accordingly, what future Law made by men can absolve them from it? Nevertheless these answers pass'd current amongst the partie, and to make the fallacy of them less discernable, S^r Francis Winnington endeavours to cover them over with his usual flowers of eloquence, by telling them That these arguments against the Bill were only proper to lull them into a fatal negligence and security, as if it were needless or to no purpose to oppose Popery, that the great endeavours used thereby to reconcile the world to Popery made it more necessary to pass this Bill to obstruct it; the decay, he sayd, of the Monarchy in its grandure, honour and reputation, the destruction of the Navy in Sixty Six, the little appearance of being able to restore it to its former strength and splendour, the double dealing of the Ministers in foreign Alliances in order to keep up an interest with France was all owing to their machinations, that from being Umpire to this part of the world we were grown the most despicable Nation in Europe, that the Government was weakened no less by divisions and debaucherys, than fears and Jealousies, that we most narrowly escaped ruin when the City of London was burnt, when the Tolleration pass'd, when the Army was on Black Heath, and lastly when the Popish Plot was discover'd; so that nothing stood betwixt them and utter destruction but the King's life, all which dangers, says he, past and present, are owing to Popery, nor are there any hopes of their being less while there is a Popish Successor: So I wonder, says he, any one can offer such arguments against the Bill, since natural justice obliges us to it for our own defence and self preservation, that it would be of dangerous consequence to pretend the Oath of Allegiance binds to the next Heire in case he should think fit to raise rebellion, nor was it a scandal to the Church to take care it be not destroyed; and therefore all these arguments, says he, weigh nothing with me: the King indeed hath his right from God, and can do no wrong, but if we should give these qualifications to a Successor it would make strange confusion; a man, says he, cannot have a greater claim to any thing than to life, and yet upon forfeitures that is sometimes taken away for the publick good; the same may be said in reference to right too, when the Prime Legislative thinks it necessary for securing the Government, do's not the thirteenth of Queen Elizabeth make it treason to say that the Parliament cannot alter the Succession? And in Henry the eighth's time were there not many instances of it as well as in other reignes?

T O M E

II.

1680.

In fine the Duke's friends saw there was no possibility of driveing them from those groundless and unjust Suppositions, that all the ills that either had already happen'd or might possibly fall upon the Nation must be charged upon Popery, and that if the Duke succeed'd Popery must of necessity follow at his heels, nor to make them distinguish betwixt what was due to an Heir during his expectancy and what they swear to observe when the Crown descends upon him ; for thō the Successor is not to be ranked with the present possessor, yet by the oath they were obliged to defend his right which now they went about to annull, and if ever he fortun'd to succeed, then natural Allegiance and the Oath (thō formerly taken) would be binding to him then, as much as to the other now, and oppugne point blank the Law which now they labour'd so much to establish. It was true indeed (they owned) that life and Liberty might be taken away for the publick good, but that it was not lawfull to doe it without just cause and a fair tryall, and thō the Statute of Queen Elizabeth made it treason to say the Parliament cannot alter the Succession, yet that and such like precedents had been in soberer times looked upon as incroachments upon the Prerogative, and litle or no regard had to them, because the King held his Crown from God alone and therefore no power upon earth had authority to dispute it.

Their reply to the last objection was something more plausible, where it was urged that if the Duke had a Son hereafter, he would be excluded by the Bill ; but to that they answer'd, It would be as whe the King dys without issue, the next heir is proclaimed to prevent an interregnum, thō the Queen Mary possibly be with child, to whom the right in the first place do's belong. In fine all argument was to be resolved at last into Votes, and those being govern'd more by faction than reason, that Partie was sure of Victory, so the Bill pass'd accordingly.

However they would not so easily have carryd their point, hat they not used all mañer of artes to cleere the passage and leuel those rubbs they knew would obstruct it. Their craft and spite went hand in hand, and were of mutual assistance in perfecting their designs, they had shewn their utmost malice in contriveing and wording this Act, and did no less their cunning in preparing the way for it. They had not only purged the House of many well affected Members for haveing discouraged Petitions in their respective Countrys, but struck such a terroure into all the rest by their houghty Votes, threats of being brought into the Plot and by sham informations, that many who desired to serve the King and wished well to the Duke durst not open their mouths in opposition to it. The Duke's haveing been so lately sent away in such manner, made many fall off too, they saw they must expect no quarter from the House if they concur'd not with it, and they despair'd of being supported by the King if they were prosecuted by the Parliament; for who (thought they) could expect protection being the Duke found it not? This therefore made most men think of nothing but how to cover their own heads, and be passive at least in all those critical debates.

As soon as the Duke hear what had pass'd, he fail'd not " to remind his Majesty of the ill consequence both in respect " of himself, and his Successors, if he suffer'd the hereditary " Monarchy to be made Elective, as also to permit honest men " to be torn from him or terrifyd from their duty by the im- " perious treatment, pretended Plots, and malicious contrivances " of his greatest Enemys, that new Villains appear'd every day " who accused not only his friends in England, but in Ireland " too, as the Duke of Ormonde, Lord Chancellor, and others; " that if he gave way to this contrivance, it would run like " wild fire, that besides the injustice of letting innocent men "

T O M E

II.

1680.

The Duke's Sence thereupon.
KING JAM. Mth
Tom: 9. p. 71.

Ibid. p. 87.

TOME
II.

1680.
KING JAM. Mth
TOM. 9. p. 90.

“ suffer, he would soon be destitute of all support if he sacrificed good men to appease the fury of the ill. He again reminded him of the late King his Father’s mistake in the like condescensions, and that since sooner or later he must make head against them, he better doe it while he had ground left to stand upon and friends to depend on, then when all was lost; that Scotland and Ireland were both firme to his intrest, and that there were many thousands yet in England who had not bow’d their knees to Baal, and by consequence, that there were still enough to stand by him, if he would stand by himself: He sayd not this (he assured him) that he doubted his Majesty’s kindness and steadfastness in his resolution and promis in reference to himself, never to consent to any act that should exclude him, but only to press him not to loose any time, seeing his Enemys lost none, and to put some stop to these endless accusations of his best friends, who could alone secure his eas and happiness, and not depend upon finding it in a forced compliance with the disorderly pretentions of his Parliament, remembring in what manner they made good to the late King his Father that so oft repeated protestation, That they would make him the most glorious King in Christendom.

KING JAM. Mth
TOM. 9. p. 93.

The King sends to the House, that he will never pass the Bill.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 400.

These remembrances were not lost upon the King, they quicken’d his apprehensions and sollicitude and made him in a message to the Commons repeat what he had sayd in his speech concerning the Succession, which he tould them again he was resolved never to alter; this was not done So much out of hopes to stop it, as to destroy a report (that) had been industriously spread abroad that the King in the bottom was consenting to the Bill.

It was on occasion of the King’s proposing this message in Council, that My Lord Halifax first manifested his zeal against the Bill to his utter separation from the other partie ; and that My Lord Sunderland and M^r Godolphin did as treacherously desert the Duke's interest, and underhand countenance it as much as they durst ; and therefore when the King declared his resolution in Council likewise, to endeavour its being thrown out at the first reading in the House of Lords, those two and My Lord Essex opposed it, pretending that though it was not reasonable the Bill should pass as it was, yet in the Commitee it might perhaps be modifyd with limitations, and turn'd to a temporary banishment or the like, and so much they thought necessary to prevent an utter breach betwixt the King and the Parliament ; whereas they well foresaw that if once it were but lodged there, by addresses from the Lower House, petitions from the City, publick clamours, and all manners of threats, the Commons would be sure of Victory at last : but the King was aware of their cunning and malicious contrivance, and resolved to let it linger as litle as possible when once it came to the Lords, and therefore he wen about himself to sollicite against it, and tould amongst every Lord he met with, That nothing could be more for his service and the public quiet than to throw out the Bill at the very first reading.

It is not to be wonder'd it had soe quick a passage through the Lower House where the Current runn with such violence, nevertheless after it was ready it lay dormant there 4 or 5 days because they thought the Lords were not sufficiently prepared for it; during which time the factious Members endeavour'd to terrify them and the King himself, with Addresses from the Common Council, and the House of Commons's answer to his Majesty's message, but most particularly with continual allarmes sent up to the Lords of new discoverys, and terrible treasons, all which reflected on the Duke and his friends ; and just before the Bill was brought up, in comes two Lords and acquaints the rest, There was a man at the door had the most desperate treason to delay sending up the Bill, till the Lords were prepared for it.

The Commons

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 437.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 454.

T O M E

II.

1680.
Dangerfeild accuses the Duke before the Lords.

revail that ever was heard within those walls; who being order'd to come in proved to be M^r Dangerfeild, a face they were not unacquainted with, nevertheless he impudently accused the Duke, that he had proposed to him to kill the King, and to the end this accusation might stricke more terrour into the Duke's friends, he sayd My Lord Peterborough was present and that My Lord Privie Seal was acquainted with it.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 387.

They had made use of the same stratagem in the House of Commons when the Bill was first brought in there too, where Dugdale arraign'd the Duke most dreadfully, and one Francisco Peris sayd he had been hired to kill My Lord Shaftsbury, Oates &c: Dangerfeild also gave in then the same information against the Duke he now repeated, but that House needed not such provocatives to swallow the Bill, they did it but too greedely of themselves, wherefore his evidence was seal'd up for a more pressing occasion, and now made use of for a vehicle to the House of Lords, whose stomacks were found to be much more squemish upon the point.

They thought to lesten the Votes for the Duke, by accusing his friends.

Their main designe in this, was by accusing the Duke's friends to cause their being order'd at least to withdraw while the Bill was debateing, and by that means deprive him of so many Votes, and to stricke terrour into others, which effect he (it) had upon My Lord Privy Seal, who being otherwise well affected to the Duke, however gave his voice for the Bill; but My Lord Peterborough sayd so much in his vindication (particularly that this very man had accus'd him formerly before the King and Council of an other fact, and then sayd he had no more against him) that the Lords thought it not proper so much as to commit him; whereas had this stratagem succeeded, others would have been accused, no matter of what, so it had but suspended their sitting till the worke had been done.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 440.

The Bill is carry'd up to the Lords.
Ibid. 402.

This debate being rather suspended than finished, the Bill of Exclusion (which had been presented by My Lord Russel just after Dangerfeild had given in his evidence) came upon the stage, that Lord it seems had gotten it into his hands, and though many of the Commons opposed his going up with it then, as not thinking the House of Lords sufficiently prepared, however his impetuous temper and exceeding ardour on this occasion hurryd him on with such violence, that he run away with it in spight of all opposition; so when they could not withould him, a great number of Members accompanyd him and it, and as soon as it was deliver'd, gave a mighty shout, which tumultous and barberous way of proceeding, had too great a ressemblance of forty one, not to convince all judicious persons, that this would prove a prelude of the Same Tragedie if not timely prevented: Of which the King himself became so sencible, that it was none of the least motives to his firmness in the matter, not only to break their force at the first attack, but because he saw the more aversion they shew'd to the Duke, the less reason they had to attempt any thing against his own person, so long as the Duke was to succeed him; by which means his Royal Highness whom the Parliament would have made pass for the man in the world that gave most encouragement to Plots against the King's life, the King on the other hand, look'd upon him, as his principal Bulwark and security against any desperate attempt of that nature, which soon after appear'd to be no vain apprehension.

And now it was come up to the House of Lords, before they enter'd upon it, great artifice was used by the malignant partie to prolong the debate about My Lord Peterborough, that the Bill might be put off till next morning, and in the mean time by terrours and perswasions they hoped to draw many persons to their side; but the Duke's friends apprehended nothing so much as delay, so press'd vehementely, and at last prevail'd to have its fate tryd off hand. Assoon as the Bill was once read, the House turn'd into a Committee which lasted till nine at

T O M E
II.

1680.

It is cast up by the Lords.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 442.

T O M E
II.

1680.

night: it is not possible to represent with what fierceness and malice the one side press'd it, and with what eloquence and learning the other opposed it, it was on this occasion that My Lord Halifax distinguished himself no less for his great capacity and ready wit, than his zeal and Loyalty; he answer'd most fully and off hand all that Shaftsbury and Essex had studyd and concerted together, and spoke no less than fifteen or sixteen times for his share; the rest of the Duke's friends were not wanting to their duty neither, so that after the most solemn debate that ever had been heard in that noble assembly, the question was put Whether the Bill should be rejected or no? and it pass'd in the affirmative by a majority of thirty three voices.

This signal Victory gave great life and vigour to his Royal Highness's cause, it layd open many darke purposes and made colours more distinguishable than hithertoo they had been; it shew'd some people's Loyalty who had been till then suspected, and made a plain discovery of those ill designs which others had long smother'd under pretence of friendshipps, amongst which My Lord Sunderland manifested the corruption of his heart which he had hitherto plastered over with fawning pretentions of duty and affection, but no one was more displeas'd and surprised than the King at this Lord's voteing for the Bill, and sayd he would soon tell him his mind upon it.

They propose the King being divorced.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 443.

But though the wether clear'd up little there were still heavy clouds flying about; for no sooner was the Bill rejected, but the Lords go upon means for securing Religion, and such was their apprehension on that head, that those methods which were counted moderate would in a manner have wrought the Duke's ruin as effectually, as those they had rejected: and My Lord Halifax who had so signalized himself against the Bill of Exclusion, immediatly proposed one of banishment, and that for life too; but in this conjuncture the malice of his Royal Highness' enemys was more beneficial to him, than the mistaken good will of his friends, for the factious partie by good fortune being no ways satisfyd with what would have been as fatal to the Duke, and which probably might have pass'd, as men were then hayr'd and frighted out of their senses; but by aimeing at something still more extravagant, threw them upon methods which the King would never agree too, which in the end proved the Duke's chiefe preservative: for My Lord Shaftsbury laughing at this proposal as a thing that could never hould (and perhaps that was My Lord Halifax his thought too) said being the Bill was rejected, there remain'd no other means, but to have the Queen divorced and the King to marry a Protestant Wife; which extravagance, though seconded by many, the King shew'd so much horroure of, that he went himself from man to man as he had done the day before in reference to the Duke, that he might if possible stifle this wicked project in its birth too.

The news of the Bill's being rejected struck the Commons like thunder, and as men in that condition, they remain'd for some time without motion; till at last S^r John Hotham proposed their adjourning to the next day, which was agreed too as necessary after such a Blow to recolect their spirites and recover their strength, and to come to some resolution what was now to be done: This method was something particular, for what place could be so proper to regulate matters as where they then sat? but they made no scrupule of publishing by this means to the world, that House itself was not be trusted with their projects till they had been concerted and model'd in private Caballs, and then brought thither to be pass'd only for method and order sake, by which means they devolved the government not only from the King to the Parliament, but from the Parliament it self to the Sunn Taverne and King's head Clubbs.

T O M E
II.

1680.

The Commons
areastonished at the news of the Bill's being cast out.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 423.

TOME

II.

1680.
The Commons refuse Succors for Tangier.
LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 469.
Ibid. p. 470.

The next day which was the 17th of November had being appointed by order of the House to consider his Majesty's Speech in reference to Tangier; that place of late had been extreamly press'd by the Moors, they had taken several out workes though after a most vigorous resistance particularly at Charles's fort where Cap: Jones made a long defence, and when it was quite undermined he with his small garrison cut their way thorough the besiegers to the Town, from whence by a generall Sally in October following they had repuls'd the Enemy, killing above 500 of them, took two cannons, five colors, and several prisoners, and fill'd up their trenches, but was now so weaken'd with continual attacks that without Supplis of all sortes, it would be impossible to hould it out any longer.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 470.

This was fully represented, but made litle impression upon them, they could think, nor talke, of nothing but Popery, which they pretended hung so dreadfully over their heads; it obsessed them like a specter, and wherever they turn'd their eys they fancy'd it stared them in the face; so that, though one would have thought Tangier had little relation to Religion or the Duke's Succession, however they wrest all to that, and presently cry out, It was a nursery not only for Popish Soldiers, but for Priests and Religious too of that perswasion, and that there had been sometimes a Popish Governor of the place, so that to succour it was but to augment, they Sayd, their present evils; and declar'd in fine against giveing mony either on that, or any other account till they knew what they were to have for it, and till there was a thorough change from one end of the State to the other; mony, they sayd, was like food to the Stomack which if in health turns to nurrishment, but if out of order breeds more ill humours: in fine such was their fury against the Duke, and rage for this disapointment, that no bitter or extravagant thing was left unsayd. My Lord Russell amongst the rest, declared That if his own Father had been against the Bill he would have voted him an Enemy to the King and Kingdom; and that if he could not live a Protestant he was resolved to dye one at least. M^r Lenson Gower sayd Some men perhaps will endeavour to make their peace with the Duke, but I will perish first; wherefore my opinion is we should breake up, and each man return to his Country and let the People see how we are used, and I doubt not but they will soon join with us, their swords in their hands, and hen we'l let the Duke know we defy him, and all his Popish adherents.

TOME
II.

1680.

These unmannerly threats the Duke knew how to dispise, but the King could not so easily recompose himself and his affaires, when instead of Supplys he got nothing but representation, and addresses (which they plyd him with at this time) and instead of succours for Tangier was threaten'd with a Rebellion.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 472.

There had indeed one argument been made use of against the Bill of Exclusion by My Lord Halifax, which gave a handle to these factious men, to highten the aprehensions of danger, and served them particularly for a pretence against the relieving Tangier; it had been urged by that Lord, how imprudent it would be to declare the Duke an enemy to the State, who was actually at the head of a powerfull Nation, where there was an Army too; that in Ireland his power was no less considerable where there was 10, or 15 Papists for one Protestant, that he had great interest in the Fleet and credit with the English Troops, all which M^r Hampden repeating sayd, And if we ad to that, his being Admiral of Tangier too, surely thereis good reason to supply that place? The Court Partie thought to have moderated this heat by assuring them the King would concur in any other methods for secureing Religion, but they replyd all other methods would be of no force when once a Popish Prince was in possession of the Throne, because the King's example had always influenced the Nation to a compli-yance.

Ibid. p. 469.

Ibid. p. 512.

T O M E When Henry the 8th says Mr Titus, was for the Supremacy, the II. Kingdom was for it, when he was against it, the Kingdom was 1680. so too. When King Edward the 6th was a Protestant, the Kingdom was Protestant. When Queen Mary came to the Crowne, it was Papist again: And when Queen Elizabeth succeeded her, her Religion succeeded too, and so gave it for granted should a Papist Prince come to the Crown, Popery would come along with him: This carryd some apearance of reason which served to raise people's apprehensions, who consider'd not the different circomstances of those times, and the temper and power of Princes in those days; the Protestant Religion was then new, and though the liberty it encouraged made many embrace it, yet in Queen Mary's time the memory of what they had been was not So entirely forgot, but that by the example and authority of the Prince they were easily brought back again; whereas now after a long settlement of a Religion which had layd aside all those hard points of Doctrine, either as to faith or practice, which the Church of Rome obliges too, it was not reasonable to presume the people would be so susceptible of a change, and return to a Religion which besides its opposition to their liberty, they were so prejudiced against by Education, as to look upon it with detest-ation and horreur.

They fall upon the Duke's friends.

LETTERS
 VOL. I. p. 474.

In this confusion of speeches and reasoning, thō they could not come to a resolution how to renew their assaults against the Duke, however to shew they would have no peace with him, they fall upon those who had lately espous'd his intrest or had not at least so heartely concurr'd with them as they expected;
 upon this score they impeach S^r Edward Seymour for mis-applying 600000^l given for building 30 shippes, and vote an adress to the King for removeing My Lord Halifax from his presence and Council, their pretence was for haveing advised the late dissolution, and thō Sunderland and Godolphin had

LETTERS
 VOL. I. p. 404.

an equal share with him there in, their late behaviour had washed them clean, so no notice was had of them in their address. The Lord Chief Justice Scroggs too, thō formerly so usefull a servant in the prosecution of the Plot, is now fallen under their displeasure, because he had discharged the Grand Jury in June before, some 4 or 5 days sooner than usual, whercby he prevented an intended presentment against the Duke which otherwise would have been ready before the end of the terme; so they voted him an obstruc̄ter of publick justice, a violator of his oath, and of the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom; in fine whatever had an apearance of a fault, if it was done in favour of the Duke it was mortall in their eyes: But S' Edward Seymour with his dexterity and eloquence warded the blow aim'd at him, and My Lord Halifax though he offerr'd to withdraw, the King would not suffer it, but his Majesty was forced to yield up Scroggs so far at least to their malice, as to discharge him from his imployment, but recompenced it afterwards with a pention.

They bring new accusations against the Duke concerning the Plot.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 500.

By this time they had rowl'd many different projects in their heads but found none so effectual as their beloved Bill of Exclusion, so they labour'd mightely to procure a short prorogation, and then to bring it in a new; but the King was too well satisfyd with haveing thus broaken their measures to put them in a way of peiceing them again; however to keep up their odium against the Duke till they were ready for a new attack, great encouragement was given for witnesses to come in against him, whereupon one Lewis deposed, That Mis Celier had engaged him to burn the Shippes at Chattam, that the French were then to land, that he was to have been join'd with Gowe in endeavouring to kill the King, and that for all this and several other services of the like nature he was assured, the Duke would both stand by him and be his paymaster; one Zeile apear'd also who concurr'd in this evidence, upon which

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 472.

T O M E
II.

1680.

They dispute about wording the pardon for the witnesses.
LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 474.

the Attorney General indicted M^r Celier of high treason : Thus they layd about them on all hands, hoping by some of these random Strokes to reach his Royal Highness' head at last.

It was the practice of the House of Commons upon the first appearance of any witness, to address the King for a pardon and maintenance for him ; which being done for these two, the King told them by M^r. Secretary Jenkins, that he would grant them pardons for all crimes, perjury excepted ; but the House was not satisfyd with this, and their reason was pretty odd ; the witnesses, they sayd, were sworne allways to Say the whole truth, whereas it might not be proper for them at certain times to tell all they knew, and by that means might be lyable to be perjured, so they persisted in their Sollicitation that the Pardons might be for perjury too, but this Scurvy reason was not likely to make his Majesty change his resolution, thō the Attorney General who was to draw them was forced to stretch his authority in another point, to give the House Some satisfaction in this matter.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 493.

It seems he had been complain'd of for not drawing Dangerfeild's pardon full enough, and feareing he might incur the same fault again, came to Lewis and asked him, Whether he was guilty of any other crimes, than what was mentioned in the King's warrant, which was for treasons, misprisions, felonys, outlarys &c. To which he conscientiously answer'd, good man, that he was guilty of forgery too, which it Seems was not express'd there, So care was taken to have it inserted and then all was right ; for it matter'd not how wicked they were, or had been, provided they were but made legal witnesses, and that their past Vilany's might not hinder them from committing more.

The Commons present an Address.

By this time the Commons were ready with an Address they had been long meditateing, and on the 29th of November present it accordingly ; which, to fill the people with terroure, and support the credit of the Plot, contain'd a narrative of the whole fiction, which they represented as a cloud that still hung over their heads and threaten the Land with a storme of ruine and confusion ; the Papists are there Sayd (as was usual) to be the chiefe influencers of all Councells in reference to the State and Government, that all imployments Civil and Military in Court or Country were disposed of at their discretion, that they either corrupted all who had any hand in the Administration of affairs, or destroyd whom they could not corrupt, that they had credit enough to make Parliaments be prorogued at pleasure, and to aply the mony given by it to what uses they thought fit, that their credit and interest was such, as to be able to attempt any change in the Religion, or Government ; in fine that there was no design they were not able to execute, nor any wickedness they were not ready to performe, So that no security could possibly be hoped for, but by preventing the Succession of the Duke to the Crown ; and they further prayd that none but persons of known fidelity, and true Protestants might be put into imployments, and then his Majesty might expect supplys for Tangier, and other occasions, when they can be assured, their aids shall not be imployd to strenghten their Popish adversaries, and encreas their present dangers.

In future times it will not be credited that so numerous an assembly of persons chozen for their wisdom and abilitys to compose the representative of the People of England, could either have believed such follys, or have the confidence to impose upon the world that they did, as to think that a handfull of men, not makeing by computation the hundreth part of the Nation, under the oppression of severe Laws, kept out of all imployments, and at this time persecuted, imprisoned, and even many put to death, should be able to strike such terrour into the whole Kingdom, that all attention of affairs both forreign and domestick must ceas and ly unregarded, till some means

T O M E
II.

1680.
LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 517.

The Duke's friends terrifyd with the violent proceedings against him.

T O M E be found to secure them from this pretended mountain's falling II. upon their heads.

1680.

LETTERS
 VOL:1. p.433.

But all this Cant was througly understood, the Duke alone was the person they fear'd, and for him alone was this Storme raised, all their severitys to others were but so many platformes to rais their batteries against him, which now again struck such terrour into his Highness' greatest friends, that they trembled with aprehesion what the consequence might be, and seeing no other resource, recur to their old sollicitations in reference to Religion, which upon this occasion they press'd him with, more violently then ever ; but to introduce it gently, began with adviseing him to moderation upon the throwing out of the Bill, that his enemys being numerous it would be dangerous to add dispair to their malice, that it had been a common artifice in that partie, to make those who had voted against him believe, that haveing now drawne their swords they must cast their scabords away, that he was an implacable man and would give no quarter, they assured him many were brought in by a real terrour of Popery, and the dradfull rumours that the Religion and Government were on the brink of ruin ; that such men might be brought back with clemency and moderation, and by convincing the world in spight of their malice, that his Royal Highness could forgive, and that the Religion and Government had nothing to fear from him.

All this the Duke heartely concurr'd in, and never Prince gave greater testimonys of moderation in Success, or of magnanimity in suffering ; but when his friends renew'd their assault in point of Religion it was grievous to him beyond expression, yet in that too his temper failed him not, he knew how to distinguish the motiue from their advice, and their good will from their arguments.

The Duke's
 friends renew their

They represented to him therefore the weak condition the Government was in, the confusion, terrour and apreheensions people were come too by this pretended Plot, and which had life (they said) only from his Highnesse's Religion, that the King being straighten'd for mony and the Parliament refractory, he would be in strange agonies how to supply his necessities, and preserve his prerogative, and most especially his Highness's pretentions, the Duke of Monmouth having gain'd many about the King; that the factious partie would certainly break upon his Highness's friends, who yet indeed supported the King in his vigorous Councells, but by impeachments or accusations would soon be removed both from Court and Councills, and then there would be no hopes to prevent all from going to ruin, unless the Duke were present to assist his Majesty with his advice, strengthen his resolutions, and support his own creatures; that it would be impossible for his friends to helpe him long, if he did not helpe himself: So that as his Highness's Religion was the ground of all the fears and apprehensions the Nation was in, and origin of all the present troubles, so it kept him at a distance from his Majesty, who in the end would infallibly give way to the torrent, for want of his support and assistance; they tould him it was impossible the Popish Religion could ever take footing again in England, that if it did, it must be cemented in blood, and therefore thō they know him to be too generous to be moved to change through fear, or his owne misfortune, they begg'd of him however, that the King's safety at least, the wellfare of the three Kingdoms, might have a share in his considerations; they threaten'd him with dangers from abroad if the French should invade Flanders, in how ill condition the King would be to contest matters with the Parliament; that all measures of parsimony and frugality would soon be broke, for want of his presence to support the King in those resolutions, whereby his Majesty would infallebly be delivered up into the power and disposition of the House of Commons, who would only relieve 1680. solicitations about Religion.

TOME
II.

LETTERS
Vol. I: p. 405.

LETTERS
Vol. I. p. 418.

Ibid: pag. 637.

T O M E

II.

1680.

his necessities ; that thō the Bill was cast out, yet the revival of it was vehemently contended for by all sortes of people, and his Highness loaded with all the ills that have either hitherto happen'd, or can possibly befall the Nation, that one way or other his ruin was inevitable, which would not only affect himself, but his Children too, for that the same power and interest which prevail'd to determin who should not reigne, will soon say who shall, and they would never think themselves secure under the Government of those, whose Father they have excluded. They tould him it was resolved to have all his friends removed from Court, and his revenue seized, so that he would be reduced to the faint assistance of some forreign Prince : in fine that the King had done and sufferr'd so much he would at last be forced to new resolutions. 'This, his greatest friends assured him was the true State of his case, and that their was no remedy under the Sun but to embrace the Protestant Religion, from which he had unhappily departed, that his Highness was not a private person, nor by consequence tyd up to the strickt rules that obliges others ; that the publick clamed share in his resolution, and that if ever it were Lawfull to depart from an opinion, thō never so good, this was the time, not only for his own sake but his Majestys who lay under such intollerable pressures, for the people's sakes, for the preventing the efusion of so much blood, which his perseverance in the Religion he was in, would be the inevitable cause of, for the sake of his Children that they may not be deprived of their right, and for his Dear Dutchesse's sake, whose qualifications as well as her right had destined to a Throne, and lastely for the sake of Monarchy and the three Kingdoms which could not be preserved from utter ruin by any other means upon earth.

It was not possible to say more to shake his constancy ; and yet to give a greater force to their argument, they used the same litle artes to draw the Duke from his Religion, which his enemys used to draw the King from supporting him, for as they (to terrify his Majesty the more) were accustomed to tell him seperately each one the same thing, as if they had concerted it together, so the Duke's friends to make the greatest impression, represent all these dangers each as from himself, assuring him that as his return to the Protestant Religion would make all those troubles and persecutions drope like an autumnal leaf, so without it, he must infallebly expect all the calamitys they had painted out in such dreadfull colours, must fall upon him, the King, and the people.

Nothing could be more dismal to his Royal Highness than such representations not only of his own dangers, but the King's uneasiness and hard circomstances, the suffrings of the Catholicks, and confusion the Nation was in; and that all this should be charged to his account, not only by his enemys but his friends too, that if this was the fruite of his late Success and Victory over the Bill, what must be expect when thing went cross: however all they could Say, and more if it had been possible, was not capable of casting the least mist before his eys, or staggering him in any kind, either in reference to his faith, or former resolutions.

He tooke the pains to write a long letter from Edinbourg in answer to this arguments and solicitations. He was in hopes, " he sayd, never to have been press'd again to that, which he " was sure he never gave the least reason to believe he should " be brought too, that by the Grace of God he hoped to live " and dye a true Sonn of the Catholick Church, and to suffer " with Christian patience whatever might be fall him on that " account, that it would be too long for a letter to lay before " them the reasons and motives of his Conversion, so would " content himself with representing the manner only, and to " let them see it was not done hastily nor was it the efect of a "

T O M E
II.

1680.

The Duke replies to his friends about Religion.

KING JAM. Mth
Tom. 8. pag. 195.

T O M E

II.

1680.

“ Childish imagination, or the fruite of perswasion when he “ lived in Catholick Countryes, never any one (as he had tould “ them before) speaking to him of that, during his banishment,
 “ but a Nunn, and that in efect was only to desire him to begg “ of Almighty God to direct him, but that on the contrary he “ (had been) thoroughly instructed in the tenets of the Church “ of England by D^r. Stuard, and so zealous therein, as to be “ fully as instrumental as any one to have the Duke of Glocester “ brought away from the Queen his Mother, for fear of his “ being influenced by her in that point; that the first origin of “ his doubts proceed’d from a treaty which a learned Bishopp
 “ of the Church of England had writ, and desired him to read “ while he was in Flanders; the drift of which was to clear
 “ the Church of England from the guilt of Schisme by sepa“ rating from the Church of Rome, which being the first “ writeing he had ever read of that kind, instead of confirmeing “ him in that believe had quite the contrary efect, especially “ after he had seen the answer to it, which that Bishopp likewise “ recommended to him: this made him more inquisitive after “ the grounds and manner of the Reformation, so he read
 “ all the Historyes he could relateing to that Subject, and thō “ at that time he confess’d he lived not so regularly as he ought, “ yet had some good intervals which he employd that way;
 “ that after his return to England, D^r. Heylin’s History of the “ Reformation and the preface of Hooker’s Ecclesiastical Policy “ thoroughly convinced him that neither the Church of England, “ nor Calvin, or any of the Reformers, had power to do what “ they did, and he was confident, he sayd, that whosoever reads “ those two books with attention, and without prejudice, would “ be of the same opinion: nevertheless he rested not satisfyd
 “ there, but made all imaginable enquiry into that matter, “ not only by reading but by discours with several learned “ Bishoppes, not forgetting the danger and persecution it would inevitably draw upon him, when once it should be known ; " T O M E but that being fully convinced he could resist no longer, so " II.

 in the year 1672, before he went to Sea, he withdrew from " the Communion of the Church of England, yet for some " 1680.

 time continued to wait upon the King to Cheppel ; that even " then such was the apprehension of his best friends before the "
 thing was known publickly, that the Duke of Ormonde, " Secretary Coventry, and several others, perswaded him to " withdraw before the meeting of the Parliament, as not thinking " it possible for him to stand the shock and fury of that Assem- " bly ; by which it apear'd he was sufficiently forwarded of the " danger before he exposed himself to it, but thanked God it " had no efect upon him, so as to draw him from his duty, on " the contrary that he layd down all his Commissions rather " than take the Test, and prepared himself for the storme which " he saw comeing upon him, and had felt sufficiently ever " since : so it could not be denyd (he hoped), but that his " Conversion was sincere and puerely for the sake of Truth, " since he had all the temporal discouragements immaginable, " which by the grace of God he was resolved to suffer with " patience, let the malice and machinations of his enemys run " to what excess it would.

Haveing given this short account of his Conversion, he His answer to thought it necessary to answer the other motives they press'd their reasons him with, as the great advantage it would be to the King's of State.
 affairs should he return to the Protestant Church ; his " KING JAM: Mth Majestys eas (he sayd) and well fare was ever more dear to " Tom. 8. p. 205.
 him than his own, and in an other case would have been a " more powerfull argument than self preservation ; but besides, " that no heartly consideration could ballance that of " Eternity, he did not perceive (he sayd) as the Case now " stood, that changing his Religion would have any such efect " as they proposed ; all the world, says he, sees that it is not "

T O M E “ Religion they drive at so much as the destruction of

II. “ Monarchy, and if this handle were taken away an other would 1680.

“ soon be found ; besides, if he should conforme they would say
 “ it was by vertue of dispensation, and so immagin him a more “ dangerous enemie, for by entring into all his imployments, “ they would fancy his power greater and his will the same to “ do mischief: that by the helpe of negligent Protestants, and “ Papists in Masquerade, nothing would be impossible for him “ to bring about, and from thence would ground a pretence “ of haveing more concessions for their security, and ty up his “ Majesty’s hands straighter than ever now they aim’d at, and “ whoever opposed them would immediately be branded as “ one of that number, which by consequence would forward “ rather than retard their design of bringing the Nation to a “ Common wealth; that the King therefore would reap no “ advantage by it, as he did no disadvantage by his being a “ Catholick, it hinder’d not those who were truly Loyall from “ continuing so, and those who were for changing the Govern“ ment, no change but that would content them. He owned,
 “ that his absence from the King might make things go wors,
 “ but saw no reason why he should be kept from him, haveing “ done nothing to deserve such a punishment ; that it argued a “ great weakness in the Government not to be able to protect “ the Inocent, and that such a procedure was a great dishearte“ ning to Loyall men, as well as a great concurrance to the “ aims of trecherous ones *, who haveing begun with him “ would end with the King, to court a popular intrest, and to “ have the reputation of being heads of the Protestant Religion, “ thō they have none at all ; he thought it hard he should be “ sacrificed to make those men’s fortunes, who had done him “ all the mischief they could in this world, and were angry he “ would not abandon the hopes of being happy in the ne xt too,
 “ to be capable of returneing to Court only to be their Slave

* SUNDERLAND and GODOLPHIN.

to forward their designes, and establish their greatness; he " should be as ready, (he sayd) as ever to venter his life for " his King and Country's Service, but could not make his " Majesty the same compliment which Dr. Oates did, that he " had venter'd his life for him at Sea, and his soul for him at " Land: He desired them therefore to be carefull especially in " discours with the King, not to agrave this point by laying all " the present disorders to the Duke's Religion, for that it " would be a means to ruin him entirely with his Majesty, it " was enough that his enemys made use of this argument for " his destruction, he hoped his friends would not do it too; " it was not, he sayd, so much from his Religion that those " mischiefs sprung, as from mutability in Councells and want " of steddy resolutions; for that notwithstanding the great " terrour some Statesmen were lately in, affermeing there would " certainly be a rebellion if the Duke returned from Flanders, " yet how was he receiv'd both times? and in his journey to " Scotland treated with all immaginable respect? that at his " last return to England things were more quiet than ever, and " if the same Councells had been pursued might have continued " so still, for at that time almost all the Countrys shew'd their " detestation of the late rebellious proceedings, and rejected " the petitions both in City and Country for the Parliament's " sitting, thō the Lord Major Clayton was deficient in his duty " in that point; so that it was not his presence at Court that " rais'd this storme, but his being sent away that heartened " the King's enemys when they found him quit ground, whose " spirites were broken and dejected with his presence; and " therefore thought it highly unreasonable that he must bear " the burthen which ought to be layd upon other men's " shoulders; but his condition, he sayd, put him in mind of " the publick odium Cardinal Mazarin lay under when he lived " in France, what ever went amis was layd at his door, if a "

T O M E

II.

1680.

TOME " hors did but stumble they would cry out, LE DIABLE DE
II. " MAZARIN; in fine he begg'd of them to press him no more 1680. " with those arguments which he had clearly proved were not
 " the real causes of the present evils, nor to teaz him to do
 " what his conscience would never allow of, desireing them
 " rather to use their skill and Rethorick in his defence, than
 " to possess his Majesty with an opinion that all would do well
 " if he were a Protestant, or make the King believe it is the " Duke's stubbornness that brings all those troubles upon him,
 " which in reality were owing to the irresolution and " unsteadyness of those Councells he ever endeavour'd to fix
 " with all his credit, when he was in a station to do it; and " that thō he be the only person that feels the smart of that ill
 " conduct at present, his Majesty in the end would find " himself too affected by them, and be convinced that those " methods ever have and ever will be pernicious to his " interest.

The Duke is presented again for recusancy,
 the Bill of Limitation and Articles of treason framed against him.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 531.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 553.

Though his Royal Highness thus sollidly and judiciously defended himself against the arguments of his friends, it hinder'd him not from lying as much open as ever to the assault of his enemys who were as insatiable in their malice as indefatigable in the pursuite of it; The Chief Justice Scroggs had eluded one process where his Royal Highness was presented for being a Papist (for which that Judge had been call'd to an account by the House of Commons) so to repair that, the Grand Jury of Westminster was directed to present him again, which thō it could have no immediate effect, was a preparatory to an Impeachment, and in the mean time the Bill of Limitation was brought into the House of Lords, into which certain clauses wer put no (less) prejudicialle to him, than what had lately been rejected; as that in case of the Duke's accession to the Crown, the whole power of Government should be vested in a Council of 41, that all forreign treatys and negotiations should be transacted by Commissioners taken out of the said Council, that Ireland should be governed by it also, and that it should have power to fill up all vacancys, or remove any out of their employments, subject nevertheless to the disallowance or approbation of the Parliament, which when sitting, was to exercise all this authority which was granted to others only during the intervalls of their Sessions; that the Duke of Yorke was to be banished during the King's life, to some place five hundred miles from England, to forfeit his revenue if he came nearer, and his life if he return'd into any of his Ma^{ty} Dominions, and that whosoever receiv'd him either in England or Ireland should be guilty of High treason likewise; and least this should not do the work, they framed 34 articles of High treason against him, where in, all the mischiefs that either actually had, or possibly could fall upon the Kingdom were charged (as they modestly termed it) upon his hellish practices: When the Duke heard of this he acquainted his Majesty, he thought this Limitation project wors, if possible, than the Bill of Exclusion, "and would give a greater shock to the Monarchy by vesting "the power in the Parliament and to drop the Government "more gently into a Commonwealth, that Algernon Sidney "and his partie had express'd as much; and that My Lord "Shaftsbury's seeming to be dissatisfyd with it, as insufficient, "as but a wheedle to draw it on the faster, so forwarned his "Majesty never to listen to it; but it seems the Parliament "it self was not at leasure to drive on these projects to a head at "present, but was forced to let them ly like so much seed in the "ground (in hopes of a fruitfull product afterwards) till they had dispatch'd My Lord Stafford's tryall (which was now apointed) and in which his Royal Highness was not totally forgotten neither.

T O M E
II.

1680.

Ibid. pag. 543.

KING JA. Mth
TOM. 9. p. 100.

That Lord was chosen out of the five then in the Tower, as one whose age and infirmitys would render they thought least

The Lord
Stafford tryd and condemn'd.

T O M E
II.

1680.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 536.

capable of a vigorous defence, which they knew their evidence would not bear. However during the whole time of his tryal (which began on the * 20th of November) he was so far from being dejected that he never looked better in his life, he behaved himself with respect but assurance, and appear'd more concer'd to have such crimes layd to his charge, than that they were like to be so fatal to him ; so that thō he did not perhaps make so good use as he might of those advantages, which the blunders and contradictions of the witnesses gave him, yet he did it sufficiently to manifest his own inocency and the malice of his prosecutors to all upright and impartial men, had the Major part of those who sat upon him been such ; but their votes being governed by other motives, he found (as well as the Duke whom they stroue to wound through this Lord's side) that inocency was but a weak defence against false witnesses, an enraged people, and prejudiced Judges.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 537.

Ibid. pag. 578.

The tryall lasted five days, where all that malice could invent, was made use of to take away this inocent man's life, nevertheless the witnesses against him were sufficiently bispater'd and falsifyd in almost every point ; but alas, what could such a defendant do in opposition to such sharp managers, and the prepossession of the greatest part of his Judges, who made a National cause of it, some thought nothing unlawfull against a Papist, others were so fearfull they durst not be guided by their reason, So that thō all conscientious men who durst speake their minds, declared, they would not condemn a dog upon three such evidences as were brought against him, yet of the 86 Lords that sat upon him, 54 voted against him ; it is certain, he lay under great disadvantages from the fury of the factious partie (who had) the possession of the world in favour of the Plot, their main aim in that, and in all their other prosecutions (was) to cast an odium upon the Duke, in order to which they thought nothing unpermitted; yet those who wish'd him (Lord Stafford) well, were of opinion, that had he managed the advantages which were given him with dexterity, he would have made the greatest part of his Judges asham'd to condemn him; but it was his misfortune to play his game worst when he had the best cards, or rather the will of God to shorten his life a few days, to Crown him with the blessing of dyeing for his Religion, and accordingly accompanying his execution as he had done his tryall, with all immaginable protestations of his innocency, and a most Christian comportment, his head was cut off upon the Tower Hill the 29^h of December following.

It is neither necessary, nor to the present purpose to give a full relation of this sollemn tryall which is printed at large, any further, then to shew, that thō this good Lord was sacrificed with many more to the fury of the faction, yet that blow by which he fell as well as most others were level'd at his Royal Highness's head, it was his birth right, liberty, and life itself, they hunted through these bloody paths, and counted all for nothing so long as he kept his ground: At the very first opening therefore of the evidence at this tryall, S^r Francis Winnington sayd, It was the prospect of a Popish Successor that gave life and encouragement to the designes of destroying the Government and introducing Popery. Oates swore that upon perusal of his papers, which he had overlooked before, he found that the Duke's guards had releas'd several persons who were taken up on suspicion of haveing fired the Citty; that Father Bedingfeild had given the Society great assurances of his Royal Highness's readiness to advance the designe of killing the King; Godfrey's murther was likewise layd at his door, Dugdal deposing that the Duke sent to Colman when he was

T O M E
II.

1680.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 616.

The Duke is aim'd at in this and all other prosecutions.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 537.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 537.

TOME in custody not to confess, and that Colman replyd, he had
II. already reveal'd part of what he knew of S^r Edmond bury 1680. Godfrey ; upon which he had notice however not to confess, and that care should be taken that S^r Edmond bury Godefrey's Ibid: p. 595. evidence should do him no harme: in fine their intention was to blacken the Duke, and establish (as they thought) the credit of what they layd to his charge by the death of this Lord, and My Lord Arrundel whom they designed to try next, and by that means be able to get the Bill of Exclusion brought in again, which the tottering condition of the King's affairs gave small reason to hope he should be able to resist ; All those about him were indeed so terrifyd with this blow, and so settled in their opinion, that nothing but the Duke's Conversion or ruin could set things to rights again, that the former being despair'd of, it was fear'd most people about the King would advise him to yield to the latter ; for those who had most authority at Court were well grounded in a wholesome piece of casuistry, That in such cases it was not only Lawfull, but the highest act of Religion, if they could save the King, the Monarchy, the Nation, and Government only by giving up one (thō the greatest man in it) and so according to Caiphas's principle, thought it a cheap bargain, if by such a sacrifice they could save the efusion of so much blood, which they fancyd must otherwise of necessity be shed ; but what was worst, this Doctrine began to get footing amongst his Royal Highness's friends too, some of which sayd, Since he was so obstinate in his own Faith he could not expect others should go beyond the Alter to Serve him.

They dare not venter to try My Lord
 Arrundel.
 LETTERS
 VOL. I. p. 616.

Nevertheless the factious partie, thō highly exalted by this victory, found the Lords had been more carefull and nice in the examination of matters than they expected, which had plunged them a litle, and put a stop to their bringing on My Lord Arrundel's tryal, thō next in their project ; for the evidence (not) being quite so full in reference to him (and for the same witnesses to bring new matters after so many examinations would be scandalous) and his abilities too well known to think he would lose that advantage, made them suspect the success; and on the other hand to be baffled in that, would have knock'd all on the head again; so they contented themselves at present with the weapons already in their hand, which they managed the best they could to drive on their designs against the Duke, which was the main scope of all those other prosecutions.

It was suspected, that was the drift too of My Lord Carlisle and Howard of Escrick's pretended kindness to their kinsman; they had with Crocadil tears in their eyes, voted him guilty, and then thinking in some measure to repair their reputation, moved the House, to have his sentence (changed) to a perpetual banishment; but that being soon rejected, they desired leave to see him at least under pretence of carrying Divines to him; one would have the Bishopp of London, the other Dr. Burnet, but no body believ'd either of them were so solicitous about his soule, or had any hopes he would change his Religion, or turn Informer to please them, which he had not done to save his life. People therefore conjectured their intention was to see, if by cross examinations they could make him let fall any words which they might wrest against the Duke, and such witness would have found room enough in their consciences to turn and twist the most innocent expression to their malicious purposes, but by God fortune the Lords would not allow them leave to see him alone, without the presence of a Warder, So that project (whatever it was) was happily disappointed, to the great Satisfaction of his Royal Highness's friends, who expected no good from Such an interview.

Whatever the King's motive might be, to leave the Law in this conjuncture to it's cours, and every man to his own

My Lord Carlisle and Howard of Escrick endeavour to see their kinsman.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 616.

The King was ill advised to behave himself as

TOME
II.

1680. newter in this tryal.
LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 623.

Ibid. pag. 619.

The dismal prospect of the Duke's affairs, all men in power being against him.
LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 631.

Ibid. pag. 539.

KING JA: M^r
TOM: 3. pag. 209

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 396.

judgment, it is certain that as most of his Majestys servants run into this Lord's destruction, so by the least pervious care it was believed they would have done quite otherwise: and there is no doubt but had he been acquitted, it would have given the King much more eas, and ridded his hands of the Plot infinitely sooner, than this passiuue comportment, which gave his enemys a fuller scope to pursue their projects, and by hightening the storme droue still more and more into the deep: Accordingly he was tould by those who remember'd the year 40, that the present Parliament which had sat but two months, had made greater advances to his and the Government's Subversion, than that other did in two years, and it was the opinion of many judicious persons, that the Faction was got so far on their road that they would not now stay till the Duke's time came to try their strength for the Supreme Dominion.

Amongst all these ill omens of forbodeing mischiefs the Duke had not the least glimps of hopes from those who had most credit with the King, the Dutchess of Portsmouth who had so great an influence in affairs, had made mighty court of late to the Parliament men, she had placed herself near the Commons at the tryal dispenceing her sweatmeats and gracious " looks amongst them, and haveing formerly tould the Duke " to his face That the changing his Religion was the ground of " all the present evils, it was not to be doubted, but she now used the like arguments to the King: The Duke of Monmouth left no stone unturned to regain his Majestys favour, M^r. Crofts had acquainted him that Duke was ready to give all immaginable assurances of his fidelity and obedience, if he might be readmitted to his Majestys presence and esteem; but the King had so much resolution still, as to persist in his former answer, That he should be very willing provided he took Edinbourg in his way to Whitehall. My Lord

Sunderland who yet remain'd in his place of Secretary of State run along with Shaftsbury, not only in the Bill of Exclusion, Association, Limitation, that against the Queen, &c; but even went to their clubbs and encouraged the Partie to persever in pressing the King, assuring them, if they did it he would yield to the Exclusion at last; on the other hand the King's necessitys were great, which the Parliament men being asprised of a hundred of them had publickly sayd, and even sworne, they would never give him a farthing till he consented to the Bill; infine there was such artes and industry used that forreign States were brought into this Batterie too, the Dutch and Spanish Ministers were prevail'd upon to represent to his Majesty, that unless he complyd with his Parliament, there was no hopes of his ever being easy at home, nor any grounds for his Allys abroad to depend upon his former engagement and necessary assistance.

TOME
II.

1680.
Ibid: pag. 631.

Ibid: pag. 616.

Ibid. p. 633.

This stratagem was so well layd, that M^r Sidney the King's Envoy at the Hague had been prevail'd upon to write what terrours the States were in, at the news of the Bill of Exclusion being cast out, he sayd they came running to him in the greatest consternation imaginable, declaring they had rejected all other offers for their good, resolveing to depend wholly upon England and that now they Saw no reason to hope for either Support or assistance from thence; the people (he sayd) were in the last confusion, and M^r Van Beningham almost out of his witts. It is true upon the Duke's complaint of this, the Prince of Orange assured him the States were far from pressing the King to pass the Bill of Exclusion, that they were only Sollicitous to hear of a good understanding betwixt him and the Parliament, on which depended (he sayd) the Support or ruin of the Republique; but their own Memorial contradicted that, and goes much farther, it represents how the King had induced them not only by arguments, but threats, to rely

The Spanish and Dutch Ministers are brought in to perswade the King to pass the Bill of Exclusion.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 719.

Ibid: pag. 775.

T O M E
IL

1680.

upon his protection, rather than engage in an Alliance with France, which was conceiv'd to be So disavantageous to the publick peace of both Nations ; that he had as an assurance, promis'd to call his Parliament, that they had thereupon depended on his Royall word, which had hithertoo put a stop to the French King's encroachments, but that now he would find no difficulty in executing his designes, when he Saw this irreconcilable difference betwixt the King and the People, and accordingly was armeing powerfully ; whereas Spain being in no condition to help it self, they expected nothing but inevitable ruin ; and in the end they take upon them to tell his Ma^{ty}, he may find by experience, that these frequent dissolutions did but exasperate more and more both people and Parliament, and therefore could not but lament their misfortune to be ruin'd because his Majesty would not comply with them in reference to the Succession, a contingency that perhaps might never happen, and should it come to pass, he knew very well how little regard had been given to such exclusive Acts in former times.

But this stratagem so plausebly couched under the colour of a forreign Alliance, the King soon discover'd had its origin from home, nor did he make any secret of what he suspected, but order M^r. Sidney to be reprimanded for takeing upon him to send such Memorials, and to intermeddle in things which were out of his Commission.

The Duke's Council on this occasion.
KING JAM. Mth
Tom. 9. pag. 105.

“ Assoon as his Royal Highness heard of it, he observed “ to the King how industrious his Majesty's enemies were to “ move heaven and earth against him, and that therefore it “ behou'd him to be the more watchfull and resolute himself ;
“ he did not (he sayd) blame the Dutch and Spaniards for doing “ what they thought necessary for preservation of their own “ Countrys, but thought it a good example for his Majesty to “ follow and that he ought to do the same, he begg'd of him therefore to consider well ere he engaged in a War for the " defence of the Dutch, who after haveing ruin'd him at home, " would serve him as they did their Allies at Munster at " Nimeghen, that neither the Emperour nor Duke of Bran- " denbourg had given any promis of joining with him or them " against France, so that if he engaged in this quarrel purely " for the sake of the Dutch, he would deliver himself bound " hand and foot into the power of the Parliament ; who would " infallibly insiste upon disposing not only of what mony they " gave, but nameing the Officers too, an inroachment not to " be borne, so beggs of him to be aware of such Councillors " as would advise him to it. "

Nevertheless some Lords of the Council, grounding their arguments upon this Memorial press'd the King to call the Parliament into the Banqueting house, and there represent to them, That the States of Holland had quited the friendship of France at his sollicitation made by their advice, and therefore desired to know what he and the Dutch may depend on if France should fall upon them ; but others easily convinced his Majesty it would be to no purpose, unless he were disposed to deliver up the Duke to their mercy, without which no compliance or consideration could be hoped for, whatever the consequence might be either at home or abroad.

In this manner was his Majesty batter'd on all hands, thō the only bulwork the Duke had in this extremity, the King's own occasions for mony, the peace of Christendom, his forreign Allyances, almost all the people about him except two or three of the Duke's friends never let fall their sollicitations that he would not prefer his Brother before himself, to that extremity things were now come ; nor was the King in his own nature impregnable : nevertheless he was so true to his own, and the Duke's intrest, as not to abandon him in the main point at least.

T O M E

II.

1680.
The Duke gains ground in Scotland, while he is persecuted in England.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 399.

Ibid: pag. 513.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 394.

During this persecution of his Royal Highness in England, the Scotch charm'd with his presence were as Zealous to support his right and reputation in the world as the English were to invade it ; his generosity, affability, and great application to business mixed with an unbyaced fidelity and Love of Justice had so won the heartes of the Nobility and Gentry of that Country, who being of a temper rather to court the Prince's than the people's favour, they placed him in a manner on the Throne before his time in Scotland, while the Parliament endeavour'd to dispossess him of his right before he came to it in England : This encouraged the Duke to procure a petition from thence against his being banished, if the Parliament in England should press it, which they were readily disposed to do, or to give any other marke how much they abhor'd those factious proceedings of the Parliament there ; nor was his Highness the only gainer by his residence in Scotland, the King had an equal share of advantage by it ; he stifled at its first birth a commotion of the fanatical partie which then happen'd to break out, whereof some were taken and made examples of, but many more won over by the great esteem his presence had gain'd amongst them ; he regulated many things relating both to Civil and Military affairs, he placed and displaced Officers according as he found them disposed and qualifyd for his Majestys Service, and did it in so winning and obligeing a manner, that even those who lost their employments, lost not by it their respect for him nor dutyfulness to the King ; of which there could not be a more convincing example than in the President of the Sessions comportment on that occasion, who being gon up to London to Sollicite what the Duke aproved not of, was no sooner tould that his Highness thought it not fit he should so much as speak to the King, but he presently answer'd, His Royal Highnesse's orders shall be obeyed, and without moveing the King even underhand or seeing any of the discontented partie, return'd privately back into Scotland ; so great an influence had his Highness gain'd over them as to force esteem and obedience even from enemys themselves.

All this while the King was infinitely perplexed with the impertinence of the Parliament, however was persuaded to continue their Sessions under pretence, that their extravagances would at last render them odious to the people ; but when the Duke heard of this wheedle, he tould the King, He not only " exposed his prerogative, but his person too, if he let them sit " any longer ; that never such an Address as the last was " presented to a King on the Throne, or by subjects that were " not in open Rebellion, that their endeavouring to take away " his power of pardoning, was an argument they were not " unrepair'd to take away his libertie too ; and that therefore it " behoved him to look well to himself ; he was out of patience, " he sayd, to See his Majesty prevail'd upon by weak and " intrested men to continue the Sessions after such insolent and " insupportable carriage.

In other circomstances these arguments would have had their weight, but those who advised the contrary were so well backed as to overbalance any thing the Duke could say. The Dutchess of Portsmouth who had need of mony as well as protection, seconded these Councels with all her credit, she was tould the House would not forget her amongst the reforms, and threaten'd to throw her in to the lump of grievances ; this they knew would fright her intirely into their measures, to which she had shewn so great a disposition already : Accordingly she sticks at nothing to court an intrest amongst the Parliament men ; this open'd the doors of her apartement, not only to many of the violent partie, but to My Lord Shaftsbury himself, who in a jesting manner bragg'd publickly of it, but others found their friends were so scandalized at this new Allyance, that Several were forced to purge themselves of the aspersion, which 1680.

T O M E
II.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 647.

KING JA: Mth
To. 9. pag. III.

The Dutchess of Portsmouth sides with the Faction partie.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 737.

T O M E occasion'd many reflection and no litle mirth during those II. debates. But My Lord Essex had tould them plainly at last, 1680. that the Kingdom would neither suffer popish Favorites or popish Ministers, and that like Samuel he must aske, What meant the bleating of that kind of cattel? To which he hoped the King would make the same answer with Saul, That he only kept them with his other evil Councillors to be offer'd up in sacrifice, to pleas the people.

But notwithstanding this puritanical grimace, these parties were not so disperate, as not to unite heartely enough against the Duke, nor did all this juggling open the King's eyes, nor give him a due suspicion of those peoples advice, who he saw were saveing stakes with the oposite side; but by a criminal patience, gave the malignant partie great advantage over himself and his real friends, whom they either terrifyd into a compliance, or defamed and blancken'd them if they persever'd in their duty, and had this publick Coitering continued much longer, they would not have left an honest man about him.

LETTERS
 VOL. I. p. 647.

Great endeavours used to remove the Duke's friends from the King.

This was what the Parliament aim'd at, and therefore many violent speeches were made in both Houses against whatever they thought had been advised the King in oposition to their designes, with intent to blacken the advisers; and thō no one was named, nor an impeachment offer'd at (there being no crime alledged sufficient to ground an impeachment upon) they hoped nevertheless to fright his Majesty by their clamours, and force him to abandon those they chifly aim'd at, and My Lord Essex quoted Precedents where persons for publick reports only, had been displaced; on which occasion his Royal Highness observed to the King, That the Lord who " press'd to have evil Councillors removed upon Common fame
 " and cited examples of it, could have found in the same Reigns " Precedents likewise for laying violent hand upon their King.
 However this made M^r Secretary Jenkins withdraw for a time,

KING JAM. M^r
 To. 9. pag. 113.

LETTERS
 VOL. I. p. 644.

and My Lord Shaftsbury following the blow made all the others Stagger; the Duke, he sayd, thō absent, govern'd the Councils as much as ever, that no imployment was disposed of either Civil, Military, or even Ecclesiasticall it self, but by his approbation, and therefore press'd vehemently that such persons might be removed, as either owed their advancement, or had any relation to the Duke; which sawcy expression the Duke of Monmouth took pleasure in repeating frequently, immagining to cast a blamish upon his Highness by it; So that had this libertie of declameing continued much longer, his Majestys friends would have been torn or frighted from him, and he left as a Captive in the hands of his enemies before he had been aware; as apear'd by S^r Robert Payton's treatment, who, because it was discover'd that he had formerly some correspondence with the Duke, was expell'd the House upon it, nor would his speaking scorrelously of his Royal Highness when he made his defence, save him from that punishment, the ever haveing been his friend was in their acceptation like the irremissible sin against the Holy Ghost.

TOME
II.

1680.

Ibid: pag. 701.

Ibid. pag. 693.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 653.

Projects for destruction of Popery.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 602.

Ibid: VOL. 2.
p. 6.

Ibid: VOL.
p. 763.

It was thought reasonable, by these fiery patriots, that the destruction of Popery should go hand in hand with that of a Popish Successor, in order to which there was no end of projects and proposals; as wild some of them, as they were unnatural and cruel: Some times the Papists were to change habitations, those who lived in the North of England were to be transplanted into the South or West, and so with the others; then they were for banishing them quite, and supplying their place with a better generation by naturalizing all Protestant strangers; an other contrivance was to have them register'd both Priest and Layity, that their numbers might be known; but they soon perceiv'd that project would produce a quite contrary efect to what was aim'd at, and by discovering how few they were, take away that aprehtion they labour'd so

T O M E

II.

1680.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 657.

much to establish ; and as to a Popish Successor they thought an association the best expedient, not such an one as was made in Queen Elizabeth's-days against the Queen of Scotts, that, they sayd, would no more fit the present circumstances of affairs, than a coate made for a Child of fouer year old, would fit him when he came to be forty ; that the dangers of Popery from the Duke, were now much greater than they were then from that Queen ; so they took care to draw it accordingly : but by making it so strong against him, it had in reality the same force as the Bill of Exclusion, which gravell'd them a litle, because they were loath to part with any article in it, and yet to bring in the same thing twice in one Sessions was against the Parliamentary Laws ; but they now were above formalities, and fancyd the Lords would be no nicer than themselves, in the matter, especially since many of those who had been against the Bill, had since voted My Lord Stafford guilty, for which it was immagin'd (or at least great endeavours were used to perswade it) that the Duke would never pardon them ; which by consequence might change their conduct in reference to him : But this darelign project by the moltiplicity of others, and some intervening disputes fell for the present ; however My Lord Shaftsbury would not let it dye, but tram'd an association pursuant to these resolves, which was afterwards seized in his closet, containing a promis of mutual assistance in resisting the Duke of York's Succession, and a resolution to do that by force, the King would not be brought to establish by a Law.

The Lords and Commons had like to have quarter'd about priviledges and Employments.

Many people were astonished that the King's patience was Still proof against all these licentious proceedings, his only excuse was, they might perhaps fall out amongst themselves ; and there happen'd indeed a dispute during these debates which might probably enough have brought it about.

The Lords it seems had pass'd a Bill in their own favour in reference to the tryalls of Peers, which when it came down to the Lower House some Members moved that since the Lords expected the Commons should concur to the inlarging of their priviledges, it was but reasonable to have some regard to their own, and immediately proposed that the Act against Scandalum Magnatum might be repeal'd: This motion was hugely opposed by the leading members; they apprehended that should they put the Lords out of humour, they might miss this oportunity of getting them to pass the Association Bill, but the yong members being fond of the exemption, and having got the bitt in their mouths, run away with it in spight of all their haranging; but when it came up to the Lords they rejected it, and by that time the yong Commoners grew cooler in the matter: so it created no misunderstanding nor gave any obstruction to their other designs, thō an other bone of division had like to have been thrown in amongst them soon after, in which the grandees of the House shew'd their weakness too, and that they were not above the temptation of averice and interest, no more than their Neibours.

There had been talke of a bargain or certain conditions to be offer'd to his Majesty, in which, it seems, many of the heads of the partie like the prudent Steward in the Gospel had the grace not to forget themselves; it was sayd My Lord Russel was to be made Governour of Portsmouth, S^r William Jones Chief Justice, Titus Secretary of State, and that they had articed also for My Lord Shaftsbury to make him Lord Hight Treasurer, thinking it dangerous to leave him out, but he (good man) as soon as he heard of it, fel into a mighty passion they should think him capable of sacrificing the publick good to his private interest; this made others ashamed too, and forced them to take great pains in clearing themselves since they found it would not take, and carryed on their

T O M E
II.

1680.
LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 659.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 2.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 738.

T O M E
II.

1680.
The Parliament were for articleing with the King.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 669.

Ibid. p. 679.

More projects to disable the Duke.

hipocrisy so far, as to pass the selfe denying Vote as a standing security against any such attempts for the future.

Haveing purged their project thus from all its dross, they prepared the reste, which was of more refined mettall, and the King thought it worth his while to see what this pretended bargain would produce; the Duke's friends without much study, saw plainly enough what it would tend too, but found it impossible to stop the experiment, so at last out of it comes, with an assurance That in case his Majesty would pleas to redress some crying grievances only, he should find them afterwards as tractable as he could wish; and to let him see how moderate they were, limited them to these few heads: First, that the Privy Council might not judg of meum and tuum, that the corruption of Judges might be remedied which they conceiv'd came from their Commission being revocable at pleasure, and therefore desired they might run, quamdiu se bene gesserint, that Justices of Peace, Deputy Leiftenant, and all imployment both Civil and Military, not excepting the Fleet, might be in the hands of men who were known to be good Protestants, that he would confirme the Act of Association, and exclude the Duke of York, and then they promis'd upon their words they would relieve Tangier and supply his Fleet.

This they knew was but part of the King's necessitys, and undoubtedly were but part of their demands neither, they had more ready on the first occasion, and other methods a brewing to driue on their aims in reference to the Duke, in case the King's squemishness should still boggle at a point blank Exclusion. In the project therefore of an Act for secureing the Protestant Religion, they repeal'd the clause which exempted the Duke of York from the Test, they disabled him from being Admiral of Ireland, Tangier, or the Indies, or from bearing any imployment in his Majestys Dominions, and that if he succeeded to the Crowne they tooke care he should be a nominal King only, and therefore provided that in case of the King's death the Parliament then in being, or the last before, should assemble and sit for six months of their owne accord, that the two Houses should fill up the vacant imployments, Ecclesiastical, Civil and Military, that it should not be in the power of the said Duke of York to controule any thing done here in, so long as he continued a Papist, nor have the power to dispose of any place or benefice belonging to the Crowne, that he should not have a negative voice in Parliament, nor have the power to raise any forces without its consent.

These were the lowest terms they could come too, in reference to the Succession: which was no comfortable alternatie to his Royal Highness, and thō all this was but part of their wares and the King saw plainly enough what a bargain he was like to have of them all together, however he still powshed upon the matter, which gave them great encouragement they should prevail at last, and afforded them time likewise to try all the fords and even untrodden paths to arive at what they drove at: The Lord Major, the Sheriffs, and some others had a priviledge of making each a freeman of London, which they were used to sell for mony, but now had some thing in view of much more precious esteem; so one of the Sheriffs proposed the Duke of Buckingham to be made free, but the Court of Aldermen by good fortune hesitated a litle upon it, which gave time to discover and prevent the project, which was to have made the Earle of Shaftsbury free man by the same method the day following, then immediately have chozen him Aldermand and Lord Major the next election; by which means they would not only have been masters of the Citty, but given great encouragement to a Commonwealth disposition in the people, when they saw Noblemen of the first order willing (to) Rank themselves with tradsmen and Citizens.

T O M E
II.

1680.

A contrivance to have made Shaftsbury
Lord Major.

LETTERS
VOL: I. p. 684.

TOME
II.

1680.
The Parliament impeach
the Duke's friends.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 672.

Besides all these irregularities and exorbitant pretentions, the King saw a tendency in the Parliament to unite all Sects and Religions except Popery, and that a renoncing of it alone should be sufficient to procure a tolleration and protection ; that a man might be what he pleas'd provided he were not a Papist, and thō this would have let in Atheisme and all sorts of immorality, they were not frighted at it, they were disposed to destroy all Religion rather than not destroy the Duke for the sake of his.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 6.

Ibid: pag. 60.

Ibid: pag. 9.

Ibid: p. 33.

Ibid: pag. 29.

One would have thought the King had now seen enough of their voteing to have put an end to it, but his curiosity or necessitys still gave him more patience to wait, and see if they would yet offer him any thing worth his acceptance, in which the King lost much ground ; but they lost not the time which this loitering gave them of playing all their Engins against the Duke ; they spread a report that the Duke himself had writ to the King, rather to yeeld to his Exclusion than expose his person and Government any longer by resisting the inclinations of his Parliament, and to prevent any one's giving a contrary advice, they fell upon all those they imagined favour'd him, whom hitherto they had so much modestie as not to name, but now desire bouldly My Lord Halifax, the Marques of Worcester, the Earle of Clarendon, the Earle of Feversham, M^r Hide might be removed from all places, and his Majestys presence, for haveing counsell'd him against the said Bill : They impeached for the same reason the Lord Cheef Justice* Scroggs ; but when it came up to the Lords, because it contain'd no special matter (which had been an old dispute) they rejected it ; and that no Stratagem might be wanting to alarme and amuse the people, new informations were brought concerning the Irish Plot, and several imprison'd upon it, to perswade the Kingdom, that so long as the Duke had an expectancy of coming to the Crown, they must never hope to see an end of plotting; and to give the King himself a cast of their office too, they pass'd a * Vote, that whosoever should lend or advance him mony, upon any branck of his revenue, should be responsable for it in Parliament as a hinderer of its sitting.

T O M E
II.

1680.

The Duke of Monmouth seeing his Royal Highness so furiously batter'd on all sides, and the King so passive in the matter, thought it a fit occasion to attempt his own readmission to Court, and to make his pretentions more plausible fain'd a repentance, which he knew the King's tenderness for him would not be proof against; and as it fortun'd, some of the Duke of Yorke's friends themselves, had like to have given a helping hand to his endeavours here in: It seems My Lord Halifax thō vehement against the Bill of Exclusion, had been always as positue against the Duke's return, or his being ever suffer'd near the King's person; but now seeing it would almost be impossible to keep his Majesty steddly in his resolutions, if the Duke was not at his elboe, and that no one had, or could pretend to that intrest with him, began to wish his Highness back, and thought the readmission of the Duke of Monmouth to Court, would be a good pretence to have him likewise recall'd; but others thought it better to run any hazards than to suffer that Star to blaze again, especially considering to what a low ebb his Royal Highnesse's credit was reduced when the meanest man in the Kingdom could aspers and vilifie him with impunity; Oates had sayd publickly The Duke was possess'd with a devil, and that for the love he bore the Nation, he would make no Scruple to kill him with his own hand if he could

Ibid: pag. 19.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 40.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 23.

Ibid: p. 35.

T O M E
II.

1681.

The King
prorogues the Parliament, before which they make certain violent votes.

LETTERS
Vol. 1. p. 727.

come at him, yet no notice was taken of it, and My Lord Shaftsbury thinking that his being in Scotland gave him too much ground to stand upon his defence, press'd mightely to have him sent into some foreign Country, and to make merry with his misfortunes, sayd, If he were in Italy, he and Cardinal Norfolk might probably govern the Pope.

These insolencies without the House and exorbitant demands within, convinced his Majesty at last, there was no compromising matters by means of expedients, thō many of his false friends still press'd him to it, and were for haveing mony at any rate (proposeing without doubt to find their own convenience in it full as much as his) endeavouring therefore to perswade him that thō he yeilded too far at present, measures might be found to set his affairs to rights again in more temperate times ; but he was too well apprised of (the) character of the Commons to think they were to be trick'd by such artifices, and that by consequence whatever mony he got, it would cost him more prerogative than it was worth, without hopes of redemption ; he was sencible the King his Father was much in the wrong by endeavouring to put the Parliament still more and more in the wrong, that the destruction of the Monarchie was as much aim'd at now as then ; and that the Exclusion of the Duke would but be a warning piece to the present possessor to provide for himself : Wherefore on munday the 10th of January he prorogued the Parliament to the 20th, resolveing at the same time, not to let that Parliament sit any more, which had offer'd so many indignities in their speeches and Addresses ; and accordingly it was soon after disolv'd (Jan^y: 18) and another apointed to meet at Oxford the 21st of March following, but to keep forreign States in awe, particularly the French, a pretended short prorogtion was thought necessary. The Commons suspecting the King's intentions even before the Vssher of the Black Rod came to call them up,

LETTERS
Vol. 2. p. 41.

they voted (Jan^r: 10th) That whosoever advis'd the King against passing the Bill of Exclusion, was as betrayer of his Majesty and the Protestant Religion, a promoter of French intrest, and a pensioner of France.

T O M E
II.

1681.

These hard words at parteing did not diminish the Duke's satisfaction when he heard they were dismiss'd, for besides, that his all was at stake in England, he began to feel their influence even at Edinburgh it self; the great intrest and esteem he had gain'd there, hinder'd not the Factious partie from finding a way of affronting him, they had stir'd up the Scholars and aprentices of that Town to enter into a sort of bond or combination to burn the Pope, which was thought a proper way of begining an atack upon his Royall Highness himself, but by the care and vigilance of the Magestrates it was timely prevented; for thō the rabble might be gain'd on such an occasion, it was impossible to moue the substantial part of the City in his disfavour, he got such an awefull esteem wherever he personally resided, that the most invenomed malice of his enemies was not able to anoy him: even in England it self, (while he was suffer'd to remain at Court) the King's affairs went infinitely better, and many of those who barked so furiously at him when his back was turn'd, cring'd and faun'd upon him when he was present.

The Fanaticks attempt affronting
the Duke
at Edinburg.

LETTERS
VOL: 2. p. 38.

This was so manifest that the Duke had rais'd one argument from it even while the Parliament was yet siting, why the King should call him back, that his being on the place always damp't their malice rather than increas'd it, that thō " many might be found who wished his Majesty well, yet " such was the terrour of these prosecutors, that none but " he durst give bould advice when they saw how Ministers " were used; that others had fortunes to make or to secure, " and might hope to preserve themselves, thō the King and " Monarchie itself should fall, but that he was firmly linked "

The Duke's arguments for being recall'd.

KINGJA: M^r
TO: 9. p. 126.

Ibid: 110.

- TOME “ to both, and must share in their fate whatever it proved ;
II. “ that others might have private ends, dependances and 1681. “ relations, which might sway their Councils, flatter their “ hopes, and make them suffer those changes with patience “ they had not courage to oppose ; but that he alone was “ equally concern’d with his Majesty if possible to prevent “ them ; that as to the danger they pretended Religion would “ be in, should he come to the Crown, or have the management “ of affairs, he hoped, he Sayd, his friends would not imagin him “ either so weak as to think it possible to force a change upon
 “ the Nation, or so insincere as to endeavour a thing he had “ so oft declar’d to be against his judgment ; for thō he wish’d
 “ all men like himself as to Religion, yet thought it unlawfull KING JA. M^o “ to force any man much less a whole Kingdom to imbrace it ;
 To: 9. p. 119. “ that he always thought it the intrest of the Monarchie to “ preserve the Church of England as by Law establish’d, “ and that he constantly join’d with the Bishops and Loyal “ partie in the Parliament, and was in admiration how men “ could apprehend danger from Popery, which was so incon-Ibid. p. 121. “ siderable a body and forclosed from all imployments, while “ they overlook’d the imminent danger of being swallow’d up “ by Presbitery and Fanatysisme, which already had over-“ spread the face of the Kingdom, and had the impudence to “ propose in Parliament the repeal of the Act of the 35th of “ Queen Elizabeth and the Corporation Act, and indeed all “ such Laws as have been counted the Church of England’s “ only bulworks against them ; he begg’d therefore of his “ friends not to apprehend the imaginary dangers of Popery, not “ so far to dread the authors of the real ones, as not to give KING JA. M^o “ their best advice to his Majesty and to endeavour his TOM. 9. p. 125. “ readmission to the management of affairs, which the Bishops “ themselves had owned (when he came last from Scotland) that not only the King, but the Church of England itself had " T O M E found the good effects of. " II.

1681.

But all this arguing was so far from prevailing with the King, while the Parliament sat, that he durst not permit the Duke's return it was broke, but put him off til after the Sessions of the Parliament at Oxford, which now he tould the Duke he was prevail'd upon to let meet in order to sit and doe business.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 93.

They press
the Duke to change his Religion.

There could not be greater argument how much his Royal Highness was above fear or dejection, than thus to content (contend) as it were for Empire when Hannibal was at the walls of Rome, yet his friends were far from being either govern'd by his reasons, or confirm'd by his example, they were in such apprehensions notwithstanding the late dissolution, that they would not let him enjoy this litle glimps of sunshine, but by renewing their old sollicitations assure him it would be impossible to keep his head above water, or for any of his friends to abide by him, unless he did the only thing which could extricate himself, the King, and all his friends from inevitable ruin; but nothing of this, made the least impression upon him, he knew (he sayd) his obligations and duty both to God and the King, which he was resolved not to confound, and left the success to the disposal of Him, who is not tyd up to the rules of humain foresight, and could bring that to pass which seems impossible to men, but that if Providence thought not fit to redress his misfortunes in this world, he was content to wait for his reward, which he was sure (if he did his duty) would not fail him in the next.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 48.
& 74.

But what griev'd his Highness most was to see the King himself enter into the same apprehensions; he had sent for Mr. Hide before he had resoved to dissolve the Parliament, to tell him it would not be in his power to protect the Duke any longer, if he did not conforne and go to Church and that he design'd to send him to Ediibourg to let him know as much.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 81.

TOME M^r Hide was hugely surprized, as well as troubled at this resolution ; for thō it was, what, not only he, but all the Duke's Protestant friends both wish'd and had press'd with more vehemence, than the respect due from them could well allow of, yet he knew so well the Duke's temper and steddyness, when he either was, or thought himself in the right, that all the dangers in the world would never move him, and by consequence (he) must be wholly abandon'd if the King persisted in that resolution ; all therefore he could do, was to contrive some delay, and being sick of Commission he had no great difficulty of pretending to be really so, which put off his journey till the Parliament was dissolved, after which the King cooling a litle in his apprehensions, and other expedients being proposed (thō more absurd if possible then the former) served at least to let it drop for the present, and any shifting or alteration in a lingering distemper gives present eas, thō it no way forward the cure.

This project therefore was, that in case the Duke survived the King, he should be regarded as a Minor, and put under the tuition of his own Children ; this, how ridiculous soever it appear'd, wanted not fomenters both at home and abroad, and the Prince and Princess of Orange who were to have that Province confer'd upon them, were not altogether passive in the matter.

Some changes in the family.

LETTERS
VOL. 1. p. 707.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 73.

While the Factious Partie were thus moulding their projects against the ensuing Parliament, it behoved the King to make preparations of his part likewise, which was not to be done efectually till he had made certain reformes in his Family and Council, he saw plainly that if he cleans'd not his own nest, he should soon be forced to abandon it : My Lord Salsbury gave the first occasion by desiring to withdraw, thereby to express his greater dissatisfaction when the King declar'd in Council he was resolved to brake the Parliament, and the Earles of Essex, Sunderland, and S^r William Temple were order'd to bear him company, and thō My Lord Conway who succeeded in the Secretaries office was litle known, yet it being so hard to find a trusty man and capable of that employment, the King accepted of him upon M^r Seymour's recommendation, and for the same reason the Duke, thō he had proposed an other, was very well satisfyd with the choice.

T O M E
II.

1681.

But no one had more need than the Duke to prepare antidotes against the intended Parliament, his letters had hithertoo been infectual to perswade the King to recall him home, or to pursue such measures as he thought necessary for their mutual preservation ; he resolved therefore to send one up to Court to reinforce his arguments, and propose some expedients which he hoped would be much more for the King's ease and advantage, than those which were now in agitation, and of which he was sure his own ruin was to make the main ingredient.

The Duke
sends M^r.
Churchill to the King with proposalls.

M^r Churchill being pitched upon for this service he was " commission'd in the first place to press the King not to suffer " the Parliament to sit, at least till those popular heats were " abated, and by that means convince the world that he would " be King and steddy to his resolutions ; 2^d that he should " diswade his Majesty all he could from any such Allyances " with Spain and Holland, as would ingage him in a War with " France, for that would but enslave him to his Parliament " and they might probably leave him in the Lurch at last, the " behaveour of the Ambassadors of both those Countrys haveing " been such of late, as gave no encouragement to rely much " upon them ; 3^d that an Allyance with France was the only " means to support the King and preserve the Monarchie and " even the Church of England itself, by affording a supply " without a Parliament, which aim'd manifestly at the ruin of " them all ; that matters were come to such a head that the "

KING JA: M^{rs}
To. 9. p. 131.

T O M E

II.1681.

“ Monarchy must be either more absolute or quite abolished,
 “ that France would be Sorry to see England a Commonwealth,
 “ that Spain desired it, and Holland would not be displeas’d
 “ at it, and that since his Majesty was so kind as to resolve not “ to abandon him, nothing but an Alliance with France could “ support him in that resolution, considering how he had been “ used by others even the Prince of Orange himself; 4th to “ Sollicite his return, for which there needed (he sayd) no other “ argument than the dejection and trouble of the old Cavaliers
 “ and all honest men, together with the joy of the other partie “ at his being sent away, and how much quieter things were “ while he remain’d at Court, thō the apreheensions of a contrary “ effect had always been the pretence for keeping him from it.
 “ In fine he directed him to press the King to resolute “ Councels, which the last Summer’s experience convinced “ him to be his only security, but cautions M^r Churchill to be “ carefull how he communicats these matters to My Lord “ Halifax, as not likely to enter into such measures; and that “ if the vain apreheension of troubles were still objected against “ his return, to begg permission at least, that he might come “ and wait upon his Majesty for a week or a fortnight, and “ if that be also denyd, and he by consequence condemned to “ remain still in exile, to insist that his power at least might “ be increased where he was, and he made General of the “ forces of the Kingdom of Scotland.

When M^r Churchill arrived at Court he found the King as deaf to his arguments, as he had been to the Duke’s letters, only he gave some ear to the Alliance with France, but for the rest, being fixed in his resolution of the Parliament’s meeting, it served him for an answer to all the other demands; so that the Duke’s own friends seeing the King immoveable, thought it not proper his Royal Highness should come and be in England while the Elections were a makeing, least his supposed intrest might exasperate the people, for that should the King thwart or cross the measures of those Councillors who undertook for the Parliament's good behav'our and promis'd such mighty matters from it (thō they aim'd at nothing but an accomodation betwixt the King and them let it cost what it will) would all be charged upon the Duke; for men of most credit about the King began now to have little regard to his Royal Highnesse's intrest, nay many of them proposed it as the first step or preliminary in order to settle the King's affairs, or indeed their own advancement, and thought any advantage cheap that could be purchased at so easy a rate.

Tis true My Lord Halifax and Mr Seymour confess'd, that neither measures of vigor nor good husbandry could be constantly pursued (thō both so necessary) without the Duke's presence, and yet declared his presence could not be supported; this was such a paradox, that his Royal Highness could not forbear expostulateing that matter, when he heard it, To pretend, says he, that what is for the good of the Service " cannot be supported, is to throw up the game, for when " good measures and good men are not stood by, it is the " worst symptom a Government can have, and shews that if it " is not at the last gaspe, it cannot avoid dying a lingering " death.

But it was in vain to argue against a settled resolution; a Parliament was necessary, they sayd, (thō no good could be hoped from it at home) to make things more easy abroad and avoid clamours from foreign partes, that otherwise Spain and Holland would cry out The King abandon'd all to the French which they still presumed a Parliament would oppose: The Prince of Orange was so full of this, that he could not forbear writing to the Duke himself That every body was wonderfully allarm'd at the Parliament's being prorogued, for thō he owned they flew very high, yet, he Sayd, unless the King and they

T O M E
II.

1681.

LETTERS
Vol. 2. p. 119.

KING JA: M^{rs}
To. 9: pag. 219.

The Prince of Orange complains of the Parliament's prorogation, and is for the Bill of Exclusion.

LETTERS
Vol. 2. p. 118.

Ibid: p. 122.

T O M E

II.

1681.

agreed, all the States of Europe which were linked in the same intrest with England must necessarily be ruin'd ; nay he went farther to others, S^t.Gabriel Silvius when he came from Holland, made no mistery of owneing that the Prince of Orange was for haveing the Bill of Exclusion pass, which, he sayd, would give great satisfaction to Christendom, and doe the Duke no prejudice, their being no probability of it's takeing efect more than other Acts of the like nature in former times, and that the Duke himself had own'd he liked it better than any other expedient ; but the snake which lurked under this compliment upon the Prerogative, was not invisible no more than his other darke designs, which now began to be suspected by more than the Duke alone, who therefore answer'd that false suggestion

“ by shewing That to suffer the Parliament to meddle with the “ Succession was in efect to turn an Hereditary Kingdom into “ an Elective one, and that thō such attempts have formerly “ been disappointed, yet it was dangerous to suffer them again.
 “ A man that has parryd one thrust may be kill'd at the next,
 “ that it had been always observed, when ever the Parliament “ was allow'd to meddle in any matter of State, they ever after “ claim'd it as a priviledge, the King made use of their “ assistance to destroy the late Earle of Clarendon, and they “ have grounded a pretence from it of inspecting the conduct “ of States men, and indeed have fallen upon almost every “ Minister since, and should they be suffer'd to doe the like in “ this case, they would clame it as their due for the future to “ appoint a Successor to the Crown : Tis true the Prince of Orange denyd his haveing given rise to that report, or to have ever sayd any such thing himself, but his conduct during all these transactions gave too much ground to suspect his sincerity in that, as well as his views in all the rest ; but nothing was able to alter the opinion of the refined reasoners, who govern'd the present Councels ; they hoped, they sayd, by a Parliament

KING JA: M^{rs}.
 To. 8. p. 225.

Ibid: p. 226.

LETTERS
 VOL: 2. p. 215.

to stop peoples mouthes on one side, and prevent forreign attempts on the other ; that if France were not kept quiet abroad, no quiet must be expected at home, that hithertoo it had the good efect to preserve the peace, but should France atack Flanders and there be no hopes of a Parliament, all the world would be in an uproar ; so when M^r Churchill return'd, the King assur'd his Royal Highness that thō he could not promise himself much good by it, yet his ingagement to forreign Ministers and severall usefull friends at home, oblig'd him to try the experiment.

But it was these usefull friends the Duke suspected most, and shew'd plainly why the King in reason ought to doe so too ; he could not but be sencible their arguments were strung upon too slender a thread to hang long together, but what startled him most, was how the King could immagin that those " Ministers who had been attack'd by the last Parliament, and " were perswaded this would prove no better, could be for " haveing it to meet, unless they proposed to make their peace " by throwing up all, or so much at least as would bring all the " rest after it; for who ever, says he, saw any Minister escape " who was once impeach'd, but by giving away some essential " part of the Prerogative, or by betraying the King and the " trust he put in him, as My Lord Danby and Sunderland had " done, that for his part he had raison to apprehend, that those " who were in this Situation design'd to make him the Sacrifice " of reconciliation, and that the King himself had sufficient " cause to be jealous of them upon the same account ; wherefore " he wished his Majesty to chuse some Councelors and " confidents as went upon sollid principles of honour, Loyalty, " and conscience, which are always found to be the Safest " methods in the end. "

It is certain nevertheless that many who meant well to the Duke concur'd in these measures, for thō they had no design

T O M E to hurt him by it, the confusion things were in made them
II. act blindfould, and the Duke was forced to have patience till 1681. by more mature reflexion those men could get the better of their false notions and groundless apprehensions; and therefore he made use of such instruments as far as they would go, and had the caution not to move with too much Violence those wheels which seem'd to stop, for fear of breaking all in pieces; as yet he saw they were at such a gaze, that nothing was discern'd by them in its due proportion, that in a litle time probably objects would appear more distinct, and then it was hoped they would act more rationally; the King indeed had assur'd his Royal Highness that he would never consent to the Bill, and that upon the first irregular Vote he would breake the Parliament, but his Highness had found the King exceeding wavering of late, he saw him so dilatory in executing any good purpose, that if it was not quite layd aside, it lost halfe its force by the lingring manner of performance: So it had fared with his resolution of weeding his family and Council, which like many others had dwindled to nothing; the only hopes he had, was the King being sencible that those people who press'd so violently for the Duke's Exclusion, would still think themselves so unsecure during the King's owne life, as not to stop there, and the King being fully resolved never to suffer any change in his own time, was the only foundation on which his Royal Highness's security seem'd to rest.

LETTERS
VOL.1. p.143.

LETTERS
VOL.1. p.127.

Ibid: p.121.

The King agrees to a Treaty with France.
KING CH:
LETT^m p.91.

As to the other Expedient of an agreement with France which was part of M^r Churchill's Commission, the King gave so far into it as to permit the Duke to endeavour to bring it about, but would not (he sayd) be the first mover of it himself, being desirous to know what termes he was like to have, ere he exposed his honour too much, since the French Ambassador upon the first overture of it by M^r Churchill gave nothing but fine words; but cautions the Duke not to consent to any article

LETTERS
VOL.2. p.141.

which might foreclose him from calling a Parliament if he thought it fitting, and to press, that the present payment in hand might be more considerable thō the succeeding ones were less ; and lastly, that the person whom the Duke should think fit to send, might come streight to London and there deliver his letters to M^r Hide, to be shewn the King : The pretence for this was to prevent the delay which going about by Scotland would unavoidably occasion ; but the true reason was some insinuations that the Duke might perhaps treat of matters the King was not privy too, which jealousie the Duke was under a necessity of haveing so much regard too as to obviate the thing without seeming to suspect it.

TOME
II.

1681.

Notwithstanding this Treaty was kept exceeding secret and the Dutchess of Portsmouth herself (thō too much in the intrest of France) not made privy to it, yet it is probable she got some intimation what was a doing, being she took a fancy to shift sides again, and endeavour a reconciliation with the Duke at a time he seem'd most abandon'd ; it had been indeed long the opinion of some of his welwishers, that the Duke haveing no hopes but in a treaty with France, and she likewise haveing no other foundation of security but from thence, they could not long be other than friends : Whatever in fine was the motive that brought her to it, M^{rs} Wall came to ask a conference with M^r Hide, where fair overtures were made towards a reconciliation, if his Highness (she sayd) thought her friendship worth the courting ; tis certain he had no great reason to ground much upon a person who made such quick turnes, and seem'd to be govern'd by nothing but intrest and ambition, however he thought it not prudent to slight any offer of kindness especially from one in so much power, and which might be of so great advantage to him in this conjuncture, but it was the Duke's misfortune that M^r Hide (who was his Agent in this

The Dutchess of Portsmouth pretends friendship which comes to nothing.

LETTERS
VOL. I. p. 398.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 143.

T O M E affair) was one of the Commissioners of the Treasurie, and had
II. in the management of that imployment, shewn greater regard 1681. to the King's necessities, than to support his credit, with that Lady, which whether it made them clash in their negotiation, or her natural fickleness, join'd with some new discoverys of better termes from the other side, chang'd her mind, tis certain all came to nothing in the end ; the Duke was realy concern'd for it, not that he built so much upon her friendship as he fear'd her enmitie on so critical an occasion, just before the Parliament was to meet, when all the world was arming with thunder against him.

The Duke pretended for recusancy.

LETTERS
 Vol. I. p. 175.

Ibid. p. 170.

As a mark of this, his Royal Highnesse's enemys were far from being idle even during this short interval of Parliament ; for since they could not make new Laws to his prejudice, they found means to stretch the old ones beyond their natural extent in order to convict him as a Papist, for which being Straighten'd in time, the Justices of the old Bailie sent for the Grand Jury of Middlesex after they had been discharged at the Sessions at Hick'sshall, and swearing them a new, deliver'd the presentment against the Duke of York, which upon M^r Oates his affidavit, That he had seen his Highness at Mass and receive the Sacrament according to the rites of the Church of Rome, they found it Billa Vera. This was certainly very irregular, however some of the Duke's friends fancyd an advantage might be made of it, in case the King had realy a mind to have his Brother with him ; for under a pretence of makeing his apearance after the proclamation came out, as the Duke of Norfolke and some others had done, it would have been a good excuse for letting his Royal Highness come to London ; but upon a more mature consideration of all its consequences, and the bitter animosities against him, it was thought neither safe for his person, nor practicable in itself, so they chose rather to remove it by certiorari

LETTERS
 Vol. I. p. 191.

to the King's bench, and if it could not otherwise be eluded, to stop it by a Noli prosequi, which was not doubted but the King would grant (if necessary) in the end.

T O M E
II.

1681.

Preparations against the meeting of y^e Parliament.
LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 184.

The time now drawing near for the Parliament's meeting at Oxford, the preparations which were made on all sides, looked, as if the debates were to be managed rather by force, than argument; for which reason the King took care, not only to be accompanyd with a good number of his Guards, but had order'd the greatest part of My Lord of Oxford's regiment, to be quarter'd on the road, to secure his return, and left a good body of men to be an awe upon the Citie in his absence: His Majesty was only perplexed about Coll: Russel whose fidelitie he doubted, and therefore had proposed to My Lord Thanet to buy his regiment, which he at first agreed too, but after declin'd on pretence, that the King's not going on with the reforme at Court as had been projected, was a desincouragement for honest men to venture; the Duke would have recommended the Earle of Mulgrave, but the King was preposses'd against him, so was forced to respite that matter for the present; but leaveing the chief command with my Lord Craven, he hoped there could be no great danger in his absence, he writ to all the Lords not to fail being there, in whose Loyalty he had more confidence than in the Commons, after which he went to Windsør, and on the 14^h of March arrived together with the Queen at Oxford.

Ibid. p. 171.

Ibid. p. 175.

There had been great endeavours used to diswade the King from chusing this place for the Sessions, My Lord Essex and several other Lords had presented a petition against it, alledging they could neither be so commodious, nor safe, but exposed (as they termin'd it) to the swords of the Papists, and their adherents; which thō it was no argument to the King to change his measures, who knew very well whose swords it was that threaten'd him, however the factious partie (which in this new Election was more numerous than ever) for a pretence,

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 108.

T O M E

II.

1681.

at least to come thither very well armed, and much better attended than was usual on such occasions ; and that no industry might be wanting to rais a ferment in the people and support the hatred against the Duke, they had sprung up a new Plot against the meeting of the Parliament, of which Sir William Waller (a most active and fiery Partizan of the faction) had been the informer himself.

FitzharrisPlot.

LETTERS

Vol: 2. p. 196.

He told the King that one Fitzharris an Irish man had fram'd a malicious libel to alianate the peoples afections from him, to which he had been encouraged by the French Ambassador, but that he himself being acquainted with one Everard who pretend to helpe Fitzharris, was brought privately by him into his chamber, whereby he made this discovery : Upon this Fitzharris was committed, and a few days after Sheriff Cornish came up to acquaint the King, that Fitzharris denyd what he was accused of, but Sayd if he might have a pardon, he knew a Plot of a much higher nature than any yet mention ; upon which the two Secretaries were sent to examin him, to whom he deposed That Mons^r Montecucully before he went out of England, had offer'd him ten thousand pound to kill the King, but refuseing to undertake it, he urged him to it, saying, It might easily be done at Mad^m Mazarine's by poison, when his Majesty eat there ; he sayd the Duke of York was privy to this designe, and that assoon as the work was done, an Armie was to come from France and Flanders to support his Royal Highness ; that a great many Parliament men were to be boil'd to death to make a Saint Ampoul to anoint him and the succeeding Kings of England at their Coronation, and that mony was rais in Italy by the Dutchess of Modena's means for the carrying on this design, she being privy to it likewise.

The King was soon aware what was aim'd at, by this foolish storie, and thō he resolved, if possible, to disapoint them, yet he perceiv'd that neither the gross improbabilitys of such incoherent stuff, was sufficient to dampe the credit of it, nor his purpose of not granting a pardon sufficient security against its being extorted from him, if great care was not taken to prevent it; he foresaw that upon his denial, the Parliament would press for the pardon, and so by the cry and terrour of a new Plot carryd on by the Duke not only against the life of the King, but the Parliament men too, they might more easily drive on their beloved Bill of Exclusion, which the late Elections in the Citie shew'd they were more earnestly set upon than ever, haveing thanked their Members for haveing press'd that Bill in the late Parliament and besought them never to give a penny of mony, till that, and other Laws were pass'd for securing them from Popery and arbitrary power.

BAKER 781.

But the King was resolved to cross bite them if possible, and therefore order'd a Commission of Oyer and Terminer to try Fitzharris forthwith for his Libel, there being three witnesses to prove it, for S^r William Waller had already given evidence, together with Everard and one Smith who concurr'd with them in all particulars, the only difficulty was the want of time to execute this commission before the Parliament met, whose importunity it would be hard to resist; but the King left that to Providence, and before he quitted the Towne order'd the prosecution to be follow'd with all imaginable expedition; but thō the King's caution and foresight was good as to the main, yet it was the Duke's misfortune to ly so open on all hands, that every assault or random shot took place still on one side or other: His Royal Highness had long press'd the King for a pardon, imagining it would shelter him from some of the Parliamentary proceedings, and now that the King was on the point of granting it, his friends thought better to wave it upon this foolish storie, rather than give the malicious world occasion to say, He had more than ordinary need of such a security by

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 199.Ibid. p. 203.

TOME reason of this pretended discovery : It pleas'd God likewise to
II. send him and the Dutchess an other sencible trouble at this 1681. time by the death of the Lady Isabella their youngest Daughter at London, which was the more afflicting because they had not the satisfaction of seeing and assisting her in her sickness ; but those hardshipps were unavoidable sequels of the uneasy banishment and cruel persecution, they were both so unjustly condemn'd too.

The factious Partie tempt the King with mony.

LETTERS
 Vol. 2. p. 208.

Before the King left London the factious partie had tempted him with mony too, and had offer'd him Sixty thousand pound upon condition he would pass the Bill, but thō the King's necessities were great, they did not overballance his honour and true intrest ; so finding they could not compass their aim by composition were resolved to carry it, if possible, by high hand in Parliament, and certainly never any Assembly of that nature met with wors dispositions against the King, or more fury against the Duke, breathing nothing but his ruin and destruction, which struck such a terrour into many who had hithertoo Stood by him, that they fell off a pace: My Lord Halifax indeed still was against the Bill, but proposed expedients fully as pernicious ; in fine most people thought they should come off at an easy rate, if they could make their peace with the Parliament at the expence of his Royal Highness' birth right, which now began to be made litle account of by men of greatest credit ; so he waits with impatience the event of this meeting from which so much harme was to be feared, and so litle good to be hoped for or expected.

The Parliament meets at Oxford.

On the 21th of March the King open'd the Sessions by a Speech, where in he tould them in reference to the Duke, That the just care they were to have of Religion, ought not to be improved into such unnessary fears, as to be made a pretence for changing fundamentalls of the Government ; that he hoped the example of the ill success of former heates would dispose them to a better temper, and that they would not lay so much weight upon any one expedient against Popery, as to count all others infectual, that he could not depart from what he had so often declared about the Succession; but to remove all reasonable fears from a Popish Successor, if means could be found out, that in such a case the administration of the government might remain in Protestant hands, he should be ready to hearken to any such expedient, by which the Religion might be preserved, and the Monarchy not destroyed.

T O M E

II.

1681.

When the Duke heard of this last clause he gave all for lost, unless the reasty temper of his enemies, who loved no ways but those of their owne invention, should hinder their acceptance of that which would have fetter'd and degraded him as much as the Bill of Exclusion it self; but, it seems, they were not so stubborn as was expected, and by consequence the Duke had fallen a sacrifice to their malice, had not Providence thrown another bone of dissention amongst them, which was no ways foreseen or expected: The first motion indeed was for bringing in the Bill of Exclusion, but M^r Birch, M^r Hampden, and many others of the most violent and cunning Members opposed it, saying, The King had made an offer of agreeing to any other expedient, and that they thought it but reasonable to harken at least to such an invitation; the King on the other side who thirsted after this accommodation, had consulted before hand with his friends, whether he should expect the Parliament's offering particular expedients, or do it first himself, and thō the latter was sure to ambarrass and entangle him much more than the other, (for he would ever be held fast to what he had offer'd, whether they accepted of it as full satisfaction or no) however to foreward the matter, it was resolved the King's Servants in the House should begin the debate by proposeing other means, to see if they could divide the Members by it, and wean them at least from their fondness of the Bill.

Expedients proposed as bad as the Bill.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 213.

T O M E

II.

1681.
The house disappointed about Fitzharris.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 214.

This method would have proved as pernicious to the government as fatal to the Duke, had not those implacable spirits by grasping at too much, lost the hold they had already got; they were resolved it seems to wrest Fitzharris out of the King's hands, and those of justice too which was ready to pass upon him, in order to mould him to their own shape and designs, he proving a thorough paced evidence to their purpose; for besides the crimes he had already charged upon the Duke, he had brought the Queen again into the pretended Plot of poisoning the King, which he said Don Francisco de Melo had assured him of: Now the readiest way to bring their ends about, was in the first place to impeach him themselves and by that means put a stop to all other prosecutions, and prevent his conviction and punishment for the Libel.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 224.

This therefore was done out of hand, and the Bill of impeachment sent up to the Lords; but the King as watchful as they, in a thing on which so much depended, had used all imaginable arguments to induce the Lords to reject the Impeachment and leave him to the Law, which had its success, and they did accordingly when the Bill of Impeachment came up to them: This put the House of Commons into such a fury that casting off all former thoughts of moderation or agreement, they refused with indignation and contempt all offers of expedients, and order'd the bringing in the Bill of Exclusion immediately, voting at the same time, That it was the undoubted right of the Commons to impeach either Peer or Commoner, and that the Lords not receiving it, was a manifest breach of government, and that whatever Court or Judge should try Fitzharris, should be proceeded against as an enemy to the King and Country.

Ibid: p. 227.

This was on Saturday night, and on Monday morning as soon as they met, the Bill of Exclusion was read a first time and order'd a second reading, when the King sent up for them to the House of Lords, and there, to their great surprise, appeared in his robes, thō the Lords (not knowing any thing of it neither, were not in theirs.) He tould them he perceived such heats and animosities ariseing betwixt the two Houses, that he saw no speedyer way of apeasing them, than by dissolveing the Parliament, which he directed the Chancellor to doe, and haveing before hand order'd relays on the road, took coach immediately and arrived that night at Windsor.

T O M E
II.

1681.

The King dissolves the Parliament
at Oxford.

This unexpected vigor in the King struck them like thunder with confusion and amazement, and gain'd his Majesty exceeding great reputation, his friends now began to take courage again, and those turbulent and fiery men were left in the last degree of rage and despair, not only vext at their disapointment, but asham'd after so much undutifull behaveour to be thus exposed and baffled; for they saw there was no more hopes of a Parliament in hast, without which, all their well laid projects were like to vanish into smoke.

The King was resolved to be the first that should informe the Duke of this agreeable news, so sends an express with it, telling him, He found it necessary to be very quick with them, it apearing from their votes and carriage that nothing but violence could be expected from such men: The Duke was overjoyd at it, not only because the King was at last come to those methods of resolution and vigor he had so long press't him too, but to see an end of that expedient which was as terrible to him as the Bill of Exclusion it self. The King indeed liked it as litle as he, but was overpower'd by the advice of others, and thought it necessary to justify himself in the opinion of many who concurr'd with the factious partie, not that they really were so themselves, but out of a pannick fear for Religion, which they fancyd in mighty danger; besides the King foresaw it would give a good colour to the Declaration which he design'd to publish for the Kingdom's satisfaction,

KING CH:
LETTERS
pag: 99.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 245.

T O M E

II.

1681.

However the King still deny's to let the Duke return.

KING CH:
LETTERS
pag. 100.

LETTERS
VOL: 2. p. 26.

That it was not either his want of care for Religion or the people's quiet, but the turbulent temper and rebellious practices of ill men, that forced him to this sudden resolution.

But as it was his Royal Highness's destiny that those few comforts he had, should never be without some bitter ingredient ; so now that he thought all obstacles and arguments removed which could hinder his return, and that his greatest enemies could not imagin a reasonable pretence to retard it, nevertheless the King tells him, he must have patience for that, till he saw further how matters were like to go, and that it might not seem as if this sudden dissolution had been only made for his convenience and to clear the way for his return to Court : This was a mighty check to his satisfaction as well as expectation ; for if such wide and general reasons could serve the turn, they would never be wanting he knew, and the same pretext would subsist without end, which gave him a more heartless prospect of his affairs than any thing that yet had happen'd, he found it extream hard he should still be the main sufferer in all ill conjunctures, and receive no benifit by the good ; however his friends advised him to submitt, they tould him, that till the reformes were over which the King was resolved on, both in the Leiftenancy of the City, Justices of Peace, and Militia of the whole Kingdom, the Duke's presence would give some obloquy as if it were done by his instigation ; so he was forced to smother his resentment for the present both in his letters to England and his discours in Scotland, and especially in his thanks to the King for his steddyness in sticking to him, taking all to himself, without hinting at the necessity of his Majestys doing what he did even for his own preservation ; nor did he so much as mention the apprehention he was in, by the offer of the expedient, hoping by that method to gain much more upon his Majestys good nature, who liked well to have his favours relished ; and indeed nothing was more uneasy to him, than to be pressed with too much violence, even to things never so reasonable in themselves; which made some people fancy the King might be the less inclined to the Duke's return upon that account, who by driving him on formerly, beyond his natural pace, had render'd his Councills (thō aproved of in the King's judgment) uneasy to his temper.

Assoon as the factious partie had recover'd their spirits a little, the Duke found that thō their measures were broke by this unexpected blow, yet their malice was not deminished, and therefore they neglect'd none of those methods they were yet masters of to prosecute and molest him; the time was now come for removeing his late presentment by certiorari to the King's Bench, where they found means contrary to custome and the constant practice of the Courts of Justice, to rais arguments against granting it, by one Smith a Lawier employed by D^r Oates: This was such a surprise upon the Duke's Council, who were no ways prepar'd to answer reasons they had no notion of, and in oposition to a thing that had never yet been disputed, that the Duke had certainly been convict of recusancy by this trick, had they not prevail'd with the Court to make an adjournment, which gave the Duke's Council time to frame answers to the objections, and they proveing satisfactory, the certiorari was at last obtain'd; but it hinder'd nót the ashtonishment the world was in, to see the impudence his enemies were arived too, when so infamous a fellow as Oates, durst hould up his head against the King's Brother, and pretend to have him denyd a common benefit in the Law, which the meanest Subject in the Kingdom had never yet been refused.

But notwithstanding that these angry and artefull men put the best countenance they could upon their late disadvantage, their credit nevertheless declined so visibly that the Duke of Monmouth himself began to waver, finding his projects faded

TOME
II.

1681.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. P. 315.

The Duke had like to have been convicted.

Ibid. p. 264.

New obstacles to the Duke's return.
LETTERS
VOL. 2. P. 104.

T O M E
II.

1681.

Ibid: p. 321.

Ibid: p. 366.

Ibid: p. 272.

Ibid: p. 271.

a little in their hands; they had given him vast hopes while they promised themselves the spoiles of the government, but were now brought too low to make other peoples fortunes; this made him think of courting an other intrest and try again if by a fawning cariage, and pretence of reclaiming he could regain the intrest he had lost with the King: At the first overture of this matter the Duke's friends had credit enough to put a check to it, but the Dutchess of Portsmouth coming into his intrest and the King's natural affection running before, it was hugely fear'd the Prodigal Child would be brought home again, before he left eating huskes, or even the Company of the Swine, the only obstacle was the manifest hardship of keeping the Duke in banishment, were he admitted to Court; and that being still resolved against, was the main impediment to the other, which was the only advantage his Royal Highness drew from his misfortunes; for thō the daily benefit which accrued to the government by the late vigorous proceedings began to remove the objections hitherto insisted upon against the Duke's return, yet others sprung up in their room as his Royal Highness well foresaw; the common topick hitherto for keeping him away, had been, the boisterousness of the weather and the unsettledness of the times: but now it was urged, that things being much quieted, should he return, it would disturb the calm, so that what way soever the wind blew it was still in his face.

However some of the Duke's friends advised him to temporise stil, and submit to these reasons, others were for his pressing the King in this matter, which puzzled him the more because his inclination as well as reason prompted him to the latter; but the King's tenderness in that point (least by being urged too hard he might throw up all) made the other more prudent: at last they proposed this, That his Highness should beg leave for the Dutchess to come to the Bath or Tunbridg for her health, which had been much impaired by liveing in a Country so contrary to that she was born in, and that for himself he would be well contented to live at Audley end, or any other seat his Majesty should apoint, so that he might have the satisfaction of seeing him now and then, and even at those times would not pretend to meddle the least in any publick business : They counsel'd him likewise to express an entire resignation of his own intrest to his Majestys pleasure and quiet, and that if he did not think fit to grant him that, he was ready to submit to any termes yet more uneasy, if his Majestys occasions required it ; for nothing they sayd would more conduce to obtain leave for his being nearer the King, than shewing a willingness to go further off if necessary ; he was desired to send M^r Churchill with his letter, and at the same time to write to all the persons in credit with the King, assuring them of his being resolved to be entirely guided by their Councils.

T O M E

II.

1681.

Ibid: p. 304.

These persons were the Chancellor and President, My Lord Halifax, the two Secretaries, M^r Seymour, and Lord Hide, (the King haveing lately given him the patent of a Viscount). Tis certain the greatest part of these persons had a dread of the Duke's return, fearing his presence would make ciphers of them all, the two first were so bent against it, that they pretended withdrawing from business upon a rumour of his being recall'd ; My Lord Halifax was no less an enemy to it, and M^r Seymour alledged that things were not yet so well composed, as that should he come, he would be secure not to be sent away again, that it was necessary the King should be fixed and settled in a habit of going on resolutely in good measures, that the Sheriffs of London were now to be elected, that Fitzharris his tryal was not yet over, on the success of which much would depend ; so that he could not be of opinion, he sayd, it was proper for the Duke to press a return till winter, and even then he could not answer for any but himself : This being

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 296.Ibid. p. 295.

TOME II. his opinion, and by consequence My Lord Conway's too 1681. (who was always guided by him) there remain'd only My Lord Hide and Secretary Jenkins who really wished his Highness at Court again, who were much too weak a partie for the rest ; especially considering the jealousy that now was got amongst them, That My Lord Hide stood fair to be Treasurer and that then under the Duke's direction, and protection (were he Ibid: p. 299. present) he would run away with his Majestys favour, and business, from them all, and extinguish their credit and usefullness about the King ; by which means that Lord's avowed duty to the Duke, was likely to bring a prejudice to his service.

LETTERS
VOL: 2. p. 302.

This advice was heard (hard) to be digested, because the Duke was of opinion that if he were not speedely recal'd he never should, and that if he could not return with all the credit and intrest too which he ought to have in the King's business, he had rather stay where he was ; the only reason against that, was, that if once he was admitted to Court again, many things could not be done without his privity and advice, and insensibly that restriction would fall away of it self ; but infine without weighing consequences he was forced to submit, for the King himself being positue in the matter, tould him, He was fully perswaded their enemies wished for nothing more than such a handle as his return to create new troubles, which now by steddiness and patience he hoped to master at last, and thō he confess'd the Duke had great need of that vertue, he assured him his absence exercised it no less in himself, and that nothing but the consideration of both their goods, could make him endure the thoughts of that seperation any longer.

KING CH.
LETT. 104.

These kind expressions sweeten'd a little the harsh usage they carryd along with them, but could not hinder the Duke from lamenting his condition ; for when he weighed the present situation of affairs on one hand, the disposition of the Ministers, the King's orders, and the advice now given him on the other, he was fully perswaded the King himself began to be jealous of him ; otherwise his friends, he fancyd, would never have counsel'd him to refrain from business, which must of necessity be fatal to both, as being so necessary to their mutual support : besides (says he) if notwiths the entire submission and resignation I have always for the King's commands, he can be so far imposed upon, as to entretain such a suspicion, what may he not be brought too in a little time more? Had I affected popularity or consider'd only my own well-being in the world, I had not trodden the paths which I now am so intangled in, I could without doing any thing but what his Majesty himself press'd me too, have been above the malice of those false and mean spirited men, who now seek my ruin ; but I thank my God I have ever had a horror of those base methods of obtaining my ends, and hope I shall still continue to make my duty to God and the King, the only rule of my actions. " T O M E

II.
1681.
KING JA. Mth.
To. 9. p. 141.

But that was not the case, the King was far from being jealous, for besides that the Duke had never given the least occasion for such a mistrust, it was not in the King's temper to be so, it was the Ministers that suspected the Duke would never concur in their measures, and yet be too powerfull for them to contest with ; and therefore it was hoped, that this compliyant cariage, and his Royal Highness's declining publick business, seconded by so reasonable a pretext as the Dutchesse's health, would worke upon his Majestys good nature too powerfully to be obstructed by any favorit : Wherefore the Duke dispatches M^r Churchill immediately, with letters and Instructions pursuant to the method and advice of his friends, assuring his Majesty, that if he pleased to grant him the Satisfaction of waiting upon him, and that he may not be the only Subject who after haveing had so great a share in his troubles should " M^r Churchill sent to Court to beg leave for the Dutchesse to go to the Bath.
KING JA: Mth.
To. 9: p. 143.

KING JA: Mth.
To. 9. p. 149.

T O M E “ be debar’d tasting the sweet of that quiet his Majesty now II. “ enjoy’d, he would not only refrain meddling or speaking to his 1681. “ Majesty, or his Ministers, of any business relating to England, “ but even as to Scotland too, if his Majesty desired it, so soon “ as he had given him a relation what condition that Kingdom “ was in, notwithstanding that he might see his affairs had “ not suffer’d or worsen’d there by his acting hitherto in them;
 “ and that the generality of the Nobility and Gentry were “ extream desirous he should continue the direction of them,
 “ by which they knew they would escape such hard usage
 “ as they had experienced formerly, from many of their own “ Country men.

It was natural to believe that by removeing in this manner what was conceiv’d to be both the King’s and Minister’s main apprehension, other difficulties would have fallen of themselves ; but thō the King heard M^r Churchill with patience, and express’d all imaginable tenderness for the Duke, he tould him nevertheless he could do nothing in it without adviseing with those he trusted, and thō no solid reason could be brought against it, only general apprehensions, however M^r Churchill acquaints his Royal Highness, he found both from his Majesty and those of his Council who were then at Court, there was very little hopes of success ; it could not be beaten out of their heads, but that the Duke’s coming would endanger a rebellion, and My Lord Sunderland had left behind him a dangerous impression, that it was what the Duke wished, as being desirous to come to a tryall of skill with his enemies in the King’s life time, by whose assistance he might better hope to master them then when he should be left to himself ; which thō the wildest and the worst grounded imagination in the world, was improved by cunning men to work upon the King’s excessive love of eas, so as to make him apprehend danger even where his own judgment tould him there was none: The King indeed

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 350.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 366.

confess'd his inclination was at strife with his reason on this occasion, which together with My Lord Halifax's absence in the Country (whose advice the King waited for) gave My Lord Hide leasure to create what friends he could, and if possible to gain the Dutchess of Portsmouth, to whom the Duke had order'd him to make some little court of late ; for thō he was perswaded honorable ways were the best, and that no great confidence could be expected betwixt him and her, however he hoped by that means, to keep her from obstructing so reasonable a thing, and by force of civilitie put a necessity upon her of being so at last to him : In order to this, a contrivance was made for M^r Churchill to wait upon the King to her lodgings, and My Lord Feversham had engaged to prepare her before hand to discours him about it, but when he came thither, she never took the least notice of him, but on the contrary when the King with the Queen (went) soon after to Sheerness and Chatam, she went to Altrop to give her dear friend My Lord Sunderland a visit, and at her return from thence had her private meetings with the Duke of Monmouth, My Lord Shaftsbury, and that gang ; which considering her great intrest with the King was astonishing to all the world and a scurvy omen to the Duke's affairs in general ; the least that could be apprehended from it, was, that if the Duke's return was allow'd of, the Duke of Monmouth's must go hand in hand with it, the King having gone a good way towards a reconciliation with him already, and thō it was a great degrading of his Royal Highness to be ranked thus upon equal termes with the Duke of Monmouth in this Controversie, yet if it had come to that, the Duke was disposed to overlook this humiliation with the rest, and fight with any armes rather than be worsted ; but when My Lord Halifax came up, he, My Lord Hide, and M^r Seymour soon brought the King off from that panty at least.

T O M E
II.

1681.
Ibid. p. 327.

Ibid. p. 284.

Ibid. p. 404.

Ibid. p. 401.

T O M E

II.

1681.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 408.

It was with those three persons the King debated this affair, against which the main objection was a pretended necessitie of trying first what a Parliament would do; but the King was soon convinced that nothing was more improper than the thoughts of a Parliament's meeting at all, nevertheless they agreed the King's affairs would not yet bear the Duke's return, but that when it did, it must be without the restriction of not meddling with business: because it would be necessary (they sayd) he should lay his shoulder to the burthen, and helpe to support the King in the measures he was now upon, and countenance those who were imployd, and particularly themselves who advised his return; so that thō a delay was at last resolved on, it was accompanyd however with some mollefyng circumstances, which made it the less distastfull to him, and finding the Ministers were come off their mighty apprehension of his meddling in business, hoped they might change in other points likewise.

The Duke
being denyd to return, the Princess Anne goes for Scotland.
LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 475.

It was always his Royal Highnesse's principle to contend for what he thought just and reasonable, as far as decency and respect to the King would allow of; but when once a determination was made, he not only receiv'd all sort of denyalls and disapointments with submission, but without the least complaint of his hard usage to the King, or seeming distrust of his Ministers; so he writ to them all to shew he was well satisfyd with their conduct, hoping by that means also to take away that apprehension of his partialitie to My Lord Hide, which had slacken'd on occasions their Zeal for his Service; and now he settled himself entirely to the business of Scotland: Princess Anne likewise came to him, whose journey had hithertoo hung upon uncertainties, for even while there was still some hopes of the Duke's being allowed to come to Court, it was thought nevertheless very proper not to contermend the Princesse's going to Scotland (which the Duke had desired and the King consented too) that it might be a blind upon his return, and hinder any disturbance upon the peoples immagining it, which was stil aprehended would be a necessary consequence ; but that being now at an end, she went a broad a yaught the begining of July and arrived safe at Edinburg soon after.

Ibid. p. 414.

T O M E
II.

1681.

Ibid. p. 511.

Besides what has been mention'd of M^r Churchill's commission, the Duke (immediately after he was sent) writ to desire another favour of the King, which was the easalyer granted that he might not seem to deny him every thing: His Royal Highness it seems had been advised by many of the chief " men in Scotland, that it would (be) both for the King's " Service and his advantage, that a Parliament were call'd in " that Kingdom ; the Duke sends their reasons to the King, " and withall proposes himself to be his Commissioner, not " thinking it fitting either for the King's Service, or the dignity " of his own person, that any body els should represent his " Majesty, if he were then on the place ; but least it might be " used as a pretext for keeping him there, he gave orders that " this matter should not be open'd to his Majesty unless the " other was denyd ; when therefore it was proposed the King " gave more readily into it, to soften in some measures the " harsh treatment his Royal Highness had received in all the " rest.

The Duke
disire a Parliament may be call'd in Scotland.

Ibid. p. 433.

KING J. A. M^o
To. 8. p. 273.

It was not doubted but the Loyal disposition of the greatest part of the nobilitie and Gentry, together with the Duke's presence and winning behaviour, which had gain'd such an influence over that Kingdom, would make a Parliament not only contribute to the quiet and advantage of Scotland, but by running counter to that of England, be a check and bar to such violent proceedings as hithertoo distracted that Nation ; " the only aprehension was of My Lord Lauderdale's being " influenced by his Lady to oppose it, for fear least a Parliament "

TOME “ should look a little too narrowly into certain methods she II. “ had lately found out of geting mony for herself.

1681.

“ The designe of it therefore was no sooner made publick, “ but the factious partie there (who foresaw the consequence) in “ conformetie with their breethren in England used all manner “ of endeavours to obstruct what ever should be offer’d for the “ King’s service, and particularly the Duke’s being his “ Commissioner ; they pretended that the Statute made in the “ first parliament of King James the 6th, admitted of none to bear “ any office that did not conforme to the established Religion ;
 “ this was proposed to the Duke of Hamilton, which, thō he “ rejected it, as it deserved (the Act not extending to a “ Commissioner) however he was a little stubborn when the “ Duke first spoke to him ; and thō his Highness offer’d to have “ him readmitted into the Council, out of which he had been “ put by My Lord Lauderdale’s means, he declin’d it at first, “ till within a day or two being better advised he came to an “ esayer temper. But these objections and difficulties made no impression upon his Majesty, so he order’d My Lord Murray, Secretary for that Kingdom, to dispatch away his proclamation and letter to the Council of Scotland, nomeing the Duke his Commissioner in the Parliament which he appointed to meet on the 28th of July following.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 435.

Fitzharris tryd. The same day these dispatches went for Scotland Fitzharris was tryd, which put the King in a track of unraveling all the wicked misteries of the Cabal ; thō no industry had been wanting on their part, to ward this blow, and preserue if possible a life on which so many depended : In order to this they had contrived to have him accuse My Lord Danby and some others, of S^r Edmond Bury Godefrey’s death, and means was found to bring him (thō prisoner) to the King’s bench bar fo this end, where, upon his information, the Bil was found by

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 381.

the Grand Jurie, and My Lord Chancellor so far gave into the trap, as to move for that Lord's being tryd for it immediately ; but it appear'd so ridiculous and scandalous to question a Peer upon an information of a man who had been so oft examin'd before the Secretaries and Council, and thō stil pretending to declare all he knew, never mentioned My Lord Danby before, that at last all thoughts of it was layd aside, and those sly managers disapointed of their aim ; which was to have got his own tryal differ'd on that pretext, then by bringing on some other information have done the like again, and by that means reprived him in effect as long as they thought needfull ; which had they succeeded in, their cunning had gon beyond the power of Parlimentary votes or addresses, which had declared it a high breach of priviledg to try any person (who lay under their Impeachment) for the same crimes for which they stood impeached ; which, thō it was vehemently urged at his tryal, and the pannel, a pack of the worst men the Citie could afford, yet the plea was overruled, and he found guilty upon the information of S^r. William Waller and the other two witnesses, much against their wills ; who were thus forced to execute justice upon a wicked instrument of their own and hang a man they had accused, only to lead into a method of hanging others, and by that means have kept up the credit of the Duke's being stil in a plot, without which they saw, he would soon be in a situation aboue the reach of their malice.

This trick failing so scurvily, My Lord Shaftsbury tryd another ; he comes to the Chancellor and tould him, That there was a gentleman of good fashion who could make a further discovery of S^r. Edmond Bury Godefrey's death, if he might have a pardon ; and prevail'd with him to write to the King (who was then at Windsor) about it : but My Lord Hide and M^r. Seymour soon convinced his Majesty how scandalous it would (have) appear'd, after so many pardons, and three years

T O M E
II.

1681.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 443.

My Lord
Shaftsbury
trys another trick to keep up the Credit of the Plot.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 393.

T O M E

II.

1681.

elapsed since the thing happen'd, to give way to fresh accusations; so that this project was quashed in like manner: Nevertheless they were not yet discouraged, and since they saw there was no supporting of the credit of the Plot in England, they endeavour'd to receive it however in Ireland; in order to which one Dennis, Hethington, and Macnamara, three Irish witnesses were put upon hiring others to corroborate their testimony against the Queen, the Lord of Ormonde and Lord Chancellor of that Kingdom; but their practices being discover'd, and they clapt up upon an action of subordination, this contrivance was stifled in its infancy too; so that now the strugglings of the partie were like those of a man in his agonie, which are rather simptoms of aproaching death, than helps to recover life and strength again.

The Dutchess of Ports-mouth's practices layd open by Fitzharris's trayall.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 430.

Ibid. p. 444.

Amongst other advantages which the Court gain'd by thus countermining the Plots of the faction, especially in Fitzharris's tryal (which made both sides put such stress upon it) was the bringing many hidden things to light which otherwise would probably never have been discover'd: Fitzharris it seems at his tryal had subpena'd the Dutchess of Portsmouth, M^{rs} Wall, and My Lord Howard of Escrek, to prove he had been imployd by her Grace to bring eminent persons over (to) the King's intrest, thinking to make a merit of haveing been so serviceable to the Court, and that My Lord Howard had had a conference with her accordingly; so when that Lord gave in his testimony, he sayd, Their conversation would (was) chiefly upon endeavouring to procure a good understanding betwixt the King and his Parliament, and that the Dutchess of Portsmouth's intentions were very good in that matter, and used her endeavours to take off his Majesty from adhereing so fast to the Duke: so now his Royal Highness saw, what a special friend she had been to him all along, and how extraordinary a providence it was, that a person who had so great a credit with the King (considering how hard other matters press'd upon him) had not prevail'd with him to abandon his Brother long before; but the Duke was forced to overlook all this, that he might give no ombrage to the King of being like to live uneasily with her, who now seeing the wind came about, and her other friends failing her, began to wheedle with the Duke not only receiv'd with all markes of kindness but return'd his too by the same hand; and considering how necessary this compliance was to give the Duke's friends a greater credit not only with her, but the King too, the Duke and Dutchess writ to her also, but had no mind indeed their letters should be deliver'd unless it were thought absolutely necessary; so M^r Churchill's verbal compliment doing the work, they were burnt as had been directed.

TOME
II.

1681.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 478.

Ibid: p. 531.

But this was not all the misteries which Fitzharris' tryal discover'd, it seems My Lord Howard had other dealing with him than he thought fit to mention; for he was no sooner found guilty, but Fitzharris's wife and maid came and accused that Lord himself to have had the greatest share in composing that Libel for which her husband was condemn'd, and that most of it was writ in his own hand; upon which his Lordship was seized and sent to the Tower, and immediately after Fitzharris was executed: But that the pretended Popish Plot might not seem to dy with him (the King being desirous to trim a little) Bishop Plunket the Catholick Primat of Ireland haveing been most falsely acused and condemn'd as guilty of that pretended conspiracy, was executed the same day, which those who wished the King well were very sorry had been so hastily done; for besides that his last speech convinced all men of his innocency, My Lord Shaftsbury the very next day was committed to the Tower upon the information of Six Irish witnesses, five of which were Protestants; which did so plainly manifest the real vilanie that had been cover'd under this

Lord Howard of Escrick sent to the Tower.

Bishop Plunket executed.
LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 491.

T O M E
II.

1681.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 492.

The Earle of Shaftsbury committed to the Tower.

pretended Popish Plot, and particularly the wicked combination to take way that holy Bishop's life, that My Lord Clarendon sayd, All honest men trembled when they reflected how much innocent blood had been spilt upon it.

Ibid. p. 506.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 495.

Ibid. p. 505.

The commitment of this Lord produced a mighty change in peoples judgments and affections, and was exceeding usefull to the Duke's friends, and to convince the world how unjustly he had suffer'd under the long persecution of such wicked and treacherous contrivances : So that this great Patriot instead of being rescued as he hoped to have been by the Citie, was houted at for a traitor, as he went through it to the Tower, which shew'd how willing the people were to be of the King's side, if endeavours had been used to make them so ; and thō at his first apearance at Council several Lords there seem'd more afraid of him, than he of his accusations, yet when the warrant was sign'd for his commitment, he sunk on a sudden with apreheension, and look'd as dejected then, as he had done impudently before.

SIR ROBERT L'ESTRANG HIST: TIMES.
123.

Tis fitting this age should be acquainted with the Character of a man, that had so great a hand in the confusions of the last, and had been so industrious a prosecutor of all those wicked contrivances against His Royal Highness : We are tould therefore by one who knew him well, that in all revolutions from his first apearance in the world, he had the cunning to keep the wind on his back and to swim continually with the tide, so that in all changes from the year fourthy to sixty, he came sailing down before it ; he had a ready tongue and a great adress in business, without those barrs of honour, shame and conscience, which are so obstructive to ambitious designs ; while matters went successfully with him his good humour kept pace with his good fortune, never any man run higher in commendation of the King, nor stood up more for the Prerogative than himself while he was Chancellor, but when the wind came about to the popular partie, he turn'd tail to the government, and proved the most envenomed enemie the King and Duke ever had ; as to his last change some thing might be sayd for his excuse, that he deserted not the King til his Majesty deserted himself by recaling the declaration for Libertie of conscience ; so that finding he could not be supported at Whitehall, he was resolved to seek it at Westminster ; he had rather a subtil wit than a solid judgment, and was better at pulling down than building up, never any incendiary had a quicker invention and a more protesting face, without faith or truth, with which he imposed upon mankind, as appear'd by his perswading the Kingdom into two contradictions in the space of a year : for in his speech when he was Chancellor, he convinced the world that the State was never in a happier Situation (because in reality he was so himself) that there was no danger from Popery nor any thing els, and before the year's end without any visible change (except in his own condition) he made the Kingdom believe their was no liveing for fear of it.

But thō his heart fail'd him (as was sayd) a little at the first upon his commitment, he had still his witts about him ; and by demanding the benefit of his Habeas Corpus before the Attorney Generall was aware of it, both he and My Lord Howard had like to have got out ; but they prevented that, and found means to hould them fast for a while, thō at last he slipt through their fingers by a stratagem, which gravel'd the Court more than any thing that had happen'd during the whole course of these troubles.

When the news of Shaftsbury's being sent to the Tower came to Edinburg, the Duke was no less pleas'd to see the King at last pursue those methods heartely which were on'y capable of relieving him, than to see so evenomed an enemie humbled, and his villanies detected : He begg'd therefore of "

T O M E

II.

1681.

KING JA. Mth
To. 8. p. 281.

TOME “ his Ma^{ty} to follow the blow now that they were stunn’d, as II. “ the only way to master a faction which by long experience

 1681. “ he had found was never to be gain’d by concessions nor “ indulgence, that the hand of God was visibly in it not only “ in bringing their villanies to light, but by turning their own “ malicious designes upon themselves, and had cast them into “ the pit they had dug for others, that it was a good prelude “ to the Parliament of Scotland, and gave good grounds to “ hope in that Kingdom likewise the Partic would be so “ discouraged as not to attempt any thing which might hinder
 “ the happy issue of that Sessions.

The P^{er} of Orange comes for England.

LETTERS
 VOL. 2. p. 322.

KING JA. Mth
 To. 8. p. 288.

LETTERS
 VOL. 2. p. 541.

But the Duke had scarce leasure to reflect upon this advantage, before news was brought him of the Prince of Orange’s desire to make the King a visite, which he press’d with so much earnestness and hast (on pretence of being obliged to be back on such a time) that the King was under a necessity either of denying him (which he could not in civility doe) or permitting him to come before he was prepar’d to weigh well the consequences of it, or have the Duke’s therein; who dreaded the effects of that interview, and fail’d not to advertice his Majesty of several visible objections against his comeing; as “ that it would give great heart and a new life to the factious “ partie at this critical time, when the King had them in a “ manner under his feet, that it would create great jealousie at “ the court of France, which would be of the worst consequence “ in the present circomstances, but above all it was manifest
 “ his business could beno other, than to worke the (King) to an “ agreement with his Parliament, which would lead him back “ into the Laberinth he had now found the only way out of,
 “ and quite blast the Duke’s expectations of even seeing an “ end of his miseries: but leave being given before these reasons could be writ, much less consider’d, the Prince of Orange made great hast over and arrived the 24th of July at Windsor ; he carryd fair at first, but it soon appear'd his aims were such as gave all imaginable reasons of jealousie to his Royal Highness, for thō his pretence was only succours for Flanders and Holland, yet it was easily understood, that succours could not be obtain'd but by a Parliament, and to be sure the Duke would be sacrificed as a preliminary, before one penny could be hoped for.

T O M E

II.

1681.

When therefore he press'd for a Parliament, the King asked him, Whether in case it should propose again the Bill of Exclusion, he would advise him to pass it? He abhor'd it: Ibid. p. 542. Then, says the King, but if they proposed a Limitation? he answered, The Crowne could not be tyd: Put (the) case, says his Majesty, they insist upon having such Officers in all employments as they can confide in, and so take the Militia, Navy, Sea Portes, Judges &c, out of my power! He replyd, he disclaim'd it, Why then, sayd the King, it being manifest that the Parliament has, and consequently will insist upon these things, and that if notwithstanding all this, a Parliament be necessary; it behoues you to offer some measures to accommodate these contradictions; to which he desired time to consider, and leave to speake with whom he pleas'd about it; which being given him, he immediatly return'd to London, where he was no sooner arrived, but My Lord Russell waited upon him, and the two Sherifs doing the same, invited him to diner in the Citie, which he readily accepted; and when My Lord Halifax, My Lord Hide, and M^r Seymour diswaded him from it, he replyd, He had been twice in England and had dined in the Citie both time, and knew no reason he might not doe it now; but they tould him the Citie was then in a fair correspondence, but now in a direct opposition to the King: At which he growing angry turn'd from them, and sayd, He had promis'd, and he would go; but M^r Seymour posting upon it to Windsor to acquaint the King with what had pass'd,

Ibid. p. 553.

T O M E his Majesty writ to him to come immediately thither, which he
II. durst not but comply with, thō he made no difficulty of owneing 1681. how much he was troubled to break his word with his beloved Citizens.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 560.

At his return to Windsor he renew'd his solicitations that a Parliament might be speedily call'd, that the delaying of it had never made them more tractable, and that without it his Majestys Allys abroad would be overrun: The King sayd, It would doe them no service to assemble a Parliament and brake it immediately, which he was sure he should be necessitated to doe; but promis'd (if that would satisfy him) that in case the French invaded Flanders, he would then call one, thō he was convinced they would not give him a farthing but on the conditions he had already mention'd: notwithstanding this assurance, the Prince still urged his Majesty would pleas to try them at least, for thō he believ'd they would propose the Bill of Exclusion, yet he hop'd they might be brought to consent to other expedients for security of Religion; but the King being sencible that no good could come of their meeting, and that he should loos by it all the advantage he had already got, was positue against it; upon which the Prince desired a Conference might be had at least with the Spanish and Dutch Ambassadors, which was done accordingly, and their request and reasons fully answer'd, which put an end to this negociation.

The P^{er} of Orangereturns disatisfyd.

It was visible enough from all these proceedings, that thō perhaps the concern the Prince was in for Flanders and Holland, might be one motiue of his comeing, yet it was not the chief; he was not strainger to the temper of English Parliaments, who had ever (he knew) a much greater attention to their own priviledge and encreas of power, than to support the King's honour in forreing Wars and Allyances, thō of their own adviseing; and therefore had the King by the Prince's perswasion been again intangled in that net, he saw very well the Duke must fall in the end, and the Monarchy itself be grievously plumed, ere any thing considerable could have been squees'd from them ; and thō he had so good a share in the expectancy, which the King tould him would be ill policy in him to postpone to an Elective title, yet it is probable he was too impatient to wait for his turn, and that without doubt he aim'd at that unnatural usurpation at least upon his Vncle and Father in Law, which Seaven years after he found means to accomplish ; but being disapointed for this time and finding all his artes and arguments unsuccessfull, he went away as ill satisfyd with others as others were with him ; for thō he was far from being able to answer particulars, yet he would never submit ; for as the King observed, he loved not to be convinced : however he parted fair in apearance, with many protestations of affection and deference to the King at least.

T O M E
II.

1681.

KING CH:
LETTERS
p. 112.

The Duke had seemingly a fair delivrance of the P^{ce} of Orange's journey ; but the dreggs of it which he left behind, rais'd such a ferment after he was gon, as made his Royal Highness aprehend that notwithstanding all his struggling he should fall a sacrifice in the end either to the malice of his enemies or the King's necessities. The disconted partie were at last convinced that by contending with the King they had always come by the wors, so changed their method and resolved to see what wheedling and a seeming compliance would do ; several therefore of the hottest members pretended to be so aprehensive of Flanders, that they profer'd, in case the King would call a Parliament, they would give a supply for that end, without insisting upon the Bill of Exclusion, the Limitation, or the displacing of any Minister ; this train (which was of the P^{ce} of Orange's laying) was by being so plausible, much more dangerous for his Royal Highness, than their rough and haughty way of proceeding ; it staggard'd many people of distinction, particularly My Lord Chamberlin,

The disconted Partie profer expedients which were ruinous to y^e Duke.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 574.

Ibid: p. 584.

TOME and there was great caballing about it; but those who had
II. better insight into the drift and wiles of that Partie, were not 1681.
Ibid: p. 588. to learn that if the King were once fetter'd again with a Parliament, and a War, they could lead him by more ways than one to the wilderness he had been so lately lost in, and the last errour would have been harder to remedy than the former.
 So by good fortune for the Duke, his Majesty was above the temptation, and stuck to the measures he had already taken.

The Parliament meets in Scotland.

The Parliament in Scotland was by this time assembled, where the King's letter being read, his Royal Highness made them this following Speech.

KING JA: M^r
 To: 9. 158.

“ As I have had the honour to serue his Majesty in other “ capacities, so I esteem it none of the least, to be made choise “ of as his Commissioner in this his antient Kingdom, since “ it shews to all the world as well his kindness to me, as the “ trust and confidence he has in me, by putting me not only “ in a capacity of serving him as becomes a dutyfull and loyal “ Subject, but also by giving me an oportunity of letting you “ all see the real concerne I have for the good of this Country,
 “ and my readiness to serve it and promote its intrests:

“ I doe not doubt but this will be a happy meeting, and “ give satisfaction to his Majesty and all his Loyal Subjects;
 “ which I say with the greater confidence, haveing by my long “ residence amongst you, found so great and universall a “ readiness in advanceing whatever was for his Majestys “ Service.

“ You have heard in his Majestys letter the reasons for his “ calling you together at this time, and what he does and may “ expect from this his antient Kingdom, of whose loyalty and “ affection he has so little reason to doubt.

“ He has commanded me to assure you, that he will inviolably “ mentain and protect the Protestant Religion as now established “ by Law, and the Church government by Arch Bishops and Bishops, and will take all your other concernes into his " T O M E Royal care and protection ; and seriously recommends to you " II.

 to fall upon such courses as shall be necessary for suppressing " 1681.
 those seditious and rebellious conviticles, from which proceeds " so much disorder and confusion, and all those horrid and " extravagant doctrines, which are such scandall to Christianity, " and so manifest a subversion of all publick and private intrests " in this Kingdom. "

I am also to declare to you in his name, that it is, and " always was his intention, that the Laws should have their " due cours for the security of his Subjects, their rights, and " properties, and that he will discountenance all courses " inconcistant with them, no one being more concern'd in " their due observance than himself. "

He does also expect on your part, that you will not be " short of the Loyalty of your Ancestors in aserting and " clearing his Royal prerogative, and declareing the rights of " the Crown in its natural and legal cours of descent ; and that " you will take care to provide and settle such necessary and " scasonable supplies, as the intrest and the support of his " government calls for ; and I hope also, that as the Council " has already done their part in promoting the trade of this " Kingdom, you will likewise do yours too, by endeavouring " to make it still flourish more and more. "

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN : The inclination I have " to serue and promote the intrests of this Kingdom, has been "
 the chief inducement to his Majesty to give me the oportunity " of convincing you of it ; so you may be sure I shall not fail " in any thing which conduces to that end ; and I hope you " will have the same consideration and kindness for me, as to " enable me to performe what shall be most for his Majesties " service also. "

T O M E

II.

1681.
LETTERS
Vol. 2. p. 471.

This augmentation of power, thō it was beneficial to the Duke in some kind, yet it gave a handle to many of his greatest and slyest enemies to create jealousies in the King, which thō it was a distemper his Majesty was not much subject too, however it being so naturall to Princes, it put an obligation upon his Royal Highness of being exceeding cautious, and to act in his station of Commissioner with an entire regard to the King's intrest, and not to give the least surmise he had any hidden, or by ends of his own; and indeed never any Commissioner, whose fortune might seem to depend upon the success of his management, could be more vigilant, zealous, and active in his Majestys service, which made the success answerable to both their expectations.

LETTERS
Vol. 2. p. 587.

The question about the Bourroughs was the first tryall of Skill; which being carryed for the Court, was a good omen that all other matters would go on answerable to its wish, they readily agreed to send a most loyal and dutifull adres to his Majesty, and concurr'd to what ever was proposed to them for the support of the King's prerogative, as well as what related only to the common benefit of the Nation; and to convince the world that the Duke was not so blindly zealous in his Religion, as that if ever it were in his power he would force those who would not go to Mass, to go to Smithfeild (as his enemies industriously gave it out) he not only concurr'd too, but took great pains to conquer all oppositions in passing such Acts as were for the security of the established Religion, and got an Oath or Test to be enacted, which all Officers in Church and State, or Graduates in the Vniversities, were to take for its further support, and prevail'd for the same reason to have all field conventicles suppress'd.

Ibid: p. 617.

The Parliament in Scotland declare highly

The Parliament likewise on their part were not wanting neither in markes and expressions of duty to the King, or affection and gratitude to his Royal Highness; and therefore pass'd an Act to assert the rights of Succession, where in they declared that the Crown of Scotland, as well by inherent right and nature of the Monarchy, as by the fundamentall and unalterable Laws of the Kingdom, does descend by lineal Succession according to proximity of blood, and that no difference in Religion nor Act of Parliament itself could alter or divert the said right of Succession, and lineal descent of the Crown to the nearest heire, and declared it high treason either by word or writeing to endeavour the alteration, suspension, or diversion of the Right of Succession.

The world was surprised at this testimony of the dutyfullness and Loyalty of the Kingdom of Scotland, which haveing been always looked upon as the fountain of Presbiterie, should so strenuously assert the Prerogative of the Crown, when England it self flew so furiously in its face; and therefore it was not to be express'd how wonderfully the news of these proceedings ashtonished the Duke's enemies in England: they had thought it at first impossible he should be able to serve the King there, and had fram'd a thousand lyes for that purpose as it was customary with them on such occasions; and therefore were the more dejected, when they found that the Duke had master'd all opposition which they fancyd he would have sunk under, and not only encreas'd his intrest, but augmented his reputation by his great adress and dexterity in business, whereby he had dashed all their hopes, detected their falcties, and reduced their power and credit to the last gaspe.

My lord Conway therefore and Lord Hide thought this a fit time for his Royal Highness to renew his solicitations to be recall'd to Court, not doubting but so much patience, So perfect an obedience, and so much pains in his Majesties business would receive its due reward at last; and to the end it might be the easilyer granted, his Highness was advised to

T O M E
II.

1681. in favour of the Prerogative, and the descent to the true Line.

LETTERS
VOL: 2. P. 591.

The Duke's friends renew their sollicitation for his return.

LETTERS
VOL: 2. P. 477.

T O M E
II.

1681.
Ibid: p. 572.

desire only leave to come for a few days, that he might give his Majesty an account of the transactions during the Parliament, and what was necessary for the future quiet and good of that Kingdom, and particularly about chusing a new Chancellor, with a proffer to return when ever the King pleased ; and as a greater argument of it, not to desire leave for the Dutchess to come along with him.

Considering how prosperously things had gon of late not only in Scotland but in England too, it was believ'd nothing could be objected against it: Colledge had been found guilty at Oxford, who haveing been a violent partizan of the factious tribe was accused of several crimes, but acquitted by a shamefull ignorant Jurie in the Citie of London, but being sent to Oxford where part of his vilanies had been committed, he received there a due reward for them all ; and the Court was so far in hopes to prevent the like packing of Juries in the Citie again, as that My Lord Shaftsbury might have as much justice as the Law would give him ; but fortune was as cross to the Duke as his enemies were malicious, for an accident happen'd which did not only disapoint this, but drew an other persecution upon his R. H. which was more grievous than all the rest and at a time he expected it the least.

My Lord
Halifax opposes it.
LETTERS
Vol: 2. p. 589.

Ibid. p. 592.

My lord Halifax it seems was conceiv'd to be less inclined than any of the cabinet Council to the Duke's return, and therefore this project about his writeing to desire it, had not been communicated to him ; but when M^r. Oglethorpe arriv'd from Scotland with the Letters concerneing it, My Lord Conway without reflexion shew'd My Lord Halifax his Royal Highnesse's letter ; at which he was hugely surprised, that such a thing should be negotiated without his privitie, and gave him such a jealousy that the Duke put not an entire confidence in him, that thō My Lord Hide used all immaginable artes and asseverations to remove that uneasiness, it is still remain'd even so far as to influence his advice against it, of which he made no secret to the Duke himself; assuring him that nothing could be more unwellcom to him in the world than to have the honour of his commands, and at the same time the misfortune of thinking it not for his Highnesse's service that they should be complyd with; and his opinion bore so much weight with the King, that instead of his Royal Highness's obtaining leave to come to Court (of which he thought himself secure) My Lord Hide was order'd to go to Scotland with the most ungratefull message he could possibly be charged with, it being to tell his Highness, That his Religion was still an invincible obstacle to whatever good or favour his Ma^{ty} design'd him, and that without a compliance in that point all other tentatives would be ineffectual.

Whether the Duke's compliance in being present when the prayers were read in the Parliament, as the Commissioners were always used to be, and his concurrence in passing the Acts about Religion, made people fancy he might possibly make a further step, and that those things were only design'd as preparatives; or whether it was My Lord Halifax's opinion (hightened perhaps by the late disgust,) that had prevail'd upon the King, My Lord Hide infine was sent to Edinburg (there being no means of eluding it now) to tell the Duke in plain termes, That unless he would conforme and go to Church he must expect no leave to return to Court, nor could his Majesty, he sayd, support him any longer but on that condition, that he had struggled hard to defend him hithertoo, but that now, without his compliance herein, not only he, but the King himself must be inevitably ruin'd.

The Duke was amazed to find himself (he knew not how) blown farther back than ever, just when he thought he had wether'd the storme, and was entring into a secure harbour; had he not been formed to these traverses of fortune, and 1681.

T O M E
II.

Ibid: p. 608.

My Lord Hide is sent to Edinburg to perswade the Duke to change his Religion.

LETTERS
Vol. 2. p. 585.

KING JA: Mth
To. 9: p. 167.

T O M E prepared for such contradiction, he must have sunk into despair
II. “ with the very reflection on such a treatment ; nor did My 1681.
 KING JA: M^r
 To: 9. p. 168. “ Lord Hide fail on his part, by reason of his own inclination “ as well as the King’s order, to press his Royal Highness with all manner of arguments to swallow if possible this bitter pill:
 for thō no man could serue the Duke with more zeal and fidelity than that Lord had done, yet he was ever so disponding in that point, as to tell his Royal Highness continually, That he must expect to see no other signes of his Stedyness to his intrest, than in his sinking with him, unless he himself would make that step which alone could save both hims and all those who depended on him.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 610.

It was easy to be immagin’d that all the Duke’s friends would run into this cry, he always stood alone in this debate, in which friends and enemies join’d hands against him : My Lord Halifax tould him ‘That all the good part of England, seconded My Lord Hide’s errand with their wishes, and thō it was a tender point which no one durst venter to press home, yet (he sayd) he could not hould (out of the abundance of his zeal for his prosperitie) from assureing him, he should think it a greater miracle than had happen since the Apostles time, to wether the storme which his enemies had rais’d against him, without takeing away the armes he had put into their hands ;
 that the hopes of this, had been hithertoo the support of his friends, and preserved them in his intrest, but that if once they dispair’d of it, he must expect all men would desert his cause, as they would a towne that can no longer be defended, and that his enemies would triumph for a victory not of their gaining, but his giving.

KING JA. M^r
To: 9. p. 168.

“ In this strain run all their sollicitations and arguments ;
 “ and My Lord Hide in two or three days conversation and “ discours on this subject, made a full representation of the “ dismal situation his Royal Highnesse’s afairs were in, if he did not acquiesce to the King's request and resolution in this " matter ; but to their grief, as well as his immortal glory, and " happiness, all those temptations could not shake him in the least, which made them lament that generosity, which they could not deny but suited so well with his character and which they loved and admired so much on other occasions, should now (as they imagin'd) be so fatal to him and them ; but finding him impregnable, My Lord Hide as the last effort " and lowest conditions he must ever expect, pull'd a paper " out of his pocket writ by the King himself, profering, That in " case he would promise to go to Church without doing more, " he should have liberty to come to Court so soon as the " Parliament in Scotland was up : But the Duke persisting in " a constant denial, My Lord Hide left him with the comfortless view of being abandon'd by all the world, charged with the ruin of the King's affairs which went nearer his heart than that of his own, and of ending his days in the most uneasy banishment and afflicting circumstances that fortune could possibly reduce him too.

'Tis certain never man gave higher proofs of true Christian resolution and constancy, nor underwent a harder tryall, than this Pious and generous Prince on this occasion ; which might much better have become those primitive times My Lord Halifax spoke of, than such a desolate age in which so much suffering for the sake of Truth was generally counted as great a scandal and follie as to the Jews and Gentils in the Apostles time, which in some measure verify'd his Lordship's prophesie about it ; and thō it is to be fear'd he will have few followers, he will never want admirers, amongst which even those very persons who threaten'd to throw all up, if he persisted in his resolution, could not forbear from ranking themselves, by commending what so much displeas'd them, and even acting as formerly in his business ; so prevalent is true Christian

T O M E

II.

1681.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 612.KING JA: Mth
To. 9. p. 160.

T O M E generosity to force an esteem even from those, who are most II. offended by it.

1681.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 631.

As all this sollicitation made no alteration in the Duke's Judgment, neither did the hardships he underwent make any change in his affection and dutifull comportment to the King, nor in his sedulous attention to the affairs committed to his charge; which he managed with so much prudence and conduct, and govern'd the debates in Parliament with such adress, that he brought it at last to a happy conclusion: and least the people might object, that their well being had no share in his concern, and that his attention was only to doe the King's business or his own, he permitted them to sit on, after all the publick bills were pass'd, till they had finished severall Acts relateing only to the Country business, so that no one could accuse him of partiality; for haveing prevail'd to gain a precedency to the King's business (a thing scarce ever done in an English Parliament) he let them see, they fair'd not the wors for their civilitie and confidence; so that all sides were pleas'd, and only he who was the main instrument of this good accord, was left groaning under the pressure of disfavour and persecution, and no prospect left of ever seeing an end of his misfortunes.

The Duke
 sends his Scheme for the future government of Scotland.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 632.

But the King's natural affection as well as love of justice, would not let him persevere in so harsh a resolution, especially after he had heard from My Lord Hide, that thō his Royal Highness was immoveable in his Religion, he had been no less zealous and indeed no less successfull in his Majestys business; which mollefyd him a little, and encouraged My Lord Hide to renew his sollicitation, that his Highness might be permitted to come and acquaint his Majesty at least with the state of his affairs in Scotland now the Parliament was ended, and also to lay before him a certain Scheme for the future government of that Kingdom, and the disposal of severall offices vacant at that time.

The King seem'd not avers from so reasonable a thing, but objected, It was not yet to be thought of, till the tryalls of the two Lords Shaftsbury and Howard were over; which he repeated several times, and so put a stop to any further solicitation for the present, but being resolved not to dispose of the Chancellor of Scotland's place nor any other but with the Duke's advice, he writ to him to send the Scheme he mention'd; to which the Duke replyd, That not being permitted to deliver it by word of mouth, he would do it in the best manner he could by writeing, thō it must needs be much more imperfect, in regard he could not obviate such objections as might be made by those, who were not so perfectly instructed in the affairs of Scotland; and which it would be impossible to foresee, but were he present could easily answer.

TOME
II.

1681.

KING JA: M^{re}
To. 8. pag. 233.

He acquainted the King therefore, that the great mismanagement in that Kingdom of late had risen chiefly from private animosities, many of those whom his Majesty had intrusted of late haveing govern'd their actions more by that, than the views of his intrest; which had so dissatisfyd the generalitie of the Nation, that it was absolutely necessary such men should be layd aside.

This the King had been convinced of some time before, and finding the Parliament willing to joyn with him in that reforme, was fond enough of granting a Commission for that purpose, with designe to have it reinforced with a parliamenty power to take off the odium of that ungratefull office from himself. But the Duke thought it no good policy in his Majesty, to call for aid from a Parliament to execute what he had authority of himself to doe; that it was proper only for him to punish and reward, which convinced the King of his mistake, and prevented the Parliament's intermedleing in a matter which belong'd purely to his prerogative; he advised

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 623.

KING JA: M^{re}.
To. 8. pag. 295.

T O M E “ him likewise to make choice of such as had given proofs of II. “ their fidelity and were of Loyal familys, it being such his 1681. “ Majesty was to depend on both in England and Scotland, “ and that the extraordinary favours and partialities formerly “ shewn to the Lord Argile, could neither be answer'd nor “ without much difficulty amended, since that that family had “ been so much advanced and so much power put imprudently “ into their hands.

Ibid. 299.

“ The King, he sayd, knew so well the temper and consti“ tution of that Kingdom that he needed say the less to him
 “ of it, nor tell him, that being sure of the affections of the “ Nobilitie and Gentry, there was no need of fearing the “ rest, who had so great a dependance on them especially “ northwards; that he found the generality well inclined and “ scarce any that had power or even will to disturbe his affairs, “ that it was their intrest as well as duty to be Loyall and “ preserve the present government, that they dreaded nothing “ more than to see presbitery and de Covenant restored, or a “ Commonwealth in England, either of which would make “ them as great Slaves as in Cromwell's time, there being but “ one or two Noblemen in Scotland that he suspected to be of “ republickan principles; so that thō the West and some of “ the South partes were fill'd with Commoners of the refined “ Presbiterian doctrine, and were all for a Commonwealth, yet
 “ that it would be no hard matter to keep the Country quiet;
 “ but that as for the union and good understanding which was “ so much desired amongst the people of qualitie, he thought it “ very hard to be compass'd, the King he Sayd knew their “ disposition and the piques they had to one another, never“ theless, it was an easy matter enough to unite them so far,
 “ as that all sides might agree to serue his Majesty as they “ ought; but that it was not to be efected by laying any one “ man aside, and puting in an other in his station, no particular person being so universally beloved as that all sides would " T O M E be pleas'd with him ; that whosomever for example, should " II.

 be put in the Duke of Lauderdale's place and have the sole " 1681.
 management of affairs committed to him, would make himself " be felt as much as he had done before by those who were not "
 his friends or of an other intrest. "

What he had to offer therefore, he sayd, was, that the "
 King would have two Secretaries of State for that Kingdom, " one to reside in Scotland, the other in England, through " whose hands all the business might pass, that they should " take their turnes and chang every year or halfe year, and to " prevent these two takeing too much upon them, and running " into the same errorrs and partialities others have done before " them, he advised that five or six of the Scotch Privy Council " might always attend at Court too, and be changed in like " manner every year; through whose hands likewise the " business passing would hinder the Secretaries from shewing " partialities, and obviate that common clamor of one man's " engrossing the whole governing part, as if he were King of "
 Scotland. "

The standing forces, he sayd, were in no good condition " for want of experienc'd Officers, very few of them haveing " seen any service, or knew any thing of their duty, that most " of them owed their imployment to some friend in power, " without regard to personal merite, who likewise protected " them against the L^t General's complaints, so that without " punishing those who were faultie, and puting good Officers " into all vacancies, litle service could be expected from those " troops ; and that the Captains of the two foot Companys who " were pay'd to prevent the Highlanders from plundering, were " very unfit Subjects for that service, that they had scarce a " man in constant pay, but put most of the mony in their own " pockets. "

TOME

II.

1681.

“ As to the Revenue considering how small it was, he thought “ it proper as any of the Lords of the Treasurie dy’d, not to “ fill up his place, seaven being more than needed to manage “ sixty thousand pound a year ; and that when the farmes of “ the Customes and Forreign Excise expired, he was of opinion
 “ it were better to collect them as in England, which by “ experience was found the best : besides the people complain’d “ of the Custommers for letting prohebited goods come in, and “ suffring the manufactures of other Nations to be imported, “ paying only two or three per cent, which by the law should “ pay ten ; that these practices hinder’d the vent of their own “ manufactures, which were it in the King’s own hands would “ not be permitted, that his Majesty would infallebly gain by “ that method, for that those who had now them in farme “ were growne very rich, thō poor and necessitous before ;
 “ and that as to the other branches of the Revenue he was “ informed, he sayd, there might be several discoveries made “ of Lands which (had) fallen to the Crown and still lay in “ private men’s hands.

“ What he had to offer in reference to the Highlanders was,
 “ That if the King would pleas to pay what was due to My “ Lord Argile, he might preserue that antient and Loyal Clan
 “ of the Maclanes ; that means might be found to make it easy “ to his Majesty, and that it would be a great support to his “ intrest there, for should the Earle of Argile haue the “ Maclanes estate, he would be greater than it were fit for a “ Subject to be ; and then to prevent the plundering the low “ Lands by the Highlands in general, the only way would be “ to distribite the mony (which now went to the payment of “ the two Companies which doe not their duty there in) “ amongst the fouer great men there, to wit, the two Marques “ of Huntley, and Athol, and the Earles of Argile and Seaford, “ which would come too about Seaven hunderd pounds a piece, and oblige them to answer for the Highlands, and to make " good whatever any of their dependants should take from the " Low Lands ; by this means those great men would have more " dependance upon the King, and Secure the peace of those " Countrys without puting his Majesty to more charge than he " was allready at. "

T O M E

II.

1681.

This was part of what his Royal Highness had a mind to lay before his Majesty in reference to Scotland, and the King was so thoroughly satisfyd with the Duke's judgment and integrity therein, that he seem'd to aproue of each particular, and for the present readily complyd with whatever changes he proposed ; would never dispose of any imployment without his advice, nor refuse any person his Highness offer'd to fill it. And thō My Lord Lautherdale seem'd much astonished at the exceptions his Royal Highness made in the new regulations against the Lord Register, the Earle of Argile, and President of the Sessions, and used many arguments to convince his Majesty they were all well disposed to his service, he reply'd, He was informed from his Brother of their behaviour and principles on which he intirely relyd, and would not permit the last, who was then in Towne, so much as to apear in his presence, because he had come away without the Duke's permission.

The King
approves the Duke's reasons and management.
LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 663.

Ibid. p. 663.

But notwithstanding the King's countenance and approbation, the Duke found he had many difficulties and stubborn spirits to deal with ; amongst other regulations the Parliament had framed a Test, which many refusing who were injoin'd the taking it, particularly the Duke of Monmouth, Duke Hamilton and several Ministers in Edinburg, made some troubles be apprehended ; but the reception the Lord President of the Sessions had found at Court, gave a check to complaintes, and the King had that consideration for his Royal Highness as not to let him be persecuted in England and Scotland too, for

The Duke finds opposition and troubles about the new Test
in Scotland.
LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 679.
Ibid. p. 689.

Ibid. p. 767.

T O M E

II.

1681.

since he was not disposed to content him in one place, he was resolved to support him in the other; thō that argument was not needed to induce the King to approve of his Royal Highnesse's conduct and management which had been exercised with so much judgment, fidelitie, and zeal for his service, that unless he abandon'd himself he must sustain the Duke, who labouring for his Majestys ease and advantage bore all the odium as well as fatigue of what appear'd either harsh or disgustfull, while his Majesty had the advantage: for now My Lord and Lady Lautherdale as well as many others began to grumble at severall proceedings, so that when the Duke found it necessary for the King's service and peace of the Kingdom to make examples of some great men, he had great men likewise to oppose him.

The Earle of Argile prosecuted for refusing the Test.
LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 689.
KING CH:
LETTERS, 131.

The Duke of Hamilton had misbehaved himself all along and particularly in refusing to take the Test, and thō the King had denyd to give any dispensations on that account, yet his Son My Lord Arran's protestations of adhering in all things to his Majestys intrest, and obedience to the Duk's commands, made some compensation and put a stop to any prosecution there: but it was thought proper to go farther with My Lord Argile for equivocateing upon the point in this Test; the partie solemnly profess's the Protestant Religion as established in the first year of King James the Sixt, and promises never to consent to any change or alteration contrary thereuntoo, he swears to the King's supremacy, renounces the Covenant &c; the Earle of Argile had taken it as a privie Councillor, giving a certain explanation or sence of his own, which the other Lords of the privy Council not attending too, it had pass'd upon them, but being to take it again as Commissioner of the Treasury, the Duke order'd him to shew his explanation; wherein amongst other things, he sayd, It was not his meaning to bind himself up, from making any alterations he should think fit for the advantage of the Church and State: The Council was no ways satisfyd with this gloss, but he persisting in it, they thought fit to commit him and indict him upon it, of which they advertised the King, who aproved of what they had done, only order'd them, not to prenonce Sentence til they had transmitted an account of what had been proved against him; upon this they proceed'd to a tryal, in which after a sollem hearing he was found guilty of treason, Leasing makeing, and Leasing telling, but not of perjury, for there had been several indictments preferr'd against him; however pursuant to the King's directions, sentence was respited, til farther orders: My Lord Argile complain'd of this, as exceeding harsh usase, pretending it was an unusal stretch put upon the Law, and the Dutchess of Lautherdale concern'd herself much in his behalf, and thō neither she, nor her Duke durst deny the resonableness of such a prosecution, however they expostulated in some measure (at) his Royal Highness's insensibility, of the kindness he had receiv'd from that Duke, at his first going down into Scotland, by his being of opinion his Royal Highness should sit in Council there without takeing the oaths; but thō the Duke was not forgetfull of any kindness (nor did he owe that to him) he would not be diverted, to make friends to himself, from pursuing the King's intrest wherever he thought it concern'd.

T O M E

II.

1681.

LETTERS

VOL. 2. p. 749.

Ibid. p. 757.

The Earle of Argile escapes out of prison, upon which Sentence is pass'd upon him.

KING CH:

LETTERS

pag. 129.

It was neither the King's nor the Duke's intention to take away the Earle of Argil's life, but make use of this occasion to get him more into their power, and forfeit certain Jurisdictions and superiorities which he and his predecessors had surreptitiously acquir'd, and most tyranically exercised; and therefore when the King sent his letter in forme for passeng Sentence upon him, he order'd execution to be stop'd and in the mean time desired the Duke's advice how to dispose of those Superiorities and Offices which he thought too much for any

TOME one Subject, and was glad (he Sayd) he had got them out of so II. ill hands. But it seems this Lord's apprehention would not let 1681. him trust to the King's mercy, So he found means to escape out of prison by the help of his Daughter, who haveing got leave to see him, he changed cloaths with her footman, and carrying up her train as she went out, pass'd undecern'd by all the guards, and soon after got secretly out of the Kingdom;
 upon which, Sentence being prenonced against him, his armes were reversed and other markes of dishonour put upon him according to the custom and Laws of the Country; nay some of the Council were for haveing his Daughter (by whose means he escaped) whipped through the streets of Edinburg, but the Duke prevented it by saying, they were not used to deal so cruelly with Ladys in his Country, but notwithstanding his mercifull temper and that he design'd no real harme to My Lord Argile himself, yet his enemies were too watchfull to let slip any pretence of decrying his conduct; so great endeavours was used to mitigate this Lord's crime to the King, and to insinuate as if some ill might come of the Duke's pressing things too far, that the greatest part of the orthedox Clergie of Edinburg it self refused to take the Test, but the King was soon convinced of the falsetie of those reports, and the litle disturbance which the Whiggs made at Lanrick was so soon quell'd, that it was scarce heard of in Town; however the King thought fit to issue out a proclamation for apprehending My Lord Argile, that if it miss'd his person it might convince the world at least he was satisfyd with the Duke's management, and silence thereby the discourses industriously spread abroad, as if he had been prosecuted more out of a pique by the Duke, than by reason of any guilt to the King.

LETTERS
 VOL. 2. p. 78.

Ibid. p. 828.

Ibid. 802.

My Lord and Lady Lautherdale who had a great share in these reports, intrested themselves very much for the family;
 and thō they had little to say in justification of My Lord

Argile himself, they interceded vehemently in behalfe of My Lord Lorn his Son; this the Duke was no less ready to concur in, than the King to grant, only desired that in the settling of the estate upon him, a due regard might be had to the debts, and provision made for his yonger children; but My Lady Lautherdale press'd hard to have all the offices likewise confirm'd to My Lord Lorn (except that of Justiciar which she owned was to great for any Subject) but the King would by no means restore that family to any powers, and was once in a mind not to part with them to any body at all, but keep them undisposed of in his own hands; and thō his Majesty afterwards signed new Commissions for those and severall other hereditable jurisdictions which were fallen likewise to him by refusal of the Test, he made them all dureing pleasure only; and to such as his Royal Highness recommended; notwithstanding the interposition of others, and the great endeavours used to stop those made by My Lords Dalhousie and Roxborough, instead of the Duke of Monmouth, but his Majesty notwithstanding signed them with the rest: My Lord Arran was dissatisfyd too, that his Father's offices had been disposed of without regard to him, but he was tould that should he fall off for that, it would look as if he had differ'd from his Father only to have his imployments, that new converts must be tryd a little ere they are trusted too far; which satisfyd him in appearance, and he continued in his former professions of a perfect obedience to the Duke's orders, resolveing, he Say, to go immediately to Edinburg to renew them to him in person.

The affairs of that Kingdom and particularly this of My Lord Argile's, gave the Duke much more trouble by My Lord Halifax's meddling in them: he perceiv'd the Duke sent his directions in that matter to My Lord Hide, whose encreas of credit he was allways jealous of, and besides looking upon

TOME
II.

1681.
LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 784.

Ibid. p. 794.

Ibid. 846.

Ibid. p. 812.

Ibid. p. 811.

Ibid. p. 815.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 818.

TOME himself as the priuie Minister thought nothing ought to be
IL. done without his priuitie, It not being possible, he sayd, to 1681. govern one ship if he knew not what cours the other Steer'd; and thō he was tould, the affairs of Scotland had always been under a distinct management, and that My Lord Hide was acquainted with them, as servant to the Duke, not as Minister to the King, nevertheless he prevail'd with the King to admit him into those Councils; which put the Duke upon a necessitie either of breaking with him, which he had no mind to doe, or of communicateing those matters to him for the future, which besides the addition of trouble gave him new opposition instead of ease in the management of them.

The Lord Lorn has leaue to come up and plead for himself.

The chief matter yet in debate in reference to the Lord Argile, was the Signature or disposition of his estate for payment of his just Creditors, and some moderate donatives to such as his Father had ruined for their fidelitie to his Majesty; the surplusage being intended to descend to his family; this the Duke sent up for the King to confirme, but great objections were made against it by My Lord Halifax as well as others: My Lord Lorn likewise desired leave to come and plead for himself, whis his Majesty refused unless the Duke consented; but his Royal Highness was too indulgent to refuse it, only desired, his Majesty would pleas to determin nothing till he had heard his answer to the objections, which was readily agreed too, and when they came gave the King so much satisfaction, that there was no material alteration made, only that the actings of the Commissioners might be lyable to appeals; but this hinder'd not My Lord Lorn and his friends from pressing hard to haue the Superiorities restored him, pretending they were but a Sort of chief rents, or an authoritie over his Tenants, but My Lord Middleton shew'd the King the difference betwixt Common Tenants and Vassells who are obliged to follow their Lord on all occasions, which

LETTERS
 Vol. 2. p. 857.

Ibid: p. 862.

Ibid: p. 869.

was a power the King thought not fit to trust in such hands, so that he positively refused it, thō he agreed to restore My Lord Lorn in blood ; which the Duke approued of also, but advised his Majesty, for fear of some trick, not to signe the restitution in blood before the Signature, which he thought a prudent caution and did accordingly, signing at the same time My Lord Queensbury's patent upon the Duke's recommendation : So that all those oppositions and obstructions either at Court or els where which came from his Royal Highnesse's enemies, serued only to giue his Majesty a higher opinion of the Duke's management, and convince the world, that he acted not only pursuant to his inclinations but most agreeably to reason and justice when he suffer'd himself to be guided by the Duke's advice in all matters relateing to that Kingdom.

T O M E
II.

1681.
Ibid. 875.

Ibid. 889.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 788.

Whilst the affairs of Scotland went successfully enough where the Duke managed himself, they were not so prosperous in England where he was not permitted to be, thō that was stil used for a pretext to keep him away ; the King had indeed some hopes of an honest Lord Major's being chosen than the year before, that the Citie would come by degrees to its duty, that better Juries might be got, and justice haue its due and natural cours, which by the perjurys of the fanatical partie had been so impudently obstructed hithertoo ; but it seems those people were not so easily put out of their road, for the bill against one Rous a partizan of theirs, being pretended to the Grand Jury thō the evidence was full beyond exception they brought it in ignoramus.

The Earle of Shaftsbury acquitted by an ignoramus Jury.

KING CHAR.
LETTERS 123,

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 681.

This made the Court dispair of any better success against the Earle of Shaftsbury, unless some part of his crime haueing been committed in Westminster, they could haue a Jurie return'd by the Bailif of that Citie ; but (besides that it was a moot point amongst the Judges whether practicable or no) they found upon examination that all they could charge him with

Ibid. p. 688.

T O M E there, was only words spoken long ago, which were no more
II. within the Act; so they were forced to venter a Citie Jurie again, which the Sheriffs took care to chuse so fit for their purpose, that thō the evidence was beyond exception and given in open Court, yet S^r Samuel Bernadiston the foreman return'd the Bill ignoramus, upon which the Bells rung, bonfires were made, and such publick rejoyceing in the Citie, that never such an insolent defiance of authority was seen before.

Ibid. 729.

1681.
LETTERS
 Vol. 2. p. 699.

Ibid. 688.

This so disharten'd the Court that they knew not which way to turn for redress, it was under consideration whether a Quo warranto might not be brought against that part of the Citie's Charter whereby they chuse their Sheriffs, but that was a thing of time, and in the mean while the Earle of Shaftsbury, and Lord Howard, were admitted to bail the last day of the terme, the King no ways obstructing the due cours of Law, notwithstanding those fanaticks were not asham'd of doing it even in so impudent a manner as obliged them to own their perjurie and injustice in the face of the Sun.

Ibid. 730.

Notwithstanding this disapointment there was still some lingring hopes of the Duke's return, and some persons advised it that the King might not seem dejected with this blow, nor as if the fear of the partie had kept his Majesty in awe; but the King's dilatoriness and irresolution join'd with the timorous counsellors of many about him, particularly My Lord Halifax, made him differ'd this intended favour to the Duke, till an other cross accident dampt all such hopes, and threw his Royal Highness more back in his expectations than ever.

The Pr^e of Orangerenews his endeavours to make the King unite the Parliament and desert the Duke.

LETTERS
 Vol. 2. p. 638.

The Prince of Orange it seems finding his endeavours unsuc-cessfull in England, tryd if by forreign ingagements he could force the King into an union with his Parliament, and a breach with France; and thō he knew well enough that such a good agreement could not be cimented but in the Duke's ruin, that hinder'd him not from driveing on (in order to it) a sort of Protestant League with the two Northern Kings, the Elector of Brandenburg, the house of Lunebourg, and all the other Princes, who were jealous of the peace of Nimighen's being broke, and at last communicated it to the King, whose conjunction was only wanting (they sayd) to make it perfect; and this they press'd with so much importunitie, that the King was hard put to it, to avoid either giving a harsh denyal to their clamorous demands, or falling out with France which would have quite broke the measures he was in.

TOME
II.

1681.
Ibid. 668.

The King's necessities had been long so great and the Parliament so refractory and insolent, that he had no way left of relieving one (without consenting to the unreasonable demands of the other) but by a private Treaty with France; the Duke first put the King in the way of it, which the French at first answer'd only by compliments and in general termes, but at last it was concluded they should give the King fifty thousand pound every quarter, the first paiment to be at the end of June 1681, without any condition on the King's side but that of friendship, but promises on the French part not to disturb Flanders nor Holland.

The King's private agreement for a Pention from France.

Ibid. 247.

But his most Christian Majesty (who could not it seems long be idle) thought it (tis probable) no breach of his engagement to take Strasbourg, and Casal, and soon after burnt the Tripolin Ships at Scio a port of the Grand Segniors, setting as it were at defiance at one and the same time, the Pope, the Emperour, and the Turke; this made the Spaniards and Hollanders grumble a little, but when he came so near them as to block up Luxembourg, they cryd out aloud, and the King to pacify their former complaints haveing engaged he would call a Parliament in case the French prosecuted their intentions par voy de fait, the Spanish and Dutch Ambassadors pretended now the case was come; so that the King was forced to giue in a Memorial to the King of France, That unless he

The French motions had like to have forced the King to call a Parliam^t, and that had like to haue turn'd to the Duke's advantage.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 639.

Ibid. 736.

TOME
II.

1681.
Ibid. 700.

would suffer provisions to be brought into Luxembourg, he must necessarily call a Parliament, the consequence of which was well understood by every body, but by none better than his Royal Highness, who by these ebbings and flowings in his expectation, was kept in a more uneasy situation than a settled banishment would have been ; it put him upon continual anxieties how to ward himself from the malice of his enemies, and reward the fidelitie of his friends, how to keep fair with those who were teped, without disobliging those who were warmer in his seruice, how to make new friends and keep his old ones from falling off ; but what was more perplexing than all the rest, was his not realy knowing in such confused Councells and unsettled times, what made realy for him, and what made against him.

Hithertoo the least seeming necessitie of a Parliament, was counted an unanswerable argument to keep him away, which now being thought unavoidable by reason of the King's promis, and the French proceedings, the Duke's hopes by consequence was never lower ; when by I know not what mutabilitie of judgments and capricious fancys of Ministers, it had quite contrary effect, and was like to haue brought his Royal Highness back when he and all the world expected it least.

LETTERS
Vol: 2. p. 710.

M^r Seymour it seems tould the King, that should he suffer a Parliament to meet, and not permit the Duke to be there, would be a yelding back the advantages he had got, and proue in effect his and the Monarchys ruin ; that all the Loyal adresses which of late had been presented to him so strenously asserting the right of the Crown, and the Succession in the true line, meant plainly the Duke's return, and that all honest men would be dejected and disharten'd if it fell out otherwise.

Ibid. 724.

These reasons were not without their weight, but the true one was his and the other Ministers own preservation ; they consinder'd the united malice of their enemies and the disunion which increas'd every day amongst themselves, both in their opinions and actions ; whereas the factious partie were still firm and uniforme in pursut of theirs, and to be sure would neither forget nor forgiue those Councells nor Councillors, who had hitherto disapointed their malice ; which with the hidden intrigues of the woemen and the King's unsteddy temper, convinced them, that without the Duke they should all return into their original Cahos, and that none but he could keep them from falling to pieces, nor the King from sliding back upon the first rub or disappointment.

T O M E
II.

1681.

Ibid. 746.

This made My Lord Halifax himself acquaint his Royal Highness, that hitherto it had been an uspeakable trouble to him, that he could not get the better of his own thoughts when they stood in opposition to his Highnesse's commands, but that now he was so happy as to think nothing more reasonable, than what he so much desired, and that he should be present when the Parliament met, to answer for himself in case they had the confidence to lay any thing to his charge.

LETTERS
VOL: 2. P. 716.

However the King was not so easily brought over to this opinion, apprehending that if the Parliament proceeded to an Impeachment, he should be hard put to it to avoid puting the Duke under restraint, which he thought would be wors than to stay where he was ; but they answer'd, there was no danger of the Commons running to that height, but if they did, the Lords, to be sure would make a great difference betwixt his Majestys Brother and an other Peer ; that it was a hard case for the Duke, and disadvantageous to his Ma^y himself, that the Plot which was dead to every body els, should still be kept alive in him ; in fine the King who realy desired to do what was best for the Duke, if it did not prejudice himself, gave at last into their arguments, and the French motions makeing every body look upon a Parliament as unavoidable, it was

Ibid. 723.

T O M E expected every day when his Royal Highness would be Sent II. for.

1681.

When this news came to Edinburg the Duke scarce knew how to credit it, but waited a confirmation and the event, without stirring in it himself; not only because he was yet in the darke as to the true origin of this unexpected change, but also, for that he was advised the King would have the pleasure of making it his own act, and that it must either doe of itself or not at all: but as it sprung up like an untimely plant, so it withered and faded away as suddently, and in a few days, no more markes or foot steps appear'd of it than if it had never been at all.

My Lord
 Halifax crushes this project.

This quick relaps was oweing to my Lord Halifax's refin'd arguing, who was always for cleaving a hair in his advice, he remain'd still of opinion the Duke should be present if the Parliament met, but pretended he ought, by no means, to come before; it was urged against this, that such a return would look liker a summoning of him to answer in Parliament than a recalling him from banishment, and indeed My Lord Hide and Mr Seymour were so earnest against it, that they thought it better he remain'd where he was than to come in that manner; for if things went ill which was much to be fear'd, it would, they sayd, be layd at his door, and he have no other benefit by it than to screen others from danger by drawing all the Jury of the Partie upon himself, as if God had made him a Prince only to cover the failings of Ministers, and the iniquities of the People; but my Lord Halifax had so much credit with the King, that his opinion overballanced the others, and by some new scheme (as it was thought) he so changed his Majesty in that matter, that now a thousand difficulties were started against it, which made the other Ministers suspect his Lordship look'd back to his old politicks, and the

LETTERS
 VOL. 2. p. 751.

LETTERS
 VOL. 2. p. 751.

Ibid. 759.

makeing himself popular again ; and his declareing at this time against prosecuteing dissenters was no small Simptom of it: infine M^r Seymour acquaints the Duke he finds his Royal Highness must be made a sacrifice once more, to attone for the Sins of the Ministers, and was so dissatisfyd in the main, that he left the Court a little abruptly and went discontented into the Country.

T O M E

II.

1681.

Ibid. 751.

But no one had more reason to be discontented and melancoly upon the matter than his Royal Highness himself, for besides this balke upon his expectation, he saw his friends quitting the list, and which way to keep them together was a task he knew not well how to go about: On one hand My Lord Halifax sayd, he hop'd his Highness would believe that whatever opinion he had concerning his return, it sprung from no other motiue but his apreheension that it was neither for the King's seruice, nor his own, to come at an unseasonable time; nor would he allow himself to suspect, he sayd, that those with whom he differ'd in this matter had gain'd any advantage upon him in his Highnesse's opinion, but that he will pleas to let him have the same place in it he ever thought fitt for him, when he was most satisfyd with his endeavours to serue him and his zeal for his right; My Lord Hide on the other hand was no ways satisfyd with his triming, and M^r Seymour displeas'd with them both, which gave his Royal Highness a more comforthless prospect of his affairs than all the rest, and made his presence more necessary (as the Ministers themselves had judg'd) at the same time it was render'd almost impossible, and to compleat his danger the apreheensions still encreasing least France should break the peace, and the clamours on that account of the Spanish, and Dutch Ministers that a Parliament might be call'd for their deffence, embarrassed the King and threaten'd the Duke, if possible, more than ever.

Ibid. 716.

1682.

TOME
II.

1682.
LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 78.

THE promis his Majesty had made of calling a Parliament in case the King of France should pursue his designs by acts of Hostility, intangled and gravel'd him exceedingly, for it required a nice distinction to shew that the blockade of Luxembourg was not in the case, and the Spanish and Dutch Ministers were no ways satisfyd with the profer of leting fifty cart loads of corn enter into it (which had been the product of the King's late Memorial at the French Court) and were so fully perswaded there was no other safety but in a Parliament, that they declared they would rather loss Luxembourg than that a Parliament should not be call'd; which made the King despair of eluding it any longer, he only resolved with himself to meet them with such a resolution as became their King, and to dissolve them forthwith if they offer'd any thing against the Prerogative; he was casting about what place was most convenient for their meeting, and pitched at last upon Cambridg, that in the intervals of business he might be near the place of his pleasures, and in the mean time expected with impatience what answer the King of France would give to the Memorial, which the English and Dutch Ministers had orders to present jointly to that Court.

But instead of an answer his Majestys Envoy was tould that their Memorial could not be receiv'd in the manner it was deliver'd, that his Most Christian Majesty could not hinder Princes and States from entring into what leagues they pleas'd at home, but that he would not suffer them to do it in his own Court and against himself, but that they might propose what they pleas'd seperately, and then should have his answer. Nothing could be well objected against this, which delayd the matter till orders were sent to his Majestys Minister there, to propose the same things seperately; to which the French replyd, They would quit their pretentions to whatsoever was then in possession of the Spaniards, provided Luxembourg might be deliver'd to them in three months.

T O M E
II.

1682.
LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 791.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 83...

When this was communicated to the Dutch Ambassadors, they flew out in great passions and abusive expressions, even against the King, accusing him of Briberie from France, and manifest breach of his promis in not calling a Parliament, from which, they sayd, no ill could be apprehended, but some little hardships to the Duke of Yorke whom it seems they made no great account of; but the King nevertheless tould them, He saw no reason why he should be press'd to call a Parliament, when propositions were made from France (not so unreasonable) but that a treaty might be grounded upon them, which could not be call'd acting in a hostile manner, and therefore required them to communicate the matter to their Masters, til when they were like to have no other answer.

The French
made proposals.

Ibid. 847.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 848.

Ibid. 851.

When they saw the King had too much reason on his side to be chang'd, and too much resolution to be frighted, they became something calmer and owned there was ground indeed given for a treaty, but sayd there would be much more hopes of success, if a Parliament were sitting at the same time, and therefore ceased not solliciting for it; but those violent efforts both at home and abroad to force the King to a Parliament in spite of his teeth, made him more avers to it than ever, he was not well pleased with those who had advis'd him to make that conditional promis, which now perplexed him so grievously,

T O M E
II.

1682.

Ibid. 892.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. P. 907.

The Duke
at last is brought back to Court.

and much less with the Prince of Orange to whose intregues abroad, and his last visite in England, these troubles were oweing; as indeed it was afterwards owned by some of the States themselves to the King's Resident there, that all those vehement solicitations by the Dutch Ministers for a Parliament, came from that Prince, and two or three more of the States that join'd with him, and that the late answer sent to the King had been dispatched by the same persons without the privitie of the rest, or that otherwise it had never been done: but his Majesty found means to make the Prince of Orange sencible at last, that these cobwebb stratagems were too weak and transparent, either to blind or fetter the world, or that they would contribute to his own advantage, or the publick peace of Europe, which he pretended to take so much to heart.

All these changes of Councells made no change in the Duke's prospect of being recall'd whether a Parliament was to sitt or no, there never wanted some reason of State against his comeing, or at least for delaying it, which in the end proued the same; he had only more reason to despair than ever, because he found he could count upon few men's friendship, most of the Ministers were for playing their own game, which made cautious and timerous Councells always prevail; and that amongst so many different measures at Court, none of them had turn'd to his advantage: wherefore the best he could hope for, was to continue the remainder of his life, an honourable banishment as the only reward of his duty, obedience, and signal seruices, when an unforeseen accident brought him back by the means of a person he least expected it from; nor indeed was it done for the Duke's sake, so that had he not managed the occasion with incomparable cunning and dexterity it had proued as unsuccessfull as the rest.

It was infine the Dutchess of Portsmouth without intending it, that put an end to the Duke's long and undeserued Exile, as well as to the King's troubles and uneasiness, for without his Royal Highnesse's assistance and advices, he could never haue got so perfect a victorie over those implacable spirits which had haunted him so long, thō that he had served for a standing reason against allowing them that mutual happiness.

T O M E
II.

1682.

No body doubted but that Ladys power was great enough to haue done it sooner if she had pleas'd, but hithertoo it had been turned against, not only the Duke, but in some measure the King himself; she had courted the Rebellious partie, " when she apprehended their prevailing, she had been a busie " instrument in endeavouring to reconcile the Duke of Montmouth with the King, had frequent interviews with Shaftsbury, Lord Howard of Escrick, &c. and My Lord Sunderland after he had been discharged from his imployment, ceased not to be every day in her lodgings til the King positively forbid her to see him; who at last growing out of patience with her double dealing gave her so many markes of his displeasure, that it " is believ'd he would haue gon further, had he not already " owned her Son the Duke of Ritchmond in so publick a " manner.

KING JA. Mth.
To. 9. p. 178.
266.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 79...

KING JA: Mth.
To: 9. 177.

When she found therefore those deceitfull measures were not to be pursued, and that her wheedle of pretending to bring those angry men over to the King's intrest, would no longer pass upon him, she Set herself to worke to regain her credit with his Majesty, which [* by her credit with his Majesty, which] by her usual artes she still found means to succeed in; and when she had brought it to as high a pitch as ever, she wisely set her head to work how to profit by the fair weather while it lasted, and procure some certain fund for a future settlement let what will hapen, prudently enough forseeing that another

The Dutchess of Portsmouth's project to rais mony bring the Duke back.

* The words between crotchets seem to have been inadvertently left by the Secretary in turning to a new page. — EDITOR.

TOME
II.

1682.
LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 809.

popular commotion in the Kingdom, or even a little time without any other accident, might bereave her of it again ; so she resolved to rais a great summe of mony and place it in a forreign Country as a secure retreat and subsistance, if the weather should grow cloudy again in England.

KING JA: Mth.
TO. 9. 173.

The King's necessities were to great to comply with her expectations out of his revenue, so the only Shift she could think of, was to prevail with his Majesty to propose to the Duke, to settle upon her a rent charge of five thousand pounds per annum out of the Post Office for fifty years, and to promis his Royal Highness an equivalent out of the hereditary Excise, and then she proposed raising a hundred thousand pounds upon it in present, being the summe she wanted for her intended project. The Duke was always too compliant to refuse any thing the King desired, and too sencible of the Dutchess of Portsmouth's power to think he could purchass her favour too dear ; so answer'd immediatly, That since all he had in the world was from his Majesty, it should always be at his disposal, and was therefore ready to do whatever was proposed, but believ'd it not feazable unless he were personally present in Town, both to consult the manner and performe what was necessary for such a conveyance ; which he knew if the Dutchess of Portsmouth were once convinced of, she would move heaven and earth to bring it about.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 810.

KING JA. Mth.
TO. 9. 174.

“ All this while, the Duke knew Very well his revenue was so settled, that nothing but an Act of Parliament could alienate any part of it ; which he took care not to mention to any liveing soul, least that might have made the King lay the thoughts of it aside, or made her sollicite for a Parliament, which would have given that project a mischievous turn, and done him hurt instead of good ; and by great fortune none of the Lawiers about Town who were studying which way to bring it about, light upon that difficulty, thō they found out " others which they endeavoured to obviate by proposing to have it surrendered into the King's hands, and the King to surrender it to her: But at last S^r George Greffreys who was the Dutchess of Portsmouth's Councel, assured her, it might be done by le ving a fine upon so much of the profits of the Post Office as was necessary for that end, which put her upon pressing the King with all imaginable earnestness for the Duke's return, his presence being necessary for that, and was the more urgent in it, because being extreemly subject to fitts of the Collick she was advised to go to Burbon waters in France, and she long mightly to see the matter finished before she went.

T O M E
II.

1682.

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 81...
Ibid. 859.

This made many things be turn'd into arguments for his Royal Highness's coming to Court, the very shadow of which before were capable of blasting any such thought: My Lord Shaftsbury being acquitted by an Ignoramus Iurie, which had thrown the Court so much back, she sayd, made it the properest time in the world tō recall the Duke, to convince the factious partie that the King was not terrifyd with their insolence; but his Majesty who was not so easily led by people, that could blow in his manner hot and could as their intrest served, was very reasty upon the point, and indeed before this matter was started was never less disposed to do it thant at this time; My Lord Halifax had so terrifyd him with dangers if the Duke were there before the Parliament met, and the King on the other hand being in a manner determined to have none, made his coming desperate, but at last her importunitie overcame all obstacles and objections, and the King promised her he would recall him whether there were a Parliament or no; but the Season of the year and her indisposition forcing her away before that could be brought about, She writ full of kindness to the Duke begging of him not to neglect her

LETTERS
VOL. 2. p. 730.

Ibid. 737.

T O M E

II.

1682.

Ibid. 727.

LETTERS

Vol. 2. p. 893.

KING JA. Mth
To. 9. 174.KING CH:
LETTERS
pag. 185.LETTERS
Vol. 2. p. 904.

business in her absence, and that if he was not recall'd to Court before her return, she would go upon her knees to the King to obtain it, which should she do now would look too sordid, as if intrest were the only motiue: This seem'd a contradiction, to beg of him to do what she desired and that then he should be recall'd, because his presence was supposed necessary to make the conveyance; but the reason was, it had been resolved at last, that the Duke should meet the King at Newmarket to dispatch this business there and then go back into Scotland again, where he was to leave the Dutchess and Princess Anne as a pledg of his return: so the matter being settled to her likeing, she set out the same day for France which his Majesty did for Newmarket; by this means the Duke's great hopes dwindled into a piece of harder usage than ever, he was to be sent for indeed, only to divert himself of part of his estate to oblige the Dutchess of Portsmouth; of whose assistance he could make Small account, when once her own business was done; however he readily accepts it, without capitulation, thinking it prudent to take what he could get, and leave the rest to his own conduct and behavoeur, when once he had the hapiness to see the King again. But before it came to that, the King's good nature went farther than the Dutchess of Portsmouth's averice, and he resolved with himself the Duke should come for good and all, and that haveing done so much for her satisfaction, was determin'd to do the rest for his own and be no longer deprived of the conversation, assistance, and comforth of a Brother, whose obediance and submission to his will, his constancy and patience in his sufferings, and fidelity in his business had render'd him if possible more dear and necessary to him than ever; he therefore dispatch'd away M. Legg to Edinburg, desiring the Duke to meet him at Newmarket, and order'd My Lord Hide to acquaint him that for expedition sake he should come alone, but that his intention was he should return back with him to London where he was resolved that the Dutchess who was then bigg with child should come to ly in.

T O M E
II.

1682.

The Duke comes to Newmarket, to meet the King.
KING JA: Mth.
To. 9. 174.
and 183.

Assoon as the Express arriued the Duke lost no time, but " going on board the fourth of March on the Henrietta Yacght " that lay ready at Leith, he made the best of his way to " Yarmouth, where after a rough passage he arrived the tenth " and went that night to Norwitch, at both which places he " was very well receiv'd and the next day came to Newmarket, " where the King receiv'd him with all imaginable demon- " strations of kindness, which his Royal Highness answer'd with " no less tenderness and affection, Assureing his Majesty, he " should find him as obedediant for the future as he had " hithertoo been; and haveing private notice given him that " his declining business would be agreeable to the King, some " two or three days after his arrival, he tould his Majesty That " when he had given him an account of his affairs of Scotland, " he would abstain from any further medling in what related to " the publick, and thō he acknowledged it would be an " uneasiness to him, who had been bred in business from his " infancy, to live an idle life, yet he was desirous to contribute " in every thing to his Majestys quiet, and disproue the " allegations of his cnemies, who to create a jealousy in the " King, and aprehention to the people, had blazed it about, That " now the Duke was return'd all Councells would be govern'd " by him; he was therefore resolved to wave all business unless " his Majesty expresly order'd the contrary, and wish'd that all " his Subjects would shew the same submission to his will and " concern for his eas and satisfaction. The King was well " pleas'd with this declaration and said it would contribite to " the quiet and peace of them both, and without all dispute " it contribited to keep the King steddly and fixed in his " resolution of takeing him back with him to London "

TOME “ notwithstanding the earnest solicitations of My Lord II. “ Halifax and Mr. Seymour to the contrary.

1682.
 My Lord Halifax and Mr. Seymour opposes the King going back with the Duke to London.

KING JA. Mth.
 To:9. pag. 181.

“ My Lord Halifax came not downe to Newmarket till some “ days after the Duke’s arrival, and thō he knew he had been “ exceeding seruiceable to him in many cases, yet in others he “ was sencible of his haveing disgusted him; he asked him therefore at his first interview, whether he was to apear before him as a criminal or no? but the Duke receiv’d him so graciously, and seem’d by his great attention to his good offices not to remember the ill ones, that my Lord was rassured, and shew’d to be entirely satisfyd with his reception, thō in the bottom he was neither changed in his opinion nor his conduct.

KING JAM. Mth.
 To:9. pag. 181.

“ He and Mr Seymour were the two prevailing Ministers “ and neither wanted wit nor eloquence to second their “ intentions, which they had made good and bad use of as “ their privat intrests or natural inclinations guided them, but as those changed, their Councells did the same; they had wished the Duke’s presence to protect them from the fury of the Parliament, but now that danger being over and the forreign clamours in great measure apeas’d, other considerations and jealousies succeeded in their place, they fear’d notwithstanding the Duke’s promising not to meddle in business, yet one day he would eclips them in it, and that My Lord Hide would outstrip them too in the King’s favour, by vertue of the Duke’s countenance and protection, which by his assiduuous and faithfull seruice during the whole cours of the misfortunes, they were “ sencible he had merited beyond them all; so that thō they “ were at the same time convinced that the Duke’s presence “ was necessary to keep the King steddly to the very measures “ they themselves had advised, yet intrest blinding their “ judgment on this occasion, they press’d earnestly that the “ Duke might dispatch what he came for at Newmarket, and “ so return to Scotland again: But the King after he had once seen his Brother could not be prevail'd with to part " T O M E from him again, was resolv'd to give him some satisfaction " II.

 after so much suffering, so pretending the Dutchess of "

 Portsmouth's business could not so well be executed there, " 1682.
 in spite of all their intrigues and Sollicitations, brought " him back to London.

Where he was no sooner arriv'd but the Attorney general " The Dutchess was order'd to prepare such writings as was necessary to " of Portsmouth's make the conveyance, but upon a stricter enquiry into the " Council find matter and a full perusal of all the acts relating to the Duke's " at last, what settlement, he found out at last what the Duke knew from the " they aim'd at first, that nothing but an Act of Parliament could make it valid " is not feasible.
 or empower the Duke to alienate any part of his revenue. "

This was a mighty disappointment both to the King and " Dutchess of Portsmouth, but the Duke kept his council and " never mention'd his having been apprised so long before of " his impossibilities, which he had managed so dextrously as " to procure his return without being obliged to dismember his " estate, which (tho' he could deny the King nothing) would " have been a great trouble to him; 'tis true his Majesty " designed to give him an equivalent out of his hereditary " revenue, but his Royal Highness would have been very loath " to let his former settlements be ravel'd into by Acts of " Parliament, for when once any thing belonging to him had " come into such hands, he knew not what disposal might have " been made of the rest; but their being other reasons against " calling a Parliament the King and Dutchess of Portsmouth " were forced to be satisfy'd, and could be no ways displeased " at the Duke, who had shewn all imaginable readiness to do " whatever had been required from him. "

Having thus turn'd the Dutchess of Portsmouth's averice to so signal an advantage, without any damage to his estate, and yet warded himself from her anger, he had the less to apprehend from her mighty credit with the King, which after "

T O M E

II.

1682.

KING. JA: M^r

To: 9. 176.

“ her return from France was grown greater (if possible) than “ ever ; and therefore being disapointed of her aime this way, “ was resolved to do it an other, and prevail'd at last with his “ Majesty to make her a grant of ten thousand pounds a “ quarter out of his private French fund till a hundred “ thousand pound was run up, thō it was the King's main “ Support to defend him from the tyranny of a Parliament ; but “ there was no resisting her importunities, when once she (had) “ knowlidg of it, which til then, had been kept a secret from “ her, and indeed communicated to none but the first Com“ missioner of the Treasury and M^r Churchill (by whom it “ had been negociated) otherwise tis probable both her eys and “ hands would have been sooner upon it, and her payments “ have commenced before they did, the last quarter not being “ satisfyd when the King dy'd.

Ibid. p. 177.

The Duke returns to Scotland to fetch the Dutchess, and had like to have been drown'd in his passage.

His Royal Highness remain'd with the King til the 3^d of May, which day he parted from Windsor where the Court then was, to fetch the Dutchess bigg with child out of Scotland ; he chose to go by sea in the GLOCESTER frigate with severa smaller vessells to attend him, which, thorough the unskil-fulness or treachery of Captain Ayres the Pilot (who was trye and condemn'd afterwards) was lost, and the Duke himself in great danger of being so too ; Captain Ayres his intention was it seems, to follow the Colliers' road, betwixt the Cost and the Sand banks, but the Commanders being against it, orde'd him to go out to Sea thinking to clear them all, but he still pressed to tack fancying he had time enough to go within the banks and at last he had leave given him, when the Commanders thought themselves far enough out at Sea to go beyond them all ; but it seems both were deceiv'd, for a little while after, the ship struck upon the Lemon (and) oar in Yarmouth road*, where she stuck for some time, and had not too much hast* been saved, assoon as she came into deep water immediately sunk and at least a hundred persons in her ; but his Royal Highness as soon as they despair'd of saveing her, got into his shallop and from thence went a board the Yacght, on which occasion such was the modesty and respect of those who attended him, many whereof were persons of quality, as the Earls of Perth, Middleton, &c, that no one whatever offer'd to go into it, but whom his Highness pleas'd to call himself, which was only M^r Churchill and one or two more ; but other boates comeing to their rescue, most of the persons of quality and his Royal Highnesse's Servants got off also, and many more might have been saued, had not the timorousness of the boatmen hinder'd their comeing near the ship when they thought her about to sink, for fear of sinking with her ; those therefore who were thus abandon'd (thō ready to be swallowd up) gave a great huzza assoon as they saw his Royal Highness in safety, to the no less honour to the English Seamen for their intrepiditie and zeal, than the Duke's for haveing gain'd so great an esteem amongst them, when such endeavours were used to render him the object of all men's hatred.

* In a small Volume of Some Historical Memoires of the Duke of York to the year 1682, published in 1683, Sir John Berry's Letter, Captain of the Gloucester, is inserted, giving a Relation of this Loss. — EDITOR.

Haveing escaped this danger he got safe a shore to Scotland, where pursuant to the King's directions he declar'd the Lord Haddo then Lord President of the Sessions, to be Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Queensbury Lord Treasurer, and the Earl of Perth Lord Justice General ; after which making as little stay as possible he return'd for England with the Dutchess, the Lady Anne, and the rest of his family, nor did the late disaster hinder him nor her Royal Highness from venturing to 1682.

T O M E
II.

The Duke and Dutchess return by Sea from Scotland.

* Here some words would seem to have been omitted, perhaps — hast been made, might have been saved, &c. — EDITOR.

T O M E

II.

1682.

Sea again, dangers and sufferings was now grown so habitual to them both, and they so resigned to providence, that they never disputed or delayd any orders for their own convenience or safety, the ships were ready and apointed for that Service, which the Dutchess without hesitation venters to go on board of, thō there was no discouragment wanting to deter her from a Sea voyage ; she was then bigg with child, and the fresh idea of the Duke's late escape which upon any accident would Strike them all with apprehention and terrour must needs be of most dangerous consequence in the condition her Royal Highness was in, which so discouraged those about her, that My Lady Peterborough begg'd leave to go in another ship ; least she should communicate her apprehentions and frights to the Dutchess herself, and contribute in spight of her will to what of all things she desired to avoid ; the Duke had his share in all these sollicitudes, but his satisfaction in returning to Court made some compensation, whereas that was not the thing that charmed the Dutchess, on the contrary she had always chozen to accompany him in his banishment, thō intended for never so short a time, rather than live at eas where he was not : it was therefore the passionate affection she had for him that made her neither desire to go by land, nor stay behind, till she was brought to bed, but thought herself happyer in any danger or trouble with him than in any security or eas without him ; so they imbarcked accordingly, and this Voyage proveing happyer than the last, they arrived without any ill accident on the 27^h of the same month at Whitehall, whither the King came on purpose that day from Windsor to meet them, to the unspeakeable joy of them all : It was hard to say who had most pleasure in their return, it is certain the King's share was not the least, for besides the tender affection he bore his Brother, he had a mighty loue and esteem for the Dutchess, he did not only honour her personal merit, but

commiserated in some measure her sufferings more than the Duke's, because she went a whole sharer with him in all his misfortunes, and had over and above some private grivances of her own in which his Royal Highness bore no part ; her passionate love for the Duke her husband made their joint afflictions easy to her, but render the other the more insupportable, for as yet all these adversities had not washed him clean from certain personal disorders, which had all along been so grievous to her ; but she lived not much longer before she had the satisfaction of seeing him not only become a perfect rival of her vertue, but a most exemplar and fervent penitent for the Sinns of his former life.

What made this meeting still more comfortable was the good condition the King's affairs were in ; his Majesty had at last taken those vigorous councells, and resolute methods the Duke had so long press'd him too, and was convinced by experience of what his Royal Highness had continually inculcated, that there was no compounding matters with that sort of people, and that the only way to be served faithfully and dutifully in his Court and Council, was not to suffer either his person, dignitie, or prerogative, to be infring'd or reviled, nor the liues, liberties, and properties of his Subjects to be invaded and ruin'd under the notion of preserveing them ; and that those unparalell'd attempts upon his Government which had so encouraged the ill men and terrifyd the good, were no longer to be born with : that he must Support his friends if he would have them continue So, for that no one thō never so loyally disposed durst march faster than his leader ; thō the Duke himself was in some measure an exception to this rule, for notwithstanding he was a persecuted, banished, and abandon'd Prince, he did not only keep peace with his Majesty in this career, but enter'd it in great measure first himself, and thō still accompanyd with so much prudence as never to put the 1682.

T O M E

II.

Things in a good state at the Duke's return.

T O M E King to the inconveniencie of defending an indiscreet zeal ;
II. thus he shew'd by his management in Scotland, a good example 1682. of the doctrine he preached, which when his Majesty followed, it set him at rest the remainder of his days ; he had often tould him that the wrack which the Crown had suffer'd in his Father's time was so fresh in the memorys of most men, that he wonder'd any prudent person could run into the same errors, or the malicious partie think to play the same game so soon again, that the Rocks indeed which he split upon, lay hid to him, but were so visible now that should not his Majesty avoid them he would perish rather derided than pitied.

These were the measures the Duke had long advised, and now being with his Majesty, as much as his engagement of not meddling in business would permit, kept him steddy too ; by which at last he so worsted the enemies of his government that none who ris up against it now were call'd by any other names than Rebels : It was by these methods he master'd the stubborn temper of the Citizens, and gain'd his point in the Election of the Sheriffs notwithstanding the tumultuous and rietous opposition of the factious partie, and forced them from that scandelous retrenchment of Ignoramus Juries, under which they had long lurked with so much security and acted any sort of treason without fear or shame.

The Earl of Shaftsbury sues for pardon.

KING JA. Mth
 To. 8. 315.

When this strong hould therefore began to be in danger of being reduced, it brought My Lord Shaftsbury on his knees and made him sue for pardon from the Duke ; the message was “ something ambiguous, which made his Royal Highness return “ him this answer, That he knew him too well to trust him in “ any thing relating to himself, but if he would make such “ submission to his Majesty as became him, and give “ convinceing proofs of a true conversion, he would take him “ willingly by the hand ; for that if the greatestemie he had “ in the world (which he tooke him to be) would become a loyal and dutifull Subject to the King, he could easily " overlook the injuries done to himself, and readily forgive " them with all his heart. "

T O M E
II.

1682.

The Earl of Sunderland
does the like.

But it seems that Lord was not so well disposed to aske pardon as the Duke to give it, so no farther step was made in that matter ; however other great men began to shift for themselves, the Duke of Monmouth waver'd a little, and My Lord Sunderland who was made of plyebler mettal than the rest, and who by keeping still in with the Dutchess of Portsmouth, had never quite left his hould of the Court, now at her return out of France used all her credit, which was very great, to be readmitted to his employment again ; he had been long meditateing that matter, at least ever since he saw the faction began to decline, and had open'd his desires to My Lord Hide, of being reconcil'd to the Duke while he was yet in Scotland, accompanying his request with all imaginable assurances of sorrow for what was past and promises of future good behaveours, and begg'd of him to acquaint his Royal Highness with it, and as a marke of his sinceritie chose to make aplication, he say'd, first to the Duke, ere he did it to the King : But thō My Lord Hide thought it good policy in the Duke to encourage repentance, yet he knew it was dangerous to trust so faithless a man ; so tould him, He durst not venter to make any such proposal to his Highness in his absence, but that being so soon expected he would not only then acquaint him with it, but accompagny his request with all the good offices he was capable of, by which he neither disencouraged his hopes nor engaged the Duke, which was submitted to it, and promised he would not so much as move the King in the intrim. However My Lord Hide writ to the Duke about it, the answer to which miscarried, which put him into some axiety and suspicion, and not without

LETTERS
VOL:2. p. 853.

Ibid. 850.

Ibid. p. 890.

T O M E cause, since that was the only letter which was known to have IL fail'd during his Highness' stay in Scotland.

1682.

But when the Dutchess of Portsmouth was come back again, he had a surer card to play than the Duke's intrest, he had always been her favorit, and her late kindness to the Duke began to souren a little; She had got a grant of her money without being behoulden to him, and she could not blame him, that it was not done in the manner she first projected, yet she was not pleas'd that the fund out of which it was now to be pay'd, had been so long made a secret to her, this gave her a jealousy of the Duke's presence at Court might be a means to make more things so, she likewise observed that the King

KING JA: Mⁿ
To. 9. 171.

“ and the Duke had long and frequent conferences together,
 “ in privat, which she concluded were upon matters of State, “ thō in reality they were concerning Religion, which the “ King at that time had great scruples about; all this made “ her apprehend there was no depending upon the Duke's “ engagement not to meddle in business, and therefore she was “ resolved, if possible, to get it into her own hands, or those of

KING JA: Mⁿ.
To. 8. p. 215.

“ her creatures; which made her press so vehemently My Lord “ Sunderland's readmission, that the Duke who stood upon so “ ticklish a point himself durst not openly oppose it, much less “ did he venter to meddle (whatever her Grace might think) in “ any business but what related to Scotland, infine thō My Lord “ Halifax did what he could to hinder it nothing was proof

KING JA: Mⁿ
To. 9. p. 176.

“ against her importunitie, and My Lord Sunderland was “ made Secretary of State in My Lord Conway's room who had been so in his; so that now she thought herself well enough armed for any attempt, thō it were even to send the Duke back again into banishment, which she began to entertain some thoughts of, and if his Majesty had lived much longer, tis probable she might have effected it.

The Duke of Monmouth's inclinations to follow this example were too weak to withstand the Sollicitations of his factious friends, who kept him fixt in his engagements to them : all the Dutchess of Monmouths' long importunity could doe, was " to give her leave at last to tell the King, that if he would " pleas to pardon his past follies, he would for the future keep " company with none but such as his Majesty should apoint ; " but, repenting immediately of what he had done, tould her next " day, She might say what she pleased for herself, as a thing " she believ'd he would do, but not to engage for him, it " seems he apprehended some thing more would be required of " him which he was resolved never to consent too; so that, " thō she press'd him all she could, he was not to be prevail'd " upon any further : The report however of it allarmed all sides, " the Duke's friends apprehended a seeming reconciliation " might put him in a capacitie of doing more mischief, and " the other partie were affraid to loos the main handle of their " faction ; so My Lord Shaftsbury, Russel, M^r Montagu &c, " at their next meeting charged him with what they had heard, " but he confidently denyd he had any designe to reconcile " himself with the Court, that he could not hinder the foolish " words and wishes of his wife, and to convince them how " firme he was in their intrest, made a sort of progress, as had " been resolved amongst them, into Cheshire and the neih- " bouring Counties to rais the people into a factious temper in " order to future designes ; but thō in some places he got a few " forced acclamations from the Rabble, in others he met with affronts, so that neither he nor his partie reaped any great good from that contrivance.

T O M E
II.

1682.

The Duke of Monmouth makes some offers towards a reconciliation.

KING JA. Mth
To: 8. p. 317.

ON the other hand the King got every day more and more advantages over these pretended patriots, by fineing the late 1683.

The Quo Warranto

TOME IL

1683.

brought against the Cities' Charter.

Sheriffs of London and other fiery sticklers for their riotous proceedings, and at last subdued entirely that Stubborn and rebelleous Citie, by bringing a Quo Warranto against its charter and franchises, which after a long and solemn debate was by judgment of the Court of King's Bench seized in the King's hands. The Duke began to call his enemies to account too, and thō his inclinations always lead him to mercy and pardon, he thought it necessary to terrifie others by making an example of the late Sherif Pilkington ; who having Sayd upon the Duke's return, He had fired the Citie and was now come to cut their throats, he caus'd him to be indicted, (May 8th) and the words being proved by two Aldermen, the Court assign'd his Royal Highness a hundred thousand pounds for damages.

KINGJA:M^m
To: 8. p. 341.

Nothing now was wanteing to make the King perfectly easy in his affairs but the Duke's assistance in the management “ of them ; and therefore at his return from Newmarket “ acquainted him with his design of admitting him again “ into the Commitee of forreign affairs, and of consulting “ him in all other matters as well as what related to Scotland,
 “ but thought it proper, he Sayd, to delay it a little till he Saw “ what bent his Neibours took in order to peace or war, which “ might force him perhaps to certain measures not so agreeable to “ the people, and he was willing to spare the Duke the odium of “ haveing it charged to his account ; but the discovery of a “ cursed Conspiracy, which in Part they had already providen“ tially escaped, but still in great measure hung over their “ heads, hasted the Duke's readmission into business for their “ mutual security, sooner perhaps than otherwise it might have “ been done.

The discovery of the Ryehouse Conspiracy.

The King had in amanner entirely conjured downe those rebelleous spirites which had haunted him so long ; but as their quitting a body they haue long possess'd, is generally accompanied with great convulsions and strugglings, so, as a last effort of their malice, they framed a most detestable Plot not only to subuert the Government, but to murder both the King and Duke at a blow, and amongst other Hellish contrivances to compas their wicked ends, had a designe of lodging armies, men, and all other necessities for such an attempt, at a place called Rye house belonging to one of the Conspirators in the road from Newmarket, with design to murder both King and Duke in their late return from thence: but by an extraordinary prouidence a great fire happening there, put an end to the diversion of that place sooner than was intended, and forced the King and Duke back to London some days before the time which had been apointed for it, and before the Conspirators were ready; which most happely disapointed that execrable vilany, and preserved them both from the most barberous attempt the malice of men was capable of inventing.

It was towards the end of Trinity terme ere any discovery was made of this Conspiracy, and thō So many persons were privy to it, no one had the bowells or remorse to acquaint the King or his Royal Highness with the danger they had escaped and were still threaten'd with; it is true the Duke of " Monmouth about the end of April had desired the Dutchess " of Portsmouth, to obtain leave for him to see the King in " order to make his submission, which perhaps was with " design to discover the Plot; but if that argued an earlyer " remorse than that of any other, it render'd him more guilty, who after such an inspiration to his duty coul relaps into his former obdurateness, and say nothing of it, till one Keeling came in and reveal'd the design, which was then soon unravel'd to the Bottom.

KING JA: M^o.
To. 8. pag. 345.

The Earle of Shaftsbury, who had been the first kindler of this fire, wanted patience and courage it seems to wait its blazing out, and was so disharten'd upon a disappointment or two, that complaining the numbers to whom the matter was 1682.

T O M E

II.

communicated were too few to do the work, and too many to conceal it, on the 19th of November, one of the days appointed for a general insurrection, skulked downe the river and went with Walcot and Ferguson to Holland; the case was changed to what it had been when he lay under the cover of those shamefull ignoramus Juries, he then pretended he would walke the King out of the Kingdom, as he arrogantly express'd it, but now durst not allow his own wicked counsellors leasure to come to tollerable maturity: However this disharten'd not the other fiery spirites, the chiefe of which were the Duke of Monmouth, Earle of Essex, Lord Gray, Lord Howard of Escrick, Lord Russel, Colonel Algernoon Sidney, M. John Hampden, Armstrong, Romsey, Rumbald, Sheppard, Walcot and Ferguson, who soon return from Holland and many others all deeply concerned, some in the intended insurrections, others in the assassinations, and many in both; they went on therefore with their wicked consultations and appointed a Councel of Six to haue the priuie direction with inferiour classes under them, who had meetings without end to forme their preparations, both in order to a general insurrection, in which it was sayd near fourty thousand men were engaged, and to contriue in what manner they might assassinate both King and Duke, which sometimes they were for executing in S^t James's park, or when they should be going down the river, or to Hampton Court, or to Windsor, or in the Play house, but at last pitched upon Rye house; and thō they saw by what had happen'd, that Providence so visibly watched over the persons of the King and Duke, yet they were rather enraged than deterr'd by that disapointment, especially when Rumbald came up from Rye house, and tould them, how slenderly attended the King and Duke had pass'd by there: they met therefore and consulted with more freedom than ever, n'ay (such was their horrid barbarity) they would wantonly make their jests upon that bloody business, and in their canting language sport with the most hellish contrivance that could possibly enter into the hearts of men, they resolved all loyall persons of distinction should accompany their Prince in this cruel massacre, Officers of State, privy Councillors, Judges; in fine who ever was supposed to be truly affection'd to the King or Duke were inserted into the bloody List, nor was there any opposition made to whatever was proposed of that nature, their only difficulty or disagreement was what to set up, not what to pull downe, and in this point the Scotch and English had like to have divided. In this manner therefore were they laying about them with all the infernall malice that generally attends the pretended conscientious zeal of such fiery patriots and implacable men, when the discovery of the whole Conspiracy overtook them on the 4^h of June, and justice followed, thō mixed with mighty clemency close at its heels.

It is not necessary to enter into the particulars of this cursed Plot, the history of which has been so accurately and elegantly writ by the Bishop of Rochester; it is only worthy observation that the undeniable conviction and voluntary confession of many of the Conspirators, the witnesses not only credible but one of the Nobility, the innumerable concurring papers and depositions, My Lord Essex cutting his own throat in the Tower, the same day My Lord Russel was tryd and found guilty of it, are other sort of proofs of its reality than the disagreeing testimonys of such indigent Varlets, as composed the evidence of the pretended Popish Plot, made up of contradictions and even impossibilities, disowned by the last breath of every one that dyed for it, not one paper produc'd to prove it, nor one tittle of it ever believ'd by the King himself and therefore were as manifest demonstrations of the falsety of the one, as the foremention'd circumstances were undeniable proofs of the other.

T O M E

II.

1683.

T O M E

II.

1683.

However the King's generous caution not to be imposed upon again by pretended Plots, and not immagining the worst of Subjects could harbour so hellish a design against him, made him yeild a slow credit to the first relation, which gave leasure to many of the chief managers to take the alarme, and by that means scatter and withdraw themselves beyond the Seas: The Duke of Monmouth, upon the first discovery of it, absconded a while, but a proclamation coming out against him, he was forced at last to do for his own security what his good nature could not bring him too, he writ therefore to the King in a most humble manner to beg pardon for his fatal errours, his crimes appear'd to him, he sayd, in so terrible a shape, that he prefer'd even death it self before the present sence of them; in fine he press'd so vehemently for pardon, that the King was not proof against his sollicitations, but admits him to his presence at M^r Secretary Jenkins' Office; who being withdrawn, " and none present but the King and Duke, he freely " owned his knowledge of the whole Conspiracy except what " related to the intended assasination, with which he aver'd he " never was acquainted, he named all the persons concern'd " with him in it, and did not contradict any thing My Lord " Howard had Sayd, except one particular which was not " material, he very well remember'd what Rumney had Say'd " of My Lord Russel, who when Trenchard had fail'd him, " sayd he would put on his boots and go to Taunton himself, " and make the people rise, he wonder'd no more witnesses " had come in against Wildman, since no man, he Sayd, had " been more active in the Conspiracy then he; that the " Councel of Six had given fifteen pound a man to send Aron " Smith downe into Scotland, that Sir William Courtney, " S^r — Drake, and other Gentlemen knew of it in the West, " that Booth was the man they depended on in Cheshire, and " S^r John Hotham in Yorkshire, he owned his haveing visited

KING JA: M^r
To. 8. 347.

the Guards in order to a surprise, that D^r Owen, M^r Mead, " and all the chief of the Nonconformist Ministers were both " privy and actiue in the Conspiracy, that Major Hurst of " Chichester undertook to surprise Portsmouth, which, he sayd, " might easily be done because the Guards, he sayd, were " drunk every night ; and being asked by the King, If they " had a correspondence with any of his own Guards, or any " of the Court? he positively denyd they had ; he Sayd, Monro's " and S^r John Cockram's comeing up upon the account of " Carolina was but a pretence, their real business being to " adjust matters so, that their riseing there might be at the same " time with that in England, that Rowallen Bailly and other " Scotch in hould were all engaged, that they complain'd they " wanted arms, but not good wills to the business ; and Sayd, " that My Lord Argile would bring a great aid to the Western " men, who had layd a designe to surprise Sterling Castle by an " old gate towards Ballinquith, where they Sayd no guard was " kept, that they were to seize the Chancellor and Treasurer " in Edinburg which they thought might be easily effected " by 40 or 50 horse, and doubted not but they could get so " many into the Town without any notice being taken. "

All these particulars his Royal Highness set downe, and was the more exact in doing it, because assoon as the Duke of Monmouth had got his pardon, he began to heard as formerly with his factious Councillors, which made the King apprehend the evil spirit was enter'd again ; he was not content with his Majestys promis of being exempt from Wittnessing against his old friends, but he began again to be their Patron too, the truth of it was, they had got such a dominion over his unstable mind, that they soon overthrew all his new made vows of Loyaltie ; but haveing left a letter in his Majestys custody, wherein he owned all his knowledge of the Conspiracy, which the King had required not only as a ty upon him, but for

T O M E
II.

1683.

KING JA. Mth.
To. 8. pag. 355.

publick satisfaction, it being so hard to stiffe the groundless suggestions of those false and factious men against the plainest matters of fact in the world ; his business was therefore to get it back, which he press'd so earnestly, that his Majesty when he saw him positue, was so good as to tell him, He would not keep it against his will, and so return'd it to him, upon which he flew back immediately and denyd every word he had sayd : By this Stratagem, he had wash'd himself clean in the eye of the Law, and had preserued his head from the block without contributing to bring others to it, and was so ungratefull as to make no other use of his Majestys gracious pardon than to draw from thence an advantage of entring more securely into a new " cours of disobedience ; the King was exceeding angry to find " his indulgence thus abused, but all he could do was to " banish him the Court, upon which he withdrew privately beyond " seas with one Gentleman and a Seruant took shiping at " Greenwich in a fisher boat, and landed soon after in Zealand.

" Before he went away some persons would have per" suaded him to have gon and serued the Emperour in Hungary,
" but, he sayd, that would draw him too far of ; wherefore he
" only made a turn to Bruxelles and from thence to Holland,
" where he saw the Prince of Orange ; and whether he Satisfyd " him or no (as he pretended he could with a quarter of an " hour's discours) it argued no great respect in that Prince,
" to the King and Duke, to admit a visite from a person who " had own'd himself capable of entring into so horrid a " Conspiracy against them both, and who still endeavour'd to " keep up his credit with that rebellious partie and his vain
" pretences to a Crown ; this the Duke in some measure
" expostulated with his son in Law, and forewarn'd him not to " credit a person who had so infamously denyd what he had so
" solemnly declar'd, nor to countenance one who had so " lately done his best to destroy them all and involve the Kingdom in blood and confusion. But that Prince's darke designs were not under the tyes of honour and duty, so he then began to give the Duke of Monmouth such encouragement as hinder'd his hopes from extinguishing with his friends, who now were every day found guilty and executed.

TOME
 II.

1683.

1684.

By this discovery and the punishment of several of the chief Conspirators, his Majesty had at last crushed those rebellious snakes, which had so long infested his Royal Throne, and gave him leasure to think of supporting it by forreign Alliances now it was in securitie at home, in order to which a Mariage was treated betwixt the PRINCESS ANNE and PRINCE GEORGE, Brother to the King of Denmark; there could not be a greater argument how averse the Duke was, from forcing any one in point of Religion, than his submission to the King's pleasure in marrying his second Daughter to a Protestant Prince too, thō the late comportement of the Prince of Orange was no great encouragement to try what another Son in Law might proue of the same Religion, but no command or desire of his Majesty, that was not manifestly against the Law of God was ever so much as ballanced by the Duke; so the Marriage was solemnized on the 28th of July, and not long after the King in recompence of his Royal Highnesse's dutifull compliance in this and in all other matters, restored him to his former imployments of High Admiral and Privy Concellor, and made him some sort of reparation likewise for the publick calumnies and aspertions cast upon him, by the conviction of Oates both for Scandalum Magnatum and perjury; extending also his kindness to others for his sake, the Prisoners for Oates's pretended Plot were discharged upon bail, and a " general pardon intended them, but for some formalitys of "
 Law was for a time delayd,

The Princess Anne married to Prince George of Denmark.

KING JAM: M^o.
 To. 8. pa. 361.

T O M E

II.

1684.

And now the King had brought his affairs to a more happy situation than ever they had been since the Restoration; he saw his enemies at his feet, and the Duke his Brother at his side, whose indefatigableness in business took a great share of that burthen off his shoulders, which his indolent temper made uneasy to him, and this his Royal Highness performed with such a perfect conformity to his Majestys inclinations and obedience to his will, as made his servises as free from jealousy and unsuspected, as they were affectionate and usefull, both to confirm his happyness at home and establish his reputation abroad; which two points being attain'd to a great degree, the King had a pleasant vew of future tranquility for the reste of his days, and to enjoy the frutes of his late toils, the memory of which gave a higher relish to his present eas; when it pleas'd God to shew on how sandy a foundation all temporal happiness in this world as well as the best layd projects are built, by calling him out of this life, when he seem'd most secure of enjoying it by the mastery he had got over those restless, crafty, and implacable spirites that had so long and furiously sought it.

King Charles the 2^d death.

KING JA. M^r.
To. 9. pag. 199

“ It was on the 2^d of February that the King was seized with “ a violent fit of an apoplexy just as he came out of his closet “ where he had been for some time before he was dress'd :
“ The Duke was immediately advertised of it, but before he “ could get to his Majestys bed chamber, one Doctor King “ being in the withdrawing room was called in, and had let “ him blood; and then by aplication and remedys usual on “ such occasions (which was done by his own Phisicians) he “ came perfectly again to his sences, so that next morning there “ was great hopes of his recovery : but in the forth day he “ grew so much wors that all those hopes vanished, and the “ Doctors declared they absolutly dispair'd of his life, which “ made it high time to think of preparing for the other world ;

accordingly two Bishops came to doe their function, who " reading the prayers apointed in the common prayer book on " that occasion, when they came to the place, where usually " they exhort the Sick person to make a confession of his Sinns, " the Bishop of Bath and Wells who was one of them " advertised him, It was not of obligation: so after a short " exhortation asked him, If he were sorry for his Sinns? " which the King saying he was, the Bishop pronounced " absolution, and then asked him, If he pleas'd to receive the " Sacram nt? To which he made no reply, and being press'd " by the Bishop several times, gaue no other answer but that " it was time enough, or that he would think of it. "

The Duke, who stood all this while by his Majestys " bed side, and seeing that notwithstanding the Bishop's " sollicitation he would not receive the Communion from " them, and knowing the King's sentiments in matters of " Religion concerning which he had lately had frequent " conferences with him, thought it a fit oportunitety to remind " him of it, and therefore, desireing the company to stand a little " from the bed, Sayd, He was overjoyed to find his Majesty in " the same mind he was when he spoak lately to him in his " closet about Religion, at which time he was pleas'd to shew " him a paper he had writ himself of controversie, and " therefore asked him, if he desired he should send for a Priest " to him? to which the King immediately replyd, For God's " sake Brother doe, and pleas to loos no time; but then " reflecting on the consequence, added, But will you not expose " yourself too much by doing it? The Duke who never thought " of danger when the King's Service call'd, thō but in a temporal " concern, much less in a eternall one; answer'd, S^r, thō it cost " me my life I will bring one to you, and immediately going " into the next room, and seeing never a Catholick, he could

TOME

II.

1684.

KING CH. THE 2^d DEATH IN KING JAMES'S OWN HAND.

FATHER HUDDLESTON'S RELATION OF
KING CH.
HIS MANNER OF DEATH.

send but the Count de Castel Machlor; he dispatched him " on that errand, and thō other Priets were sent for, yet it " fortun'd none could then be got but Father Huddleston a " Benedictin Monk who had been so assistant to his Majesty " in making his escape after the battle of Worcester, who " being brought up a pair of backstairs into a private closet, " the Duke advertised the King where he was, who thereupon " order'd all people to withdraw except the Duke; but his " Royal Highness thought fit that My Lord of Bath, who was " Lord of the Bedchamber then in waiting, and My Lord " Feversham the Captain of his Guards should remain in the " room, telling the King, it was not fit he should be quite " alone with his Majesty considering the weak condition he was " then in; and assoon as the room was clear'd, accordingly " call'd M^r Huddleston in, whom his Majesty received with " great joy and satisfaction, telling him he desired to die in the " faith and Communion of the Catholick Church; that he " was most heartely sorrie for the sins of his past life, and " particularly for haveing differ'd his conversion so long, that " he hoped nevertheless in the merits of Christ, that he was in " charitie with all the world, pardon'd his enemies and begg'd " pardon of those he had any ways offended at that if it " pleas'd to God he recover'd, was resolv'd by his assistance to " amend his life; then he proceeded to make a confession of his " whole life with exceeding tenderness of heart, and pronounced " an act of Contrition with great piety and compunction: in " this he spent about an hour, and haveing desired to receiue " all the succours fit for a dying man, he continued makeing " pious ejaculations, and frequently lifting up his hands, cryd, " Mercy Sweet Jesus, mercy, till the Priest was ready to give " him extreme unxion; and the blessed Sacrament being come " by that time this was ended, he asked his Majesty If he "

desired to receive it? who answer'd, He did, most earnestly, " if he thought him worthy of it: Accordingly the Priest after " some further preparations going about to give it him, he " rais'd himself up, and sayd, Let me meet my heavenly Lord " in a better posture than lying on my bed; but being desired " not to discompose himself, he repeated the act of contrition " and then receiv'd with great pietie and devotion, after which " Father Huddleston makeing him a short exhortation left " him in so much peace of mind that he looked approaching " death in his face with all immaginable tranquillitie and " Christian resolution.

TOME
II.

1684.

The company then being call'd in again, his Majesty " express'd the greatest kindness and tenderness for the Duke " that could possibly be conceiv'd; he own'd in the most " publick manner the sence he had of his Brotherly affection " during the whole cours of his life, and particularly in " this last action, he commended his great submission and " constant obedience to all his commands, and asked him " pardon allow'd for the rigorous treatment he had so long " exercised his patience with; all which he sayd in so affec- " tionate a manner, as drew floods of tears from all that were " present, he spoke most tenderly to the Queen too, and infine " left nothing unsaid, or undone, that so small a time would " allow of either to reconcile himself to God, or to make " satisfaction to those he had injured upon earth, disposing " himself to dy with the pietie and unconcernedness becomeing " a Christian, and resolution becomeing a King; and then his " sences begining to fail him, (which had continued perfect till about an hour before his death) he expired betwixt eleven and twelve a clock in fryday morning being the Sixt of February, 1684.

KING JAM.
PAPERS CONCERNING KING CH: HIS DEATH.

His death was universally lamented, as in his life he had been generally beloued, for even the malignity of those who

TOME

II.

1684.

most molested his reign, sprung more from a hatred of his power and character than from any aversion to his person. He wanted no qualification that could make a Prince glorious and a Nation happy, thō mixed with some disorders and infirmities which sullyd those shineing natural partes, which were otherwise the admiration of his Neibors, as well as the delight and security of his subjects; he was so exceeding ingenious in his conversation, So affable in his nature and so easy of access, as endear'd him beyond expression to all who had the honour to be about him; thō some used that benignity to a contempt as they did his mild disposition and mercifull temper, to the great disturbance of his government, which he bore with So long, as made his judgment and courage be call'd in question for a while but shew'd in the end he neither wanted cunning to countermeane those who despised him, nor resolution to break those stubborn spirits, who thought to have run him the same rock on which his Royal Father so miserably perished, thō his excessive love of ease made him loiter so long about it as to suffer many irregularities in his government, and a most unjust oppression of the inocent, particularly in Oates's Plot, till awaked by the dayly admonitions of his Brother, he shook off his fetters at last, and made the Regal power appear in its natural vigour and luster again, in which it continued till his death.

HERE ENDS THE SECOND VOLUME OF THE MANUSCRIPT.

